

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—THOMAS W. WHITE, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. VIII.

RICHMOND, JANUARY, 1842.

NO. 1.

THE NEW YEAR GREETINGS

OF AN EDITOR TO HIS PATRONS AND FRIENDS.

This is the season of gratulation among friends—of good will among all. The first salutation of the day from the merry lips of thousands, has been “a happy new year.” And to each and all of our patrons we wish many and happy returns of the season. The new year is the time for reflecting upon the past, of making fresh resolves, and of renewing our calculations upon the future. This is an indulgence which the Messenger craves of those to whom it has made its monthly visits in their appointed regularity. It has now completed its seventh year. During this long and tedious time, we have struggled hard, rising up early and sitting down late, to make our Journal worthy of itself and its readers. Within this period, time and death have done their work—they have taken away many a staunch and valued friend; but time and a kind Providence have raised up others no less loyal and true. We too have had our trials—Planters and farmers have had, with the returning seasons, their seed time and harvest—but we have had one long seed time of seven years. Our harvest is now ripe for the reaper; and we shall put in the sickle, to gather in and garner up the fruits of our Jacob-like term of labor; for within the last year our subscription list has increased largely, and fresh numbers are daily lengthening it out. Never has the circulation of the Messenger been as great as it now is. To continue in the favor which we have won, we shall relax no muscle, spare no exertion; and the better to serve those who are friends, we are now purging our subscription list of all those who patronize us only in name. The making up of each No. for the mail, after it comes from the binder, occupies alone nearly two weeks. The obligations between proprietor and subscriber are reciprocal, and an Editor can afford, no more than any other laborer, ‘to work for nothing and find himself;’—we have tried it, and find it a hard task. In our literary cater-ship, we have marketed at home and abroad; we have gathered up from the sea and the land, and have monthly spread before our readers the costly banquet; and we can now promise our readers a corps of correspondents in the old world and the new—such as no paper in the land can boast of. Onward is our course. If the Messenger has been good in times past, it shall be better in times to come. It has never had such a list of correspondents as those whose pens are now engaged to adorn its pages. To them, and not to us, belongs the honor of its excellencies; to them, we feel and acknowledge our obligations. And in returning our thanks for past favors, we beg them to have patience with us sometimes, and bear with any seeming neglect of their contributions. We have bushels of these now before us; and every mail adds fresh supplies to the pile. With the growing popularity of the Messenger, such has been the increase of contributors, that it would now keep one person constantly employed to overhaul MSS. and do nothing else. Therefore, if those who offer us pieces in a difficult hand, be occasionally kept a month or two in suspense as to their fate, they should not complain. Ours is now the oldest magazine of its kind on this side of Mason & Dixon’s line. Near eight years ago, when we undertook its publication, we entered upon the work with many forebodings, for there was much to dishearten and to deter. The trial had been often made, and as often failed; until the belief became almost universal, that no publication of the kind could flourish or live at the South—and, though yet in the days of its youth, the Messenger is now the Patriarch of Southern Literature. It is the oldest magazine of the kind at the South. Within its time, it has seen kindred attempts spring up and perish. But, thanks to its patrons and friends, it has now taken root from one end of the Union to the other—and is beyond the vicissitudes of the times. It is the first successful diagram, by which the problem of Southern Literature has been demonstrated. And, as such, we send it out to the world each time of publication with livelier feelings of pride and pleasure.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE

OF H. H. BRACKENRIDGE,

LATE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Hugh Henry Brackenridge, (or Breckenridge as the name is most usually spelled,) was born near Campletown, in Scotland, in the year 1750, and was brought to America by his parents, at five years of age. His father was a poor farmer, with only sufficient means to pay for the passage of his family: and this he could not have accomplished but for the sale of some extra clothing on his arrival.

The barrens of York county, in Pennsylvania, and the adjacent part of Maryland, eighty years ago, were pretty much in the same state of population and improvements, as our most remote settlements at the present day. Mr. Brackenridge’s father required the assistance of all his children on the small farm which he leased; yet, like the Scotch in general, he neglected no opportunity in his power of giving the best education to his children. Hugh was sent to the country school in the neighborhood, and was soon remarked for great vivacity and aptitude for learning; the teacher even complained that he discouraged his other scholars. The pursuit of learning soon became a passion in which he manifested that intense ardor and perseverance which characterized him through life.

It was the good fortune of the subject of this notice, to find a friend in the clergyman settled in the neighborhood. This benevolent person, seeing the passion for learning manifested by a poor boy of obscure parentage, took pleasure in rendering him every assistance in his power. A few lessons at long intervals sufficed to enable the willing pupil, by dint of application, to master the Latin, and make some progress in the Greek, under every disadvantage, before he reached his thirteenth year. The Saturday evening was the usual time for receiving instruction, for which he performed various little offices in return. At home, by means of the dim light made by chips and splinters, he coned over his book, or books; for he rather devoured than studied them in the ordinary way. It must be confessed, however, that Hugh was not as highly praised for his diligence at out-door work. But he was not discouraged by his parents. His mother, who was a woman much superior in intellect and education to the generality of persons in her circumstances, began to look forward with fond hope to seeing her favorite son one day a minister of the Gospel.

His great difficulty was to procure books. By some means he had become the master of an Horace—every word and line of which he had coned over. This treasure was one day unfortunately forgotten on a stump, and chewed up by a literary cow. The loss was regarded by Hugh as the keenest distress he had yet experienced. He was known to go twenty or even thirty miles to procure the loan of a book or even of a newspaper; starting on Saturday night, and returning to his work on Monday morning. Foggs' Manor, in Chester county, was usually the scene of these excursions.

Great ardor in any pursuit will almost create for itself the means of success; but when sustained by genius, all difficulties give way before it, and impossibilities no longer exist. Once, meeting with a young man who had made some progress in mathematics, but was not acquainted with the dead languages, he struck up a bargain, mutually advantageous, bartering a portion of Latin and Greek for the acquirements of the other.

The free school on the Gunpowder Falls, in Maryland, being without a teacher, he presented himself at the age of fifteen for the situation. The trustees were not less surprised at the application, than by the qualifications of the applicant; and after some hesitation, gave him the place. This situation not only required scholarship, but called for a determined spirit—for several of his scholars were young men—at least several years older than himself. One of them attempted to overturn the authority of the youthful teacher by force, who, seizing a brand from the fire, knocked the rebel down, and spread terror around him. An investigation was the consequence; and Hugh was confirmed in his office with honor. He continued here about three years, permitting no moment to escape without improving himself in knowledge; and his opportunities were now considerably enlarged. On one occasion, he shut up his school for a few days to attend a celebrated trial for murder at Annapolis; and, when he heard the great orator Jennings, he exclaimed, like the celebrated Italian artist—soi anche pittore! I too am a painter!

He remained at this place until he had exhausted the sources of learning near him; and his thirst for knowledge urged him to seek more copious streams. At the age of eighteen, with the scanty pittance saved by him at the obscure school where he had taught, he boldly repaired to Princeton College, and presented himself to the celebrated Dr. Witherspoon, then its president. This was about the year sixty-eight or nine of the last century. He agreed to teach two classes, on condition of being permitted to pursue his studies in the higher branches.

At this time there was a number of young men of the highest promise at this institution, and who afterwards ranked among the most distinguished public men in this country: the Livingstons of New-York, Luther Martin, James Madison, and a number of others, who afterwards became eminent.

While at college his ambition urged him to excel, if possible, in every department of learning: but he acknowledged that he had no great aptitude in mathematics; and although he courted the Muses, and in conjunction with the poet Freneau, his classmate, composed a poem on "The Rising Glory of America," he confessed that on his part it was a task of labor, while the verse of his associate flowed spontaneously. His task lay in belles lettres and general literature; in languages, philosophy, moral science, or ethics: in wit and eloquence, he stood unequalled. He could reason well, had a fine voice, a fine person, and an eagle eye; the last are physical gifts which set off his accomplishments to the greatest advantage, and are almost indispensable to the public speaker. The narrowness of his pecuniary circumstances often depressed him. He used to relate an anecdote of Dr. Witherspoon, which is worth preserving. Happening to speak of his limited means and want of friends, he quoted this line from Juvenal—

Haud facilis emergunt quorum virtutibus obstat res angusta domi.

"There you are wrong, young man," said the doctor; "it is only your res angusta domi nare, that do emerge." He also related that on one occasion having prepared a public address for a young gentleman, whose situation in life was the reverse of his own, and which gained much applause, he found in his apartment shortly after, a handsome suit of clothes, with a cocked hat—at that day very commonly a part of a gentleman's equipment.

After having graduated, he remained sometime as a tutor; and engaged in the study of divinity, until he was licensed to preach, when he was invited to take charge of an academy on the Eastern shore of Maryland, with a handsome salary. He continued here during several years until the breaking out of the American Revolution. He was in the midst of a wealthy and highly polished society, and was greatly respected as a man of genius and scholarship; while his wit, and superior social and conversational powers, always rendered him a welcome guest. He infused into his pupils a love of learning; and used to speak with the pride of a Porson, of the Winders, the Murrays, the Purnells, and others, who were afterwards distinguished. To this day, there is traditionary remembrance of him in that neighborhood.

The revolutionary struggle now monopolized the public attention. He took an early interest on the side of those who might be considered his countrymen; for, having arrived in America when a child, all his feelings were naturally on the side of the country in which he had passed his infancy and received his education. These were quite enthusiastic, as is proved by the dramatic piece written by him for his scholars, and which after due preparation they exhibited before their admiring parents; it was called Bunker Hill, composed shortly after the battle, and since published in a miscellaneous volume.

About the year 1776, that of the Declaration of Independence, he left the academy and repaired to Philadelphia, having about a thousand pounds in the current money—but which depreciated so rapidly, that in a short time he was stripped of the labor of years. It became necessary to employ himself in editing a political journal or magazine for his support, and which he conducted with ability. The United States Magazine, which was the name of the periodical, abounded with appeals to American patriotism; and its contents were varied by poetic effusions, and strokes of wit. At one time it contained some severe strictures on the celebrated General Lee, and censured him for his conduct to Washington. Lee, in a rage, called at the office, in company with one or two of his aids, with the intention of assaulting the Editor; he knocked at the door, while Mr. Brackenridge, looking out of the upper story window, inquired what was wanting? "Come down," said Lee,

"and I'll give you as good a horsewhipping as any rascal ever received." "Excuse me, General," said the other, "I would not go down for two such favors."

In the following year, 1777, he joined the army as Chaplain to a regiment, and for a year lived in camp; experiencing the life of the soldiers, preaching to them, and attending them to the battle-field, as in the time of the Scotch Covenanters. His sermons of course were political; six of them were published in a pamphlet, and widely circulated. On the 4th of July, 1778, he delivered a very eloquent oration in the Dutch Reformed Church in Philadelphia, in honor of the brave men who had fallen in the contest. An anecdote of him was related to me by a respectable old gentleman, well known in Philadelphia. The evening before the battle of Brandywine, in the neighborhood of which he then lived, a tall man, with a cocked hat and military appearance, came to his house, and, with very little ceremony, requested that his horse might be fed—and said that after taking a walk, he would return to tea. He was then observed to direct his course to a spot from which he could have a view of the American army. The host, who was a good whig, suspecting the stranger to be a spy, called in his family and a neighbor who was present; they resolved to examine the saddlebags, which had no padlock: but these suspicions were soon removed by finding nothing in them, but a pocket bible and a couple of shirts rather the worse for wear. The stranger proved to be the subject of this biography.

Mr. Brackenridge, although licensed to preach, was never ordained, nor formally consecrated to the ministry. As he grew older, he became convinced that his natural temperament called him to the scenes of active life. Besides, he found himself unable to yield a full assent to all the tenets of the church in which he had been educated. He declared that for two whole years, he labored most sincerely and assiduously to convince himself; but in vain; and he could not think of publicly maintaining doctrines, in which he did not privately believe. On one occasion, in conversation with a Scotch clergyman, he stated his difficulties. The other replied to him, that he was pretty much in the same predicament. "Then, how do you reconcile it to your conscience to preach doctrines of whose truth you are not fully convinced?" "Hut man," said he, "I dinna think much about it—I explain the doctrine, as I wud a system o' moral philosophy, or metaphysics; and if I dinna just understand it noo, the time may come when I shall; and in the meantime I put my faith in wiser men, who established the articles, and in those whose heads are sufficiently clear to understand them. And if we were tae question but ane o' these doctrines, it wud be like taking a stane out o' a biggin; the whole wa' might fa' doon." As this mode of reasoning did not satisfy Mr. Brackenridge, he resolved to turn his attention to the study of the law—a circumstance, to which may be ascribed the unfriendly feeling manifested towards him afterwards by some of the clergy, who looked upon him as an apostate; denounced him as one of the wicked; and which led him, on more than one occasion, to retaliate. His writings display a liberality on the subject of religion, which is thought by some to border on free thinking. It is true he hated hypocrisy, but revered the Christian religion as taught in the Scriptures; he was only skeptical as to some of the tenets of different sects; yet he did not pretend to call them directly in question, preferring to pass them in silence, from unwillingness to lessen that general respect for religion and its teachers, which he considered necessary to the well-being of society. Whatever satirical freedom may be discovered in his works, is aimed at certain professors of religion, and not at religion itself, of which he always speaks with respect—frequently referring to the Scriptures, of which he was a perfect master.

He now repaired to Annapolis and placed himself under the celebrated Samuel Chase, afterwards one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Having completed his studies, Mr. Brackenridge resolved to seek his fortune West of the Allegheny mountains, as affording a field where his talents could be brought into immediate requisition. He accordingly crossed them in the year 1781, directing his course to the source of the Ohio; where there was, at that time, a small village, at the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela rivers, now the great manufacturing city of Pittsburgh. At that time it was not the seat of justice of a county, but a part of Westmoreland. He was not long in establishing a reputation in the three counties of Westmoreland, Fayette and Washington; and sometime afterwards, when the county of Allegheny was established, he was already at the head of the bar of Western Pennsylvania. There is nothing surprising in this, when we consider the nature of new settlements, where the population are, for the greater part, strangers to each other, and no overgrown reputations to overshadow aspiring young men. Besides, Mr. Brackenridge was a man of decided talents, with a commanding person, highly popular manners, and a mind richly stored with various learning. He had a profound knowledge of men; possessed great address; could raise a laugh at pleasure; could reason clearly, and make the blood run cold by touches of genuine eloquence. He did not attempt the pathetic, either because he thought it a proof of weakness, or because it did not accord with his firm and decided character. He was, notwithstanding, a great master of the human passions; and could touch at pleasure, the secret springs by which they are moved.

In the course of a few years, Mr. Brackenridge was elected to the State Legislature, which then sat in Philadelphia; he took an active part, and delivered a very able speech on the subject of instructing our representatives in Congress, to demand the free navigation of the Mississippi. He displayed on this occasion, a scope of intellect, which, in the opinion of the best judges, fitted him for a wider sphere of action. Here he had the misfortune to fall out with his colleague—a self-taught man of some sagacity, but a mere popular weathercock—a demagogue, of that species which follows and flatters the ignorance and caprices of the people, without ability or integrity to set them right. Some unguarded expressions derogatory to the majesty of the people, were carefully treasured up, and displayed by this man to their constituents; and for a short time served to injure the popularity of Mr. Brackenridge. The effect produced by it on his mind, may be slightly traced in "Modern Chivalry."

When the great struggle, for and against, the Federal Constitution, came on, he took an active part—and to use his expression, "fought a hard battle in its defence." Findlay, Gallatin and others, with whom he afterwards acted in the Western Insurrection, were in the opposition. The parties of federal and anti-federal, ended with the adoption of the Constitution. The original elements of these parties became commingled, after having been distributed like the types of the printer. Luther Martin and Patrick Henry, the most ardent opposers of the Constitution, took their stand with the federal administration, under Washington and Adams. Mr. Madison, Mr. Brackenridge and others, united with Gallatin and Findlay in condemning some of the prominent measures of that administration. Hence, the names of federal and anti-federal, have nothing in common with the subsequent division of parties, into federal and democrat, or republican. The names are apt to lead into error those who are not acquainted with the minute history of our political parties.

Mr. Brackenridge prospered in his profession. In the course of ten or twelve years, he laid the foundation of a fortune, married, built a large and commodious dwelling, and was universally respected for his integrity and talents. As is generally the case with popular lawyers, he was looked up to as the champion of popular rights. He defended the twelve individuals, indicted for tarring and feathering an exciseman of the name of Graham; and was employed in the "great case" of the seventy distillers, who were prosecuted for not entering their stills according to law. A popularity of this kind no doubt led to some inconvenience, as it in some measure identified him with opinions and movements which he did not always approve. Neither did he escape those personal rencounters, so apt to prevail in the new settlements, which seem to be the unavoidable consequence of the unsettled and rude state of society and manners. In not less than four or five occasions, he was obliged, in self-defence, to engage in personal combat; and thanks to a powerful muscular frame, and early training to athletic exercises, he came off victorious, except in one instance, when he received a treacherous blow with a club on the shoulder, but stood his ground until others interposed.

Being in the habit of speaking contemptuously of the practice of duelling, and making rather light of the virtue of personal bravery, an idea prevailed with some that he was deficient in courage. Induced by this circumstance, perhaps, a man of a bullying character, to whom he had given offence, had a design of challenging him, in the hope that he would refuse, and by that means afford an opportunity of posting and degrading him in the estimation of the people. This person, consulting with a friend, to whom he communicated his design, was told that he must not count too confidently on what such a man as Brackenridge might do, or might not do, as he was one of those whose course no one could know until determined by circumstances,—and that it might not be safe to rely on his not fighting, notwithstanding his contempt of the practice of duelling. He was, what Carlyle, in his grotesque style, calls a reality. The last of these adventures was with a person of the name of Simpson, who followed him into the back room of a tavern and drew a small sword; the assailant was instantly levelled with a chair—his sword dashed from his hands, and the “Scribe in blue” (as Mr. Brackenridge called himself in a humorous poem,) seized the “Wight in red” and placed him on the fire, from which he was not rescued without considerable injury to his garments.

We now approach the most important epoch in the life of him, who is the subject of this notice, now in the forty-fourth year of his age. In the lives of most persons, there is a crisis, which, like the turning incident of the drama, fixes the denouement, or catastrophe. The epoch to which we refer is the Western, or Whiskey Insurrection, as it is called, in which Mr. Brackenridge took an important, dangerous, but honorable part, although his conduct at the time was misrepresented by his enemies, and was, for a while, misunderstood. He, however, finally triumphed, and lived to see the clouds which lowered over his reputation, scattered and dispersed by truth and justice, although the enmity of individuals, who shall not be named here, continued to attend him. He was not a man to be put down in personal conflicts of any kind, and no one ever sent him an Oliver, without receiving a Roland in return.

Excise laws were particularly odious in Pennsylvania, partly owing to the number of emigrants from Ireland, who brought with them strong prejudices against them; and partly owing to the first attempt at direct taxation by the British Parliament over the colonies, the most prominent cause of the revolution, being an excise law. After the revolutionary war, the state being pressed for means, laid a duty on distilled spirits, to be collected from the distillers, who were required to enter, or register their stills. This law was soon found to be extremely unpopular; the people would not distinguish between a law of their own legislature, and the attempt to bind them in all cases whatsoever by a legislative body in which they were not represented. The enlightened statesman fixed his eye on the principle, “taxation and representation, inseparable,” while the great body of the people looked no higher than the excise, the odious name of the law by which power was manifested to them.

The attempts made to enforce the state excise, only led to open resistance, which the state authority was too weak to put down. The opposition to it was expressed in the same manner as the patriotic opposition to the British Stamp Act; liberty poles were erected, and people assembled in arms, chased off the officers appointed to enforce the law, tarred and feathered some of them, and compelled others to resign. Their object was to compel a repeal of the law, but they had not the least idea of subverting the government. They did not stop to reflect that this was revolution, and not a constitutional mode of procuring the repeal of an odious law, by a lawful expression of public opinion. They only followed, as they supposed, the recent example of the American Revolution; and we should be guilty of great injustice if we were to judge their conduct by the more enlightened ideas on these subjects, which generally prevail throughout our country at the present day. In the Western parts of the state, the violence of opposition to the excise law rose to a higher pitch than in the Eastern, on account of their peculiar situation. Whiskey was almost the only article they could take to market, as they could not descend the Ohio, and there was nothing but a packhorse path across the mountains. The law was therefore partial and oppressive, even as compared to the portion of the state on the East of the mountains.

Their state excise law, after remaining some years a dead letter, was repealed, a circumstance which was not likely to incline the people to submit to a similar law, soon after passed by Congress, at the suggestion of Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury. The people throughout the state, at least in the agricultural portions of it, were indignant, and once more raised their liberty poles. In the West, the popular indignation was such, that no one, for sometime, ventured to stand up in favor of the law. There was a peculiar hardship in their situation: almost every considerable farmer was a distiller for himself and his poorer neighbors, as it was necessary that their surplus grain should be distilled; and besides, as the delinquency of the distillers was only cognizable in the federal court of Philadelphia, a single suit was enough to sink a man's plantation. It was with some difficulty that any one could be found to accept the office of inspector in the Western district, on account of the unpopularity of the law, and of which, the representatives in Congress had been instructed by the state legislature to procure the repeal.*

In this inflammatory state of the public mind in the West, all that was necessary was to apply the torch to kindle a blaze. The first outbreak was in the harvest-field, after the marshal had served his last process against the delinquent distillers. He was driven off and fired upon; an unpremeditated rising took place for many miles around, and the next day, early in the morning, a mob, led by a man of little note, of the name of Holcroft, (the author of some manuscript pasquinades, stuck up at cross roads, signed "Tom the Tinker,") appeared before the residence of the inspector, seven miles from Pittsburg. They were fired upon from the negro houses, some of them killed and wounded, on which they retreated. The day following, a great number of persons assembled at a place called Couch's Fort, some miles from the scene of action. The venerable clergyman of the neighborhood, Mr. Clark, attempted to dissuade them from acts of violence, but such was the state of exasperation which prevailed, that no attention was paid to his exhortations, although, on other occasions, they were accustomed to show the utmost deference to their spiritual counsellor, as is the case with the Scotch Irish in general. About five hundred then marched to a second attack, under the command of a Major McFarlane, who had been an officer of the revolution, and of good standing and character. In the meantime, a reinforcement of twelve men had arrived at the inspector's from the Pittsburg garrison, under Major Kirkpatrick, formerly of the army. A deputation was sent with a flag to demand the commission of the inspector; and this seemed to be the object of the assemblage, under the notion, that if deprived of the commission, the officer would be compelled to cease to act as such. The commission was refused, and the attack commenced, and continued but fifteen minutes, when it was thought that a flag had been exhibited from the house, on which Major McFarlane stepped out with a white handkerchief on the end of a stick. He was mortally wounded by a shot from the house. The attack was renewed with fury, and the property burnt down and destroyed, but no one was injured after the surrender; the soldiers, and the volunteers in defence of the place were dismissed, although the conduct of some among the mob, was such as might be expected on such an occasion.

The reader can readily imagine the state of the country, which followed those lawless acts of violence, and the exaggerated accounts which travelled across the mountains. The peaceful citizens in the towns were alarmed; in the country generally the people became infuriated, as is usually the case where blood has been shed; all regular occupation might be said to be at an end, and the course of law completely arrested. Yet nothing like direct treason against the government possessed their minds; they thought only of the bad law, and, as they believed, the bad men who lent their aid to enforce it. Their attachment to the government of the state, and of the union, was not impaired; they had no idea of any thing further than procuring a repeal.

Meetings were held over the whole of the four Western counties, and some of the adjoining counties of Virginia. But the popular phrenzy had not yet found a leader to give it the form of rebellion, or insurrection, to use the milder phrase adopted at that period. At length a lawyer of the name of Bradford, who resided at Washington, came forward in this character. He was a shallow, vain man, with some talent for popular declamation, but without forecast, without definite plan or object, or capacity to lead and organize; he was merely actuated by the foolish vanity of being for a time a popular idol.

Mr. Brackenridge, thus far, had taken no part in the cause, except in the way of his profession in suits in court; he held, and freely expressed, the same opinions with the people generally, on the subject of the excise laws. On the 21st of July, (1794,) four days after the burning of the inspector's house, he received a note, inviting him to attend a meeting, to be held at the Mingo meeting house. He tore it up, and threw it into the fire-place. Next day, Col. Neville, the son of the inspector, who might be regarded as the officer, called and inquired, whether he had not received a note of invitation to the meeting. Yes, and here are the fragments, producing them from the grate. "Do you go?" "No; I look upon such meetings, after the recent acts, as treason, at least on the part of those who encourage opposition." The inspector declared that he wished him to go; it might do good; he might restrain the people from further excesses; he might point out to them the impropriety of their conduct. He yielded to these and other solicitations, but on condition that he should be accompanied by four or five of the citizens, the Chief Burgess among the rest, in order to bear witness of his words and actions. This being arranged, he went to the meeting, in the sincere desire of being able to do something to check the progress of violence and disorder. Here was a large assemblage; there seemed to be a solemnity on every countenance; uneasiness, distrust, distance and reserve—and with the most prominent actors in the late riots—anger and desperation, expressed in their looks. There appeared to be two distinct classes of people, or rather portions; those already involved by participating in the acts of violence, and those not involved. The first, would naturally seek to involve the whole county, for their own security, at least in order to lessen their own offence, by implicating a greater number. Col. Cook, a gentleman of fortune, and high standing, was chosen Chairman, and Craig Richie, Esq., of Cannonsburg, Secretary. Bradford, and a person of the name of Marshall, who had been active at other meetings, had at first refused to attend, but were threatened with vengeance if they did not, after having encouraged the people in the course they had pursued. They were, in fact, not leaders of the mob, but driven before it. The chair was addressed by Benjamin Parkinson, an active leader at the destruction of the office, a man who was for no half-way means. "I wish to know, said he, "whether what we have done is right or wrong, and whether we are to be supported or left to ourselves."

Such an issue was entirely unexpected by Mr. Brackenridge, and he felt an agony of mind; for if he voted on it, he might involve himself in the guilt of treason; or, in the present exasperated state of the people, if in a minority, he might not live to return home. Besides, even if these dangers did not stare him in the face, if he ventured to oppose the majority, his popularity would be sacrificed, of which he could not be insensible, especially as he was at that time, before the people as a candidate for Congress, with almost a certainty of being elected. He was also attached to the people among whom he had risen to distinction; he saw among them many personal friends, and he was distressed at the perilous situation in which he saw them placed.

Bradford followed in support of Marshall's resolution, in a violent and intemperate speech; justifying all that had been done, and called on the meeting to pledge themselves in its support. After he sat down, a dead silence ensued. There seemed but a moment between treason on the one hand, and popular odium on the other. Every eye was turned to Mr. Brackenridge, who was expected to speak. We shall here use the words of an eyewitness, Mr. Semple, one of the gentlemen who had accompanied him from Pittsburgh. "Bradford began a most violent and inflammatory oration, in support of Marshall's motion. I observed Mr. Brackenridge, who was seated at the west end of the church, and opposite to the principal part of the Pittsburghers, (seated by the members at the east corner,) in great agitation, often throwing his head down on his hand, in the attitude of study. At length, Mr. Bradford's speech being ended, Mr. Brackenridge advanced nearly to the middle of the house, and opposite the Chairman, and began his speech, slowly and irregularly, for the current of the people's prejudices seemed to be strongly against him. He first opened the reasons why the few persons from Pittsburgh came there; they were not instructed, nor had they any delegated powers to agree, or disagree, on any proposition, that might be made; they came only to hear and report. He then took various methods of diverting the attention of the audience from the speech that had preceded his. Sometimes, he would give a sarcastic stroke at the excise, and the inventors of it; and then, tell some droll story thereto relating, in order, as I apprehend, to unbend the mind of the audience from the serious tone to which it had been wrought up. He viewed the subject before him in various lights; and then entered warmly on his main arguments, which was to dissuade the audience from the first proposition. He told them in direct words, "that he hoped they would not involve the whole country in a crime, which could not be called less than high treason; that this would certainly bring the resentment of the general government on us, and there would be none to intercede. The audience seemed petrified and thunderstruck with such observations; and when he had done speaking, not a person seemed desirous of renewing the argument. Silence ensued for some time, and then the company broke up; some went to drink at the spring, and others, in little knots, or clubs, were scattered over the ground."

The foregoing graphic sketch, which gives but a very imperfect outline of the speech, exhibits the genuine orator, and a real occasion for the display of that rare talent. It was no stump speech, nor occasional display; but the fate of the country, and of the speaker himself, depended upon it. His object was to check the progress of the insurrection in the bud, by drawing at once the line between those who were committed, and those who had yet done no criminal act. He acted powerfully on the fears of the latter, by withdrawing the curtain which concealed the gulph before them; he held them up as mediators for their fellow-citizens with the general government, and dwelt upon the certainty of an amnesty, or oblivion of the past, by a suitable application to the President, who had uniformly pursued this course, in preference to putting down opposition to the laws by military force. He ended by recommending a meeting of delegates from every township, which should represent the whole Western country, and urged the propriety of arresting at this point, all further display of forcible resistance to the laws, until the whole West should be consulted.

There were many who were gratified at the course which things had now taken, although no one was willing to acknowledge it; while those who had participated in the recent acts of violence, should be distilled; and besides, as the delinquency of the distillers was only cognizable in the federal court of Philadelphia, a single suit was enough to sink a man's plantation. It was with some difficulty that any one could be found to accept the office of inspector in the Western district, on account of the unpopularity of the law, and of which, the representatives in Congress had been instructed by the state legislature to procure the repeal.*

especially the leaders, were enraged, and manifested it by their looks and gestures. Mr Brackenridge, and his associates, thought it prudent to withdraw. The meeting re-assembled, but did nothing but adopt the proposition of calling a large meeting of delegates from each township. Mr. Brackenridge was convinced that this proposition, so obviously reasonable, would be adopted, and thus take the business out of the hands of promiscuous assemblages, which were no better than mobs. He was of opinion, that the way to control the people on this occasion, was to contract their power into a delegation, and by condensing this, still further, into a standing committee. It was this course which he afterwards followed up with so much address, and which enabled him, in conjunction with Mr. Gallatin, to put an end to the insurrection before the army had crossed the mountains to subdue it by the bayonet. For the present, Mr. Brackenridge had given a serious stab to his popularity, by his speech. He had made bitter personal enemies among those, who had been guilty of open acts of violence; and of course, he must expect to be denounced as a traitor to a cause in which he had never engaged, because he had been willing to unite with them in procuring the repeal of an oppressive law, but never thought of open resistance, much less of overturning the government.

An act was perpetrated on the 26th of July, for which it is difficult to assign a sufficiently rational motive; for, instead of strengthening the cause of the opposition to the law, it had a tendency to weaken it, by revolting the minds of the more considerate. This was the robbing of the mail by Bradford and Marshall, and some other associates, for the purpose of intercepting the correspondence between Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. The only motive for this rash and criminal act, was to find out who were their enemies in the town, and what was said of them by those who wrote an account of the movements, to the government of the state, and to the friends of the law. They of course could not expect to succeed in their own favor. Five individuals, were, by means of these intercepted letters, singled out as the objects of suspicion, and denounced as traitors to the popular cause.

When the meeting had been convened to Pittsburgh, and assembled, a deputation arrived, from the friends of the law, and demanding the banishment of the persons. It was the unanimous sentiment, that the individuals, thus named, should tend to the storm for the purpose of satisfying the people of the country, and that the cause might depend on keeping the names of the individuals out of the step, and not allowing the cause to be divided.

In the meantime, Bradford, with four other addresses a circular, requesting the colonel of militia in the Western division, requiring them to assemble in aid of Bradford's field, for the ostensible purpose of putting down the "respector" office, and restoring the train to from Pittsburgh. Bradford became alarmed at the boldness of this step, issued countermanding orders, and soon after at a meeting held at Washington, he publicly denied that he had issued the latter, having in the meantime been threatened by his own partisans. Mr. James Ross, then a Senator in Congress, attended the meeting, and endeavored to dissuade them from going to the assemblage at Bradford's field, but without success, and only proved how little use there was in any direct appeal to their reason; yet Mr. Brackenridge was afterwards censured for resorting to address, and by indirection, to accomplish the objects in which the direct means had utterly failed, and his seeming to fall in with the prevailing humor was adduced as evidence of treason on his part.

The usurped authority of Bradford, in ordering the militia to assemble at Bradford's field, was readily obeyed by the people, and by many of the officers; the few who were averse to go, were either compelled by their men to lead them, or went of their own accord, in order to prevent disorder. There is no doubt that a large portion of the rank and file would consist of persons of the class of frontier settlers, who were ready to join in any mischief, and not unwilling to plunder a little if an opportunity should offer; many of them the dogs of a long war, which has its "cankers," as well as a long peace.

The people of the town, had reason to be alarmed for their safety, and they were not too certain that "Tom the Tinker" had no allies among them selves. A town meeting was convened. It was admitted that their safety depended on a seeming acquiescence with the views and objects of the country people. Resolutions were passed, and struck off, so as to be distributed in print. In these it was announced, that the inhabitants of the town would march out, and join their brethren, at the place of rendezvous, to carry into effect any measures deemed necessary for the common cause, that they would be watchful of suspicious characters, and send away from among them those unfriendly to the cause, and finally, send delegates to the meeting at Parkersburg & Ferry.

A committee of twenty members was appointed to whom the whole management of this delicate business was to be entrusted, and it was agreed that, for the time, every man was to be an insurgent, and not his part as such, to the best of his abilities. Nothing but this course, could have saved the town from destruction. Mr. Bracken-

A town meeting had been convened in Pittsburgh, and while thus assembled, a deputation arrived, bringing the mail, and demanding the banishment of the obnoxious persons. It was the unanimous opinion of the citizens that the individuals, thus rendered obnoxious, should bend to the storm for a while, in order to satisfy the people of the country, as the safety of the town might depend on keeping on good terms with them. Some of the individuals were convinced of the prudence of the step, and withdrew of their own accord, some descending the river, others crossing the mountains, and some concealing themselves in the garrison or in the neighborhood, so that it might be given out that they had gone.

In the meantime, Bradford, with four others, addressed a circular, or rather, order, to the colonels of militia in the Western counties, requiring them to assemble in arms at Braddock's field, for the ostensible purpose of pulling down the inspector's office, and banishing the traitors from Pittsburg. They of course could not expect to read any thing in their own favor. Five or six individuals, were, by means of these intercepted letters, singled out as the objects of odium, and denounced as traitors to the popular cause.

A town meeting had been convened in Pittsburgh, and while thus assembled, a deputation arrived, bringing the mail, and demanding the banishment of the obnoxious persons. It was the unanimous opinion of the citizens that the individuals, thus rendered obnoxious, should bend to the storm for a while, in order to satisfy the people of the country, as the safety of the town might depend on keeping on good terms with them. Some of the individuals were convinced of the prudence of the step, and withdrew of their own accord, some descending the river, others crossing the mountains, and some concealing themselves in the garrison or in the

In the meantime, Bradford, with four others, addressed a circular, or rather, order, to the colonels of militia in the Western counties, requiring them to assemble in arms at Braddock's field, for the ostensible purpose of pulling down the inspector's office, and banishing the traitors from Pittsburg. Bradford became alarmed at the boldness of this step, issued countermanding orders, and soon after, at a meeting held at Washington, impudently denied that he had issued the latter, having in the meantime been threatened by his own partizans. Mr. James Ross, then a Senator in Congress, attended the meeting, and endeavored to dissuade them from going to the assemblage at Braddock's field, but without success, and only proved how little use there was in any direct appeal to their reason; yet Mr. Brackenridge was afterwards censured for resorting to address, and by indirection, to accomplish the objects in which the direct means had utterly failed; and his seeming to fall in with the prevailing humor was adduced as evidence of treason on his part.

The usurped authority of Bradford, in ordering the militia to assemble at Braddock's field, was readily obeyed by the people, and by many of the officers; the few who were averse to go, were either compelled by their men to lead them, or went of their own accord, in order to prevent disorder. There is no doubt that a large portion of the rank and file would consist of persons of that class of frontier settlers, who were ready to join in any mischief, and not unwilling to plunder a little if an opportunity should offer; many of them the dregs of a long war, which has its "cankers," as well as a long peace.

The people of the town, had reason to be alarmed for their safety, and they were not too certain that "Tom the Tinker" had no allies among themselves. A town meeting was convened. It was admitted that their safety depended on a seeming acquiescence with the views and objects of the country people. Resolutions were passed, and struck off, so as to be distributed in print. In these it was announced, that the inhabitants of the town would march out, and join their brethren, at the place of rendezvous, to carry into effect any measure deemed necessary for the common cause; that they would be watchful of suspicious characters, and send away from among them those unfriendly to the cause; and finally, send delegates to the meeting at Parkinson's ferry.

A committee of twenty members was appointed, to whom the whole management of this delicate business was to be entrusted, and it was agreed, that, for the time, every man was to be an insurgent, and act his part as such, to the best of his abilities. Nothing but this course, could have saved the town from destruction. Mr. Brackenridge, although not Chairman of the Committee, was by general consent invested with the complete control and direction, and was, in fact, regarded and obeyed, as the civic chief; while the militia, which numbered two hundred and fifty, all told, was under the command of General John Wilkins, a high minded, honorable man.

The committee, without arms, marched into the field in front. The situation of Mr. Brackenridge was critical; he had been highly popular, but in consequence of his course at the Mingo meeting, he had become an object of suspicion to the people, and had made some deadly enemies among the leaders. It was necessary to be bold, and self-possessed; at the same time, to use consummate address. With Parkinson and McFarlane, he was personally unfriendly, and these, after Bradford, were the most popular. The prevailing idea was, that all law was silenced, and that an obnoxious individual might be put to death without accountability.

They were nearly all dressed in hunting shirts, as in their campaigns against the Indians, and amused themselves with shooting at marks, or firing in the air. Great wantonness of mind prevailed, and a disposition to engage in any thing, no matter how extravagant.

Bradford, in a general's uniform, marched in front of a number of battalions, and crossed the river. He advanced to the Pittsburgh Committee, spoke to Mr. Brackenridge, and asked whether the obnoxious individuals had been sent away; he replied in the affirmative, and others assented, as it was a part of the system previously arranged. This was a critical moment for him: he was fearful of his reception by Bradford, as he supposed that his safety for the present, at least, depended on it. After this, he ventured to approach a group surrounding Parkinson, saluted them, and was civilly received. Here he sat some time, and talked over recent occurrences; seemed to agree with them, and by degrees, won upon their confidence. Some indiscreet expressions of a young man, of the name of Ormsby, were mentioned to him; he excused him as a rash and foolish young man, not worth their notice. He afterwards learned that there were at that very time, fifteen men, painted like Indians, in pursuit of Ormsby to assassinate him, and that he had only escaped by fifteen minutes, after having been informed of his danger. James Ross, who resided at Washington, also attended the meeting, more as a looker on, than a participant in it, as he soon found it useless and dangerous to oppose the popular current. In passing Mr. Brackenridge, he said to him, "you have a great deal of subtlety, but you will have use for it all." The latter looked around, and then reproved the speaker for his imprudence; fortunately, there was no one to hear the words, and Ross observed, that he had taken care of that before he ventured to speak. Through the day, he passed from group to group, conversing with them, gradually gaining their confidence. During the night, he fell in with different parties, to all of whom he was known, who now listened to him eagerly, some declaring, that he had regained what he had lost at the Mingo meeting house. To say that he overacted his part, that is, went too far in affecting earnestness in the cause, it would be necessary to have been on the spot in order to form a correct judgment. Mr. Ross, who was on the spot, bore ample testimony in his justification. Some inquired, "whether the garrison was to be attacked?" "Certainly." "But will it not cost a great many lives to take it; and how will it be done?" "Blow up a bastion with powder—we shall lose a thousand men in killed and wounded; or we may starve them out." The men had no powder excepting that which was in their powder horns, there was not more than one day's provisions to each man, and few were willing to march to the cannon's mouth.

In the morning, a delegation of three from each regiment, assembled as a Committee; Mr. Brackenridge was one of them. They retired apart, in order to deliberate. Bradford made one of his violent speeches, and stated the object of the assemblage in arms was to chastise those who were friendly to the excise laws; he then read the letters which had been taken from the mail, and appealed to Mr. Brackenridge to know what had been done with the authors. Mr. Brackenridge endeavored to excuse them individually, occasionally indulging a humorous stroke at them, to preclude the idea that he was anxious to save them, out of any personal regard. Some of these sarcasms, thrown out as tubs to the whale, offended the self-love of the individuals, who never forgave him for it. Their own dignity or standing was not so free from doubt as to enable them to afford any diminution of it, by a witticism, or a joke. He found he was going too far, when he heard some one exclaim, "do you mean to excuse all those persons?" Turning to Bradford, he said to him, in an undertone, "do you not know, that you are pursuing the best way to render them a real service, by enabling them to represent themselves as martyrs and sufferers in the cause, for which they will expect to be rewarded?" "I do—but the people must be satisfied."

The people becoming impatient, and the committee no longer private, it was moved by Bradford that the troops now march to Pittsburgh. He was seconded by Mr. Brackenridge, who said aloud, as if addressed to the bystanders, as well as to the Committee—"By all means, let us march into the town, and if with no other view, let us give a proof, that we can preserve the strictest order and discipline; and can refrain from doing any damage, or injury, to persons or property. Let us just march through, and taking a turn, come out on the plain, on the bank of the Monongahela, and after drinking a little whiskey with the inhabitants, the troops will embark and cross the river."

These words, apparently spoken in a careless manner, became the order of the day, and were actually obeyed to the letter. Nothing can more strongly show the superiority of certain minds over others, and over multitudes, than things of this kind.* Bradford saw nothing beyond the vanity of being the momentary idol, and ostensible leader, or he would not have suffered the real command to be thus slipped out of his hands, without even seeming to know it. Bradford and Col. Cook acted as generals, and Col. Blakely as officer of the day. Mr. Brackenridge proceeded with the advance guard to conduct them by the proper road, and was thus in fact the leader of the whole army of five or six thousand men, in the humble capacity of guide, or, at most, as chief of the Civic Committee. When about starting, Mr. Ross again passed him, and said—"the veil is becoming too thin—I fear it will be seen through." It had in fact been seen through by a few, but they had no time to concert measures, and did not know in whom to confide.

Mr. Brackenridge led the whiskey boys, as they were called, by the Monongahela road, so as to keep them out of view of the garrison. They passed through town, wheeled to the left, and came out on the plain to the East. The Pittsburgh militia soon dispersed, and busied themselves in carrying whiskey and water. He was employed in this way himself; it cost him five barrels of old whiskey; but he declared, he would rather try to extinguish the fire in their throats, than in his house.

Bradford had left all to the officers, and had retired to a cool shade, where he was surrounded by glorifiers, to whom he was boasting of his wonderful exploit. Great activity was manifested among the well disposed of the troops to preserve order, which was rendered very difficult by the continual arrival of straggling companies. The great object now, was to throw them across the river as soon as possible. There being but few boats, Mr. Brackenridge rode down to the point, and luckily found it fordable at this season. He immediately returned, and led several squadrons across; after which, all those on horseback followed. The footmen were, in the mean time, ferried across, and there was a prospect of having the town clear. Mr. Brackenridge had all the boats brought over the town side, and on his return, saw the flames of Major Kirkpatrick's barn on the top of Coal hill. This had been the signal to some companies who had remained in town, to set fire to the dwelling house there. He met General Wilkins rushing down to the defence, at the head of a body of the town militia, and immediately stopped him. "This will not do," said he, "it is not our system; if the house is to be defended it must be by these people themselves." He urged other reasons, which convinced Wilkins, who went no further, and he hastened to the spot himself; here he found Col. Cook, McFarlane, and Marshall, who had gone for the purpose of preventing the burning. "Gentlemen," said he, to those bent on mischief, "you cannot burn this house, without burning that of Col. O'Hara; you all know him to be a good man, and absent from home, with the army, engaged in fighting the Indians. If the house must be destroyed, let it be pulled down, and not burned. But why trouble yourselves about it now? The people of the town will pull it down." Aided by the exertions of Cook and McFarlane, the house was saved. The day at length dawned in peace and quiet—the whiskey boys having dispersed, and each returned to his own home.

Mr. Brackenridge would willingly have left the country and crossed the mountains; for he envied those who had been banished. He was desirous of getting some kind of commission from the town, to the President, to represent the circumstances and situation of the country; but his townsmen insisted on his staying, and desired him to go to the meeting of delegates, at Parkinson's ferry. He felt also an earnest desire to pacify the country, if possible, by means short of force, as he was now satisfied that unless this were speedily done, an army would be marched from the other side of the mountains, led on by some Claverhouse, who would exercise a military severity, more to be dreaded than the outrages of the mob. He felt great reluctance to go to Parkinson's ferry, as it would be necessary, in order to effect any thing, as well as for his own safety, to continue to sustain, to a certain extent, the appearance of being with the insurgents.* But

* Mr. Combe, in his phrenological tour, relates the following story, which resembles this. Before the late war between this country and England, a mob had gone on board a British vessel in the port of Philadelphia, taken off the rudder, and were dragging it along the street, with the intention of repairing to the residence of the British Consul and breaking his windows. A gentleman of address, and some personal influence, joined them, and affected to aid in dragging the rudder, but taking advantage of a pause to rest, addressed them in the following manner: "Fellow-citizens, let us prove to these insolent British, that we are not a rabble of disorderly persons, as they represent us—but a calm, reflecting people. Instead of insulting them, let us give three cheers before the Consul's house, and then proceed to the State house, and lock up this rascally piece of British timber in one of the rooms, and then disperse." The suggestion was adopted and literally obeyed. At night, the rudder was secretly conveyed back to the ship by order of the Mayor. It would have been of no use to attempt direct dissuasion; and yet, Mr. Brackenridge was blamed for not flatly opposing the march to Pittsburgh under similar circumstances!

* Findlay, who was his bitter enemy, in his "History, &c." uses this language, when speaking of the proceedings at Parkinson's ferry. "Brackenridge was probably actuated by the same motives as Gallatin, but supported the mea-

Mr. Ross and Gen. Wilkins overruled his objections, thinking it advisable to get all they could, opposed to violent measures, from the different parts of the country. Accordingly, he and Gen. Wilkins were chosen delegates.

"At this period," says Mr. Brackenridge, in his work on the Western insurrection, "there were alarming accounts from the East side of the mountains, of a disposition of the people, similar to that of the West. I saw before me anarchy, a shock to the government, a revolution impregnated with the Jacobin principles of France, and which might become equally bloody to the principal actors. It would be bloody unavoidably to them, and to the people, destructive. Let no man suppose I coveted a revolution; I had seen the evils of one already in the American; and I had read the evils of another, the French. My imagination presented the evils of the last strongly to my view, and brought them so close to a possible experience at home, that during the whole period of the insurrection, I could scarcely bear to cast my eye on a paragraph of French news."

In fact, the laws had been for some time silent, and the ideas and language of the French Revolution had become quite familiar with the disorderly. The only thing like civil authority which seemed to command any respect was that entrusted to Committees. His plan from the first, as had been said, was to withdraw power from the multitude, and place it in a Standing Committee, with which the friends of peace and order could begin to act. The objects which he had proposed to accomplish in going to the meeting at Parkinson's, were, 1st. To resolve that the state laws were in force; the authority of all civil officers to be respected; no violence to be committed by any man on his mere motion, on pain of being denounced by the Committee, as an enemy to the country.* 2nd. That the meeting address the President, setting forth what had been done; praying a suspension of force, and an oblivion of what had passed, under such arrangements as might be obtainable. 3rd. That a Standing Committee of safety be established, as conservators of the peace, in support of the civil authority, and as the organ of negotiation with the Executive on the subject of amnesty, &c."

At Parkinson's ferry, two hundred and sixty delegates assembled, much too large a number, some of the townships having sent four or five. There was a still greater number of persons collected as spectators. Mr. Brackenridge had a consultation with Bradford, Marshall, and other leaders, and affected to advise with the first, in order to be able to manage him, as he and Marshall had various projects of a belligerent nature. Bradford wished to bring forward something like a declaration of war, and Parkinson had a string of resolutions to offer; they were both inclined, however, to reduce the number of the delegation, and in favor of a Standing Committee, which was the main object of Mr. Brackenridge; he also wished to prevent any presentation, but to give ample discretionary powers to the Standing Committee, so as to enable them to negotiate for an amnesty, to which the people at this time were averse, excepting on such terms as the government could not grant. Col. Cook was appointed Chairman, and Albert Gallatin, who then resided in Fayette county, Secretary. Bradford desired Mr. Brackenridge to open the meeting, which he declined; he then rose himself, and as usual, went into a long and violent harangue, in favor of open and hostile opposition to the government, and proposing to lay before the meeting the means of defence, a schedule of arms, men, &c.

Marshall then rose and produced his resolutions. The 1st related to taking citizens from the vicinage to be tried, &c. 2nd. A Standing Committee of — members from each county as a Committee of Safety; to call out the resources of the Western counties, to repel any hostile attempts against the rights of the citizens, or the body of the people.

Gallatin rose to oppose this resolution, or at least the latter part of it. It required no little courage to do it, as it was a favorite one, and he was obliged to do it cautiously. "What right," said he, "have we to suppose that military force will be used against us, and why therefore prepare to resist? If riots have taken place, they are the subjects of judicial cognizance."

Brackenridge saw the danger of entering on this discussion, and instantly affected to oppose Gallatin. He thought it not amiss to have the resolution, although softened in the terms, without altering the substance, such as, "the Committee shall have power to take such measures as the situation of affairs may require;" a Committee of four might model the terms. Marshall acquiesced, and thus the debate and vote were artfully parried. Those in favor of war thought they had succeeded, and sure in a different way; he often kept up the appearance, and sometimes the boasting language which was acceptable to Bradford's party, and opposed Gallatin. Yet he always contrived to bring the proceedings to the same issue." That is, he effected by address that which Gallatin failed to accomplish by direct means. Findlay knew perfectly well that Mr. Brackenridge was compelled by the situation in which he had been placed to assume the appearance of favoring Bradford's party; he knew that Mr. Gallatin was aware of this, and that Mr. Ross was in the secret. His use of the word probably conveys a mean insinuation, which he knew to be false. With respect to the policy of the Pittsburgh Committee and the insurgents, Mr. Ross explicitly declared, "that nothing but the consent of the Pittsburgh people to all these measures could have saved their property from utter destruction."

* He says, "the idea of a Committee had become more formidable than that of a court. It was a new authority, springing from the people's power, and had the force of opinion on its side; the censure of a Committee would render a man infamous."

the more prudent thought the question postponed. The 3rd resolution related to the appointment of a Committee to draw up a memorial to Congress, praying a repeal of the obnoxious laws, &c.; also carried. 4th. A Committee to draw up a statement of the motives and acts of the people, &c. to the Governor of Pennsylvania, and the President. The 5th was a resolution to support the government and laws, with the exception of the excise laws, and taking citizens out of their counties to be tried. Mr. Brackenridge, on this resolution, without supporting or condemning it, spoke at considerable length on the situation of the country, without government or law, and the want of safety to persons or property. Gallatin spoke in favor of the establishment of law, and the conservation of the peace. Notwithstanding the praise bestowed on him by Findlay for the open and direct course which he generally pursued, and with which he unfavorably contrasts that of Mr. Brackenridge, he did not venture to condemn the resistance to the United States' Marshal, or the proscriptions at Pittsburgh, but condemned the destruction of property. "What," said a fiery fellow, "do you blame the burning of Kirkpatrick's barn!" The Secretary was embarrassed, and paused for a moment. "If you had burned him in it, it might have been something, but the barn had done no harm." "Aye—aye—right enough," said the man. Some dissembling, as well as presence of mind, was necessary here; which shows that it is much easier for men to write in the quiet of their closets, than to act in critical scenes like these.

Bradford's schedule of arms, &c. and resolutions, were now brought forward. They were attacked "in front" by Mr. Gallatin. But his success was doubtful. Mr. Brackenridge, who had been out of the circle, returned, and again affected to oppose the Secretary. He said it might not be amiss to talk of these things—hold out the idea of being prepared to fight, in order to render it unnecessary, as a General sometimes displays columns, by way of demonstration; but enough has now been done—let the details be left to the Standing Committee. There was no more said, and the vote was avoided.

The meeting adjourned until the next morning, leaving the Committee, consisting of Brackenridge, Bradford, Gallatin, and Herman Husbands, to model the resolutions. During the night, the cry of the people was for war. The situation of Mr. Brackenridge led to painful reflections on their account, as well as on his own. He felt a desire to save them from the horrors of civil war, and if his plans should fail in accomplishing this, what would become of him? He could not join them; they thought themselves in the right, but he knew they were in the wrong. To become a fugitive emigrant was a most painful alternative; the property he left behind would be sacrificed, and he would have to begin the world anew in some strange country;

perhaps despised for being an emigrant; for those would be more respected, who remained to share the fate, and even the crimes, of their fellow-citizens. He saw no prospect of success in their open resistance, and his feelings revolted at the idea of disturbing the peace and harmony of the Republic, which he had assisted to establish.

The resolutions reported, were 1st, relating to the taking citizens from the vicinage. 2nd. A Standing Committee of deputies from each county. Mr. Brackenridge moved township instead of county, and to fill the blank with the number two. The ostensible object was to have them distributed as conservators of the peace; the real object to scatter them, and by that means give greater power to the smaller Standing or Executive Committee. This was carried. The Standing Committee was then chosen, consisting of twelve, of which Mr. Brackenridge was one. He now offered a resolution, that commissioners be appointed to wait on the President of the United States, with the representatives of the people, and report to the Committee the answer he should give.

It was soon after announced, that commissioners on the part of the government had crossed the mountains—the words of the resolution were then changed—"to meet the commissioners, that have been, or may be appointed by the government, and to report to the Standing Committee." This was also carried, and the blank filled with the number three. It was then proposed to wait until the arrival of the commissioners, as they could not be more than one or two day's journey off. Mr. Brackenridge considered this extremely hazardous to the object in view, as the proposals of the commissioners in the present state of things, would be certain to be rejected. He desired a cooling time, and deliberation; for that purpose, an adjournment was necessary, and an opportunity of operating on the mind of the Standing Committee. Mr. James Ross was now present; he had received his appointment as one of the commissioners, but did not let it be known. Every thing was urged by Gallatin, and some others, in favor of adjournment, and passing the resolution in its present form; but their efforts seemed to be ineffectual, such was the prevailing anxiety and eagerness of curiosity to hear the propositions of the government commission.

Mr. Brackenridge was walking outside of the circle in a desponding mood, when commissioner Ross came to him, and urged him to go forward. "I do not see that I can do any thing; Gallatin and others have said all that is reasonable, and yet have failed." "You can do it," said Ross. He then stepped forward, and knowing that it was the impatience of curiosity which stood in the way, addressed them to the following effect. "It is altogether impossible that the government commissioners can have any thing of importance to propose at this stage of the business. The President has not yet seen our representatives; he does not know our demands. We can only receive these commissioners as a matter of form, or civility; the first step must be taken by us; we can only lay before them what is to be laid before the President; and of course, they must wait for instructions. Our waiting here would therefore be entirely useless. The authority to negotiate, to correspond, &c., must be entrusted to the Standing Committee, for this requires time, and may require caution and dexterity to prevent an advantage being taken of us."

No one spoke after this, and the resolution was passed. A proposal was made to instruct, but this was again parried by observing, that instructions could not be framed without knowing the propositions which might be made by the commissioners. It was agreed that the new meeting of deputies should be at Brownsville, in September; the Standing Committee to fix their own time of meeting.

When he walked out of the circle, he observed to Ross, "I think the point is now gained. There is a basis now laid on which we can act. To this point I have always looked, not expecting commissioners from the government, but propositions from it to commissioners on our part, holding out an amnesty; which I take to be the great secret of composing the disturbance. Until that appeared, the disposition of those involved was to acts of violence to support themselves; and the whole county, conscious that every man has in some degree contributed, by words or actions, to produce this mental opposition to the law, which has terminated in actual force, could not reconcile it to their feelings to abandon those who have acted with precipitation in the late occurrences. But an amnesty being given, these can say to their countrymen, you are now on the same ground with us; stop, we will go no further."

He had no previous consultation with Gallatin, with whom, he was but slightly acquainted; but he took the first occasion to say to him, "I presume, Mr. Gallatin, you understand me." "Perfectly, sir," was the reply. A few days after the last meeting, the commissioners had arrived at Pittsburgh; they were Messrs. Yates, Bradford, (Attorney General,) and Mr. Ross.

Mr. Brackenridge found that there was a strong prepossession in the mind of two of the commissioners against him, and he learned that his conduct had been cruelly misrepresented on the other side of the mountains, (chiefly by persons who had left Pittsburgh,) either from enmity or misapprehension. He was represented as the real leader of the insurrection, and Bradford but a tool in his hands. He was thus placed between two fires; he had run great risk with the people, and was now in greater danger from the government, by which, he was to be denounced as a traitor. He could not refrain from expressing his mortification and chagrin to Ross, who assured him, that as he had been perfectly acquainted with his motives, he would guaranty his safety as respected the government. In the moment of injured feeling, he exclaimed, "it seems that all the thanks I am to receive for the exertions I have made, and the dangers I have encountered, is that I shall be regarded as a traitor; if such be my fate, I may as well join the insurgents in earnest." "By no means," said Ross, "the force of genius is almighty, give them not the aid of yours." In fact, the insurrection would soon have worn a different aspect, under the direction of a man, who, though bred to letters, and having no great relish for the profession of arms, was, like Rienzi, equal to any emergency; and if driven to desperation by injustice, might have led the way to consequences which no one could foretell; for at this moment, when the whole West was attached to the East by a slender tie, Spain and France, with the good will of England, were endeavoring to divide the Union, by making the Alleghany mountains the boundary of a distinct power. But with him these were the thoughts of a moment, and instantly banished from his mind; he was too much of a patriot and philanthropist, to be deluded by the visions of false ambition, and selfish aggrandizement.

On the meeting of the Committee at Pittsburgh, to confer with the commissioners, Mr. Brackenridge took the first opportunity to lay aside the mask he had been compelled to wear. He explained fully and candidly the motives by which he had been actuated, addressed them as men of sense, and pointed out the necessity of accepting the amnesty as speedily as possible, orders having already been issued to assemble the militia on the other side of the mountain; and they were then probably on their march. Gallatin and others, who entertained the same views, made similar representations, and it was found that the Committee was with them, with the exception of Bradford and Marshall, who appeared thunderstruck; "the first looked red and angry; the latter pale and affected." It is highly probable, that they had, by this time, discovered that an amnesty would not reach their case; the riots, in which great numbers had been engaged, might be passed over; but their avowed treasonable designs, and robbery of the mail,—a little project of their own,—could not be so readily forgotten.

Mr. Brackenridge was entrusted by the Committee to draw up a report, and he was desirous to place the case of the people in as strong a light as possible, so as to show that the Committee had made the best of it. But this was objected to by the commissioners, who wished that the question of acceptance or not, of the amnesty, should be placed before the new assemblage of deputies, and for this purpose, hastened their meeting at an earlier day than that fixed upon. The season was advan-

ing, and the President could not delay sending troops. It was besides told him, in confidence, that there was a serious apprehension of a rising in the lower counties, that is, of those on the other side of the mountains, opposed to the excise, unless something was speedily done.

In his report, Brackenridge suggested some reasons which he thought would have weight in inducing the people to accept the terms of the commissioners; but in this, Gallatin differed from him. In his work on the insurrection, he makes some remarks on this head, which are worth repeating here, for their truth and good sense. "No doubt it is the true democratic principle that the will of the majority shall govern; the national will has made the law, and it should be obeyed. However unequal and oppressive it may be in this part of the community, yet the will of the whole required that it should be obeyed. This is an abstract argument, which must satisfy the understanding, but can never reconcile the heart. It is like the theological argument of the divines, that the good of the whole requires that some should be damned, and that a man cannot be a saint until he feels a disposition to be reconciled to the divine will, even if it shall fall to his lot to be doomed to everlasting punishment. A regenerated man may come to this, but a natural man never can. So an enlightened politician may comprehend, and acquiesce in the principle of submission to inequality of burthens, when the nation dooms him to it; but the common mind revolts; and nothing will quiet such a mind, but the consideration that it cannot be helped. My argument, therefore, chiefly contemplated the want of power—sometimes introducing the idea of postponement, &c., and when it was replied to the latter, that the people could never be roused again, my answer was, "I know that, and it was on that principle I suggested it. It was quite safe to talk of another day; for if Satan was once laid, it would be hard to raise him again. The people would begin to look back, and be made sensible of the precipice on which they had been standing. Let the law be put in operation, and they would not find it the evil they conceived it to be."

The deputies, or General Committee, consisting of sixty members, including the Standing Committee, met at Brownsville on the 28th of August. The first thing that occurred, was the bringing before the Committee, under a guard of seventy-men, a Quaker, of the name of Jackson, who had given great offence by calling the assemblage a "Scrub Congress." The people had at first intended to destroy his property, and tar and feather him, but had been persuaded by the more moderate to bring him before the Committee for trial. On this occasion, Mr. Brackenridge gave a proof of his ready address, and showed that wit may sometimes answer a better purpose than sober argument. Affecting to be indignant at the conduct of Jackson, he related to them, with infinite drollery of manner, an anecdote of Oliver Cromwell, perhaps invented for this occasion. "Some one came to Oliver and informed him, that a certain person had had the audacity to say, that the Protector might 'go to the devil.' 'Did he?' said Oliver—'the villain—I'll punish him; go to him and tell him to come and show me the way.' This fellow has called us a Scrub Congress—let him be named Scrub himself, and made to pay for the christening." Peals of laughter followed this sentence, and the Quaker was carried off to receive his punishment, which amounted to a few gallons of whiskey.

The report of Mr. Brackenridge was read. But it appeared that the popular feeling had gone beyond the idea of an amnesty. The people rather thought of giving one—they had expected a suspension of the obnoxious laws, if not a repeal. He saw it would not do to enter upon the business immediately. Findlay, Smiley and others were on the ground, and might prepare the public mind—it was therefore thought prudent to adjourn until next morning. Bradford* and Marshall had become his bitter enemies, and were desirous of holding a caucus with such members as they could operate upon. The situation of Mr. Brackenridge was again perilous, his popularity having once more suffered. Popularity, in such times, is of little value; it is but the turning of the hand, the palm up or down—liable to a sudden fall from the highest pinnacle of favor to the lowest point of obloquy.

The next morning he found the situation of Gallatin and himself rather delicate. During the night great pains had been taken to inflame the minds of the people. With his coadjutor, he was determined to risk the question of amnesty; but with the very unpleasant prospect of being arrested as traitors by the mob, if they failed. It was proposed that Edgar, a Presbyterian elder, and a member of the twelve, who was not so deeply committed, should open the matter; but he declined; it was therefore put on Gallatin. This gentleman occupied the attention of the assembly, and a numerous audience, for some hours, with a speech of great power and eloquence; and was heard with deep attention. Mr. Brackenridge then, at considerable length, went over the ground which had been occupied by Gallatin; placed the arguments in somewhat different lights, and added something new. Gallatin was more didactic; Brackenridge more impassioned;—the first, addressed their patriotism and their reason; the latter, their con-sciences and fears. Both speeches were masterly efforts. They were followed by Edgar, in a kind of sermonizing discourse, but which was replete with good sense, and had its effect on the people, to whose habits it was adapted.

Bradford spoke with violence against accepting the terms of amnesty. "We will defeat the first army that crosses the mountains," said he, "and take their arms and baggage." After he had concluded, Gallatin moved to take the vote—but as only the members of the committee of twelve stood up, it was negatived. Presuming that this proceeded from unwillingness to vote openly, Gallatin proposed the ballot. This was negatived in the same way. Here was a situation. If the vote had not been taken, the proposition would have been lost, and the consequence would have been immediate preparation for war. Bradford would have come forward with his project of arms, &c., in which he had been baffled at Parkinson's, and Gallatin and himself would have been arrested on the spot. Gallatin with great presence of mind, proposed that a vote should be taken by ballot merely to ascertain their own minds, but without intending it as an answer to the Commissioners. After some hesitation, a member proposed that a scrap of paper should be made out by the Secretary, with the words yea and nay written on it, and given to each member, one of which words he could tear off and destroy. This plan was adopted; and on the vote being counted, there were thirty-four in the affirmative, and twenty-three in the negative! The question was now as completely at rest, as if it had been put in the most formal manner.

Bradford became dark and dismayed. The face of things was instantly changed—the more moderate among the numerous spectators were emboldened, and those who had been induced to join the more violent through fear, and from a vague belief of their having a majority, were glad of an opportunity to leave them. When it was moved to adjourn for a few hours, Bradford took his departure, and appeared no more. When they met again, the report was received, and the amnesty virtually accepted. From this moment, the insurrection may be said to have terminated; but the recoil was felt unfortunately by the people, and by those who had been thus active in preventing scenes of blood and destruction. After appointing a new Committee of Twelve, the assembly adjourned.

The 11th of September was the day for signing the amnesty throughout the Western counties, and great pains were taken by influential men to induce the people to accept it. But many of the ill-disposed or infatuated threatened those who were desirous to sign. Bradford had become a convert to the new order, and endeavored to distinguish himself by more than common zeal, but it did not answer his purpose; he lost every thing with his own party, who cried out, "Dagon, how art thou fallen!" Feeling little confidence in this new manoeuvre, he came to the conclusion that his safety lay in flight. Another meeting was held on the 2d of October at Parkinson's Ferry, at which General Wilkins and Mr. Brackenridge were delegates from Pittsburg. Resolutions were passed declaring that law and order were restored; and two persons, Findlay and Reddick, were chosen as delegates to the President, to request that the march of the army, which had by this time assembled, might be stopped. They went on their mission; an account of which is given by Findlay in his history. They joined the army at Carlyle, where they were introduced to the President, who had been there but a short time. Before his arrival, serious disorders had been committed by the troops, a large proportion of whom were hired substitutes, and others, who considered it their duty to put down opposition to the excise laws, looked upon all who were against those laws as traitors, who ought to be hanged without judge or jury. The appearance of a liberty pole was enough to endanger the safety of a whole neighborhood. The delegates themselves, according to Findlay, ran some risk, and were considered as implicated, together with Gallatin and others, who had always openly opposed the insurrection. As for Mr. Brackenridge, he was regarded as worse than Bradford, as in fact the principal, and his life was threatened by several of the officers, as well as by the soldiers. Two persons had been put to death in a most shameful and wanton manner, before the arrival of Washington. The delegates expressed a desire that if the march could not be stopped, the President would command in person. But neither of these requests could be granted. Although the idea of the amnesty is to be attributed to the wisdom and magnanimity of Washington, yet Findlay seems to think that the refusal to stop the march of the army proceeded from his advisers—especially from Hamilton, who, he says, was for seizing the occasion to strengthen the new government by a display of physical force. It would occupy too much space here to discuss the question; but I do not hesitate to say that when we regard the consequences, it was not wise to have ordered the army to continue its march, after the insurrection had been brought to a peaceful termination; after the request of the delegates, and after that of the Governor of Pennsylvania. What did the army effect after it had passed the mountains? Did it meet with opposition, or find a single individual in arms? And was it not guilty of monstrous outrages, which the historians have passed over too lightly? These are related by Mr. Brackenridge and by Findlay, and they cannot be read at this day without astonishment.

The election passed off in the disturbed state of the country, with but little attention. But few attended, and in some districts none voted. It had been reported that Mr. Brackenridge had declined; Gallatin was taken up only a week before the election, and was elected by a few votes over him. There were five other candidates; and there is no doubt Mr. Brackenridge would have been elected, but for the misapprehension, which induced many to vote for Gallatin in his place. Another meeting was held on the 24th of October, at which more than a thousand persons attended, and passed resolutions declaring peace and order restored, and a determination to submit to the excise law; but all in vain; it was determined that the army should be sent forward.

It is stated by Mr. Brackenridge, that, from information on which he placed reliance, the rage of the army against him seemed to increase as it approached. The prejudice existing in the minds of the principal officers, and persons accompanying the army, was too strong to be encountered.

Mr. Ross honorably redeemed his pledge, as far as was in his power, by making a fair representation of his conduct. The very best treatment he could expect, would be to be sent to Philadelphia in irons—to be tried at an expense which would ruin him; for without one or two hundred witnesses, he could not explain his conduct on every occasion. But the greater probability was that he would be assassinated.

Bradford had good reasons to fly; but Brackenridge had none, for he was innocent; he therefore resolved to stay at home, and perish on his own hearth. He put his papers in order, arranged his affairs, and drew up a statement of the principal facts, addressed to Mr. Ross, with a request that he would see that justice was done to his memory. The Judge of the United States of the Pennsylvania district had preceded the army a few days, with the intention of taking civil cognizance of such as might be placed under military arrest. Under what section of the Constitution, or of the judiciary law, this was done, I am not able to say; but at that time, there were many different ways of acting, which we should think strangely of at present; and none more than of the powers then exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the arrest of citizens remaining quietly at home, by the soldiery.

Mr. Ross, at the request of Mr. Brackenridge, waited on Judge Peters, and pledged himself that he would come forward at any moment when he would be required, so that he might not undergo the mortification of an arrest. The first troops that arrived, were those under the command of General Morgan; and the same evening, a party of military ruffians came to Mr. Brackenridge's house for the purpose of assassinating him;—they were only prevented by the interference of their commanding officer, and of Colonel Neville, who arrived just in time to prevent the perpetration of the deed.

Such was the rooted prejudice which had been conceived by persons, who ought to have leaned to the side of innocence, that even after the examination of Mr. Ross, who entirely acquitted Mr. Brackenridge, they still persisted in considering him as the chief insurgent. They were desirous of aiming at a shining mark, and to avoid having any thing to do with common culprits. They were staggered, however, by the examination of the gentleman just mentioned, and some doubts began to be entertained. A letter written by Mr. Brackenridge to Bradford, was now produced, very dark and mysterious; it spoke of a duplicate—hinted at some papers, &c. What do you think of this, Mr. Ross? Certainly very mysterious—but it happens to be addressed to William Bradford, Attorney General, who can probably explain. “Gentlemen,” said Alexander Hamilton, “you are going too fast in this business.”

In the meantime Mr. Brackenridge expected every moment to be arrested, and lay several nights on a couch ready to be taken at a moment's warning; for it seems that these arrests, for what reason it is difficult to say, generally took place in the dead hour of night. His sensibility was deeply touched; and he experienced a return of a nervous affection, brought on in youth by great application to study. In the meantime General Lee had arrived; he came directly to Mr. Brackenridge's house; it having been chosen by the quarter-master on account of being large and commodious, and without consulting the owner. A very awkward and painful recognition took place, as General Lee (not the European of that name who has been mentioned heretofore,) had been a junior scholar at Princeton, and occasionally placed under his tuition. Lee changed his quarters in a few days; and Mr. Brackenridge, about the same time, was served with a subpoena to appear before the examiners as a witness. He knew that this was only a mode of arrest, and that if he did not exculpate himself, the arrest would follow; and this depended very much into whose hands he might fall in order to be examined. The task was undertaken by Secretary Hamilton, who was to all intents and purposes the Commander-in-Chief, representing the civil and military power of Washington. This may seem strange; but it was the fact; and it was fortunate for Mr. Brackenridge—he at least had no right to complain, for he was treated by Hamilton in a manner at once just and magnanimous, considering that he was approached only by the most violent enemies, who lost no opportunity of misrepresenting all his actions and motives, and in exciting the most injurious prejudices against him.

The examination having commenced, he proceeded to dictate to Secretary Hamilton. After writing an hour or two, the Secretary stopped, and said—“I observe one leading trait in your account, a disposition to excuse the principal actors; and before we go further, I must be candid and inform you of the delicate situation in which you stand—you are not within the amnesty—you have not signed on the day;* a thing we did not know until we came upon the ground; and although the government may not be disposed to act rigorously, yet it has you in its power, and it will depend on the candor of your account what your fate will be."

To this Mr. Brackenridge promptly answered—"I know, sir, I am not within the amnesty, and am sensible of the power of the government; but if my narrative were to begin again, I would not change a single word." The dispassionate mind, at this day, cannot hesitate in deciding which of these persons appeared on this occasion in the most exalted character! When the Secretary came to the part which relates to the going to the Mingo meeting, at the instance of the Inspector, or rather of his son, he appeared surprised; and it was evident that this fact had been concealed from him. He stopped writing, and appointed an hour for continuing it in the afternoon. It is probable he made some inquiry of Col. Neville, (recently returned with the army,) with whom he dined. This gentleman had once been on very friendly terms with Mr. Brackenridge; but from causes which it is unnecessary to inquire into, had of late united with his enemies; but he was a man of humane and generous feelings, and when directly appealed to, would speak as became a man of honor. On the return of the Secretary, he immediately said, "Mr. Brackenridge, your conduct has been most horribly misrepresented."

The examination continued during that and part of the next day. At its conclusion, the Secretary expressed himself in the following terms: "In the course of yesterday, I had uneasy feelings. I was concerned for you, as for a man of talents; my impressions were unfavorable: you may have observed it. I now think it is my duty to inform you, that not a single one remains. Had we listened to some people, I do not know what might have been done. There is a side to your account; your conduct has been horribly misrepresented, owing to misconception. I will announce you in this point to General Lee, who represents the Executive. You are in no personal danger. You will not be troubled, even by a simple inquisition, by the Judge; what may be due to yourself with the public, is another question."

* There is too much truth in the following remarks of Findlay: "If Mr. Brackenridge, who had conducted with such address, in a situation which rendered it necessary for him to temporize, that he knew he was in no danger from the usual mode of process, but he also knew that the power of the government, with which he was threatened, conveyed another idea. If such powerful addresses were made to the hopes and fears of Mr. Brackenridge, who from his profession was able to judge of his situation, what may we not expect was done with such ignorant people as did not know what part of their conduct or expressions might be deemed criminal!"

It were unnecessary to say that this acquittal was gratifying to the subject of it. "In so delicate a case," says he, "where life had been sought by insidious men; and where, what I felt most sensibly, my hopes of estimation in the world were likely to be blasted, at least for a time, it may easily be supposed that no word escaped me, or will ever be forgotten." And thus, in this free country, and under this government of laws, the person whose patriotism and consummate ability entitled him to the mural crown, considered himself but too happy to escape without the ruin of his estate, and perhaps an ignominious death. Once he was saved with difficulty from assassination; and on another occasion, a pistol was presented to his breast—but as he did not flinch, the ruffian turned away, declaring that he believed him, after all, a very clever fellow.*

The arrests began in the night of the 9th of November, with the greater part of innocent or meritorious persons; but on the 13th, during a most inclement season, nearly three hundred were dragged from their beds, and driven through streams, over muddy roads, and penned up in stables like cattle! From an awkward mistake in the lists made out, those intended for witnesses were not distinguished from the supposed criminals; many were so seriously injured, that they never recovered their health. The end of all this, was two or three convictions of poor obscure men, who were afterwards pardoned; and what is curious enough, according to the doctrine of treason, established by Marshall in the case of Burr, no treason had been committed: for the treasonable projects, even of Bradford and Marshall, were not followed by any overt act of treason. There had been riots, disorderly conduct, robbery of the mail, but no act with the view of subverting the government. There was nothing but constructive treason, which is now regarded as odious.

The extraordinary outrages of the 13th of November, were long kept in remembrance by the people of the West, and familiarly known as the dreadful night. It must not be said that we have made no progress in the principles of liberty. Such scenes could not take place in our time, without exciting feelings of horror and universal indignation. Even in England, such wholesale arrests would more properly belong to the times of Charles II, than to any subsequent period.

At the close of the insurrection, the popularity

* The insubordination of the army as it was called, may excite surprise. There were many honorable exceptions, such as Captain Dunlap's troop, and some others—but the greater part was little better than a mob. Take the following related by Findlay: "On one or two occasions, when some foolish men who mixed with that wing being in danger, General Morgan pretending to reserve them for an ignominious punishment, saved them, till they could be safely dismissed, or kept his men from killing them himself." This looks more like temporising with a mob, than commanding an army!

of Brackenridge rose again, even higher than it had been before. Those who had looked upon him as a traitor to the whiskey cause, now sympathized with him, when they saw the treatment he had met with from the army; while the important services he had rendered the country were admitted by all but his personal enemies, and a few whose prejudices were immovable. He now set about the task suggested by Alexander Hamilton, of defending his reputation before the bar of public opinion. He addressed circular letters to a number of the most distinguished individuals of the Western counties, whose opportunities enabled them to speak from their own knowledge of his conduct. Among them are the names of James Ross, Alexander Addison, Judge of the district, Henry Purviance, David Reddick, General John Wilkins, John Hoge, and many others, who all concurred in completely exonerating him from all censure, and in applauding the course pursued by him.*

Not satisfied with this, he published an octavo volume, entitled "Incidents of the Western Insurrection," written with uncommon vigor of style, and replete with graphic descriptions of scenes and incidents. As a vindication, it was unanswered, and unanswerable. Its republication, however, would require some things to be struck out, which bear severely upon individuals, as it would answer no good purpose to perpetuate them; and it is possible that there may have been some misconception in his mind towards them, as there was in theirs towards him, but productive of different effects; in the latter case, endangering life and reputation; in the former, bringing down the lash of invective and ridicule. In reply to some of those who affected to speak with contempt of the Western people, for their cowardice in making so mean a resistance—the same persons having previously denounced them on the other side of the mountains as traitors for taking up arms against the government—he uses this language: "I have seen the waves when they were calm, and I have wondered that they could ever be wrought into a tempest to shipwreck navies. Let my fellow-citizens

* "I saw many alarmed and anxious for the safety of their country, and for the reestablishment of the government, and who expressed an abhorrence of all that was doing. I thought none of them more seriously so than yourself."—James Ross.

"My opinion of the whole of your conduct throughout the insurrection in this county, I will give without reserve. It appeared to me to have two objects; to arrest the progress of the present violence, and to procure an amnesty for that already committed, and thus prevent the flame from spreading beyond the county in which it originated."—Henry Purviance.

"It is impossible for me, without erasing all my impressions of your character and conduct, to suppose that you ever advised or countenanced any illegal opposition to the excise law."—Alexander Addison.

"I had daily opportunities of observing your conduct, and conversing with you. I never had a doubt, but that you were influenced by the purest motives, and was anxious for the restoration of order and the laws."—John Wilkins.

The foregoing extracts are deemed sufficient for this place.

on the East of the mountains be happy, as I am, that they met with no resistance. The rage of the forest would have been more awful than its solitude. Be not offended that I am partial to the spirit of these people; they are ourselves; you had them for your compatriots against a common foe; and I will pledge myself, they will not disgrace you in any enterprise, for the glory of our Republic, however daring and hazardous it may be."

"I have now finished the detail I had in view. That my information may not have been correct in all cases; that my memory may have led me into error; that my imagination may have colored facts, is possible; but that I have deviated from the strictness of truth, knowingly, is what I will not admit. That I have been under the painful necessity of giving touches which may affect the feelings of some persons, is evident. But it has been with all the delicacy in my power, consistent with doing justice to myself. If I have done them injustice, they have the same, with me, in their power, an appeal to the public. This is the great and respectable tribunal at whose bar I stand; for, though I have not been arraigned at the bar of a court of justice, yet from the first moment of obloquy against me, I have considered myself an arrested man, and put upon my country. From that day the morning sun shone to me less bright; the light of night has been more obscure; the human countenance presented nothing but suspicion; the voice of man hurt me; I almost hated life itself. For who can say that I have pursued riches?—who can say I have been a devotee of pleasure? What have I, if I lose the hope of estimation? Was I traitor to my country? Was I traitor to that class of men with whom I stand on equality in point of education and cultivated intellect? Would I disgrace the praise of science and enlightened reading, who am taught to know, that virtue is glory; and benevolence and truth, that alone which can assimilate with the divine nature? And what greater deviation from virtue than to disturb the settled order of government, while that government remains republican? And who ever touches it with any other view than that of salutary and regular reform, deserves the anathema of the people."

From this time Mr. Brackenridge was considered the man of the people, but devoting himself to the profession of which he stood at the head. Two years after the insurrection, he published the first volume of Modern Chivalry, in which many traces of those times may be discovered. His object was to write something that would indoctrinate the people themselves on the subject of government, and correct those errors into which their almost boundless state of freedom would be apt to lead them. Dry dissertations, like those of Montesquieu and others, would do for the learned, but would not be read by one in ten thousand of the people. He, at first, thought of a form like Butler's Hudibras—but concluding that this would not be so likely to be read as prose, he determined to try the plan of Cervantes in his Don Quixotte. His hero, Capt. Farrago, is however no madman, but simply an eccentric. He found it difficult to supply the place of Sancho, and had recourse to a Milesian Irishman of the lower order, of the Thady or Paddy-from-Cork species. The character is certainly not so successful as that of Sancho; but there is much humor in it; and it answered his purpose better than any he could find of American original. His Scotchman, Duncan Ferguson, is better sustained, and more natural. Modern Chivalry is a profound philosophical and political work, under the guise of pleasantry. It is wonderful what a variety of topics is touched, in the most compendious way, and admirably adapted to form the people to the true principles of a democratic republic.

He was one of the most active and efficient, in bringing about the revolution of party in the year 1800. On the election of Governor, Mr. McKean, he was appointed one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the State; which place he continued to fill during sixteen years, until his death in 1816; and of him, it might truly be said, "when a learned man dieth, much learning dieth with him." Few persons who have risen to distinction in this country, combined in themselves a greater variety of brilliant qualities. He possessed wit, great acquirements on all subjects, sound judgment, and extraordinary powers of eloquence. Numerous anecdotes are related of, and many sayings attributed to him, some of them of doubtful authenticity. His wit was rather delicate irony, than broad humor—and always employed as the means of conveying some important truth, or correcting something wrong. His style is remarkable for its transparency, presenting the idea almost naked to the mind; so that one in perusing his page, may fancy that he is merely pursuing a train of thought of his own, instead of tracing the words and sentences of another. Originality was the peculiar characteristic of his mind. His compositions were generally dictated to an amanuensis, and even the punctuation was attended to as he went along. His opinions on the bench bear the stamp of strict integrity, and the most perfect independence. They are generally clear and concise, unencumbered by authorities, usually ascending to first principles, and in consequence they have been increasing in reputation.

Such was Hugh Henry Brackenridge, a man but imperfectly appreciated in his own day, because like others of an original cast of intellect, he was ahead of the age; but whose fame is destined to increase, as it becomes more removed from the times in which he lived.

THE LATE BISHOP MOORE.

It is not our habit to insert in the Messenger obituary notices of even the distinguished dead; but there was something so singularly endearing in the character of the late Richard Channing Moore, the lamented Bishop of the Episcopal Church in this State; he was so universally beloved, not only in this community, but in truth, in every part of the country where he was known;—the "elements were so mixed up in him," and he presented so rare a combination of apostolic excellence, with the qualities which secure mere human popularity,—that, for once, at least, we must be excused for deviating from our usual rule. The following biographical sketch of the venerable deceased has been already published extensively, we believe, by the newspaper press. It is from the pen of his late parochial assistant, the Rev. Mr. Norwood of this city,—than whom no one could have enjoyed better opportunities of knowing and appreciating the merits of the lamented Bishop, and few certainly possess superior qualifications for exhibiting his bright and shining example to the imitation of the present and future generations. We desire to preserve this faithful tribute to a good and holy man, in a more enduring form than the columns of the newspaper press. It will be read long after the fleeting subjects of the day shall have passed into oblivion, because it suggests a train of feeling and reflection of a far more exalted character than the perishing things of time.—[Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.

Sketch of the Life and Character of Bishop Moore.

The first ancestor of Richard Channing Moore, the late Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia, of whom there is any thing known, was Sir John Moore, whose family seat was Frawley, in Berkshire. This gentleman was knighted by Charles I, of England, on the 21st of May, 1627, two years after he came to the throne. He lost both his estate and life in the revolution which ended in the execution of that unfortunate King. The motto of his coat of arms was "Nihil utile quod non honestum." Of the descendants of Sir John Moore little is known, until we come to John Moore, the grandfather of our lamented Bishop, three of whose brothers were distinguished as well as himself. One of them was the Rev. Dr. Thomas Moore, chaplain to the celebrated scholar and Bishop of Rochester, Dr. Atterbury, whose sermons he published. He died Rector of Little Britain, in London, leaving a highly respectable family; among whom were Thomas Moore, D.D., Rector of North Bray, in Kent, and the Rev. Dr. Charles Smyth, whose sermons were published in England in 1822, and are highly esteemed. Another of the brothers of John Moore, was Daniel Moore, a gentleman of large estate, who was a member of Parliament for many years, whose daughter married Lord Chancellor Erskine. Another of the brothers was William Moore, of Moore Hall, Pennsylvania, who left a highly respectable family. One of his daughters was married to the Rev. Dr. William Smith, a preacher of Philadelphia, and formerly President of the University of Pennsylvania. John Moore, the brother with whom our narrative has to do, being the grandfather of the Bishop, was an eminent merchant of New-York, in colonial times. He was an Alderman of that city; for many years a member of the Legislature; and at the time of his death, Colonel of one of the New-York regiments, and a member of the King's council for the province. He was born in 1686, and died in 1749, at 63 years of age. He was the first person buried in Trinity Church-yard; and the title of the family vault was in Bishop Moore at his death.

Mr. John Moore married Frances Lambert, and was blest through her with eighteen children, among whom were three pairs of twins. The descendants of Mr. Moore married into the Bayard, Livingston, Hoffman, Onderdonk, Bailey, Tredwell and Rogers' families, which are among the most respectable families of the North.

Stephen, the seventeenth child, owned West Point, which he sold to the United States, and removed to North Carolina. Upon the invasion of the Southern States by the British in 1779, he commanded a regiment of North Carolina militia. He was afterwards taken prisoner at the first battle of Camden. Being exchanged, he returned to his beautiful seat, Mount Tirza, in North Carolina, where he died, leaving in that State a highly respectable family.

The seventh of the thirteen sons of John Moore, was Lambert, the father of Bishop Moore. He was born in 1722—was sent to England for education, and was bred a scholar in Westminster school. At twenty-one years of age he returned to his native country, and settled in that part of the State of New-York which was called the neutral ground. Here he lost all his property amidst the devastation and plunder which desolated that part of the country. His house, at West Point, where he resided during the early part of the Revolutionary War, was plundered by the Hessians, when the British took the posts of the Highlands, and his family was turned out of doors in a destitute condition. He removed thence to the city of New-York, where he obtained an appointment in the Customs, and lived in comfort until the conclusion of the war. After this event, he removed to his brother John's, in Norwich, Connecticut, where he died of a pulmonary disease, on the 19th of June, 1784, in the communion of the church. In the Spring of 1785, his remains were removed to New-York, and deposited in the family vault, in Trinity Church-yard, by his son, the late Bishop of Virginia, who then resided in that city.

Elizabeth Channing, the mother of Bishop Moore, was descended of a highly respectable family. Being left an orphan at two years of age, she was brought up in the family of her uncle, John Pintard, Esq., one of the Aldermen of New-York. She was an accomplished lady, having received the best education which New-York afforded, and was highly esteemed in the best society of her native city. She was polished in her manners, of the most amiable disposition, and exemplary piety, and was remarkable for sound judgment and strong good sense. To the early religious instructions, the prayers, and lovely and pious example of this exemplary Christian mother, Bishop Moore often delighted to revert, with tears of gratitude in his eyes, and a bosom swelling with filial affection and reverence. To her early nurture and admonition in the Lord, he ascribed under God all his happiness and usefulness in this world, and his hopes of a blessed immortality in the next. She entered upon her eternal rest at his house on Staten Island, on the 7th of December, 1805, in the 78th year of her age.

Of the eleven brothers and sisters of Bishop Moore, our limits will allow us only to say, that they were all honorably connected in marriage, were respectable, virtuous and useful.

Richard Channing Moore, the late Bishop of Virginia, was born in the city of New-York, on the 21st of August, 1762. He received a liberal education, and was bred a physician; but after practising medicine for several years, in 1787, he resolved to devote himself to the ministry of the Gospel of Christ, and was ordained by Bishop Provoost in New-York. The first two years of his ministry were spent at Rye, in the county of West Chester, most acceptably to the congregation among whom he labored, and usefully for the church at whose altar he ministered. Thence he was called to a wider field of labor by the congregation of St. Andrew's Church, at Richmond, on Staten Island.

Here Dr. Moore labored for twenty-one years with eminent success. His faithfulness in all the departments of ministerial duty, his zeal in the advancement of true religion, his love of his Divine Master and of his work, his unaffected love of all men, his amenity of manners and entire freedom from spiritual pride and all moroseness in his theological views, gave him not only an unbounded popularity among his people, but won for him their warm admiration and sincere attachment. The fruits of such labors, and of such a Christian character, were soon abundantly manifested. The bounds of his Parish were greatly enlarged, his congregation soon overflowed, and it became necessary to enlarge his church edifice. The number of his communicants rapidly increased, and the standard of their piety was much elevated. Even after a large addition to the sittings of his church, it soon became necessary to make still further provision for the numbers who flocked to his ministry, and the Chapel of Ease was provided six miles distant from the Parish Church. During his attendance upon the late General Convention, in October last, the writer of this sketch visited this scene of the early labors of his venerated and beloved friend. It was grateful to every good feeling of the heart to witness the ardent love and unaffected veneration for their old pastor, which were still cherished and remained enshrined in the hearts of his former parishioners and their children. It was delightful to address, in the two beautiful churches of the Parish, large congregations of zealous worshippers of Almighty God, and to see the son of this venerable man, who had, in his earliest manhood, and immediately after his admission to Holy Orders, succeeded his father in this interesting charge, now himself more than fifty years of age, and honored with the title of Doctor of Divinity, after a useful and successful ministry of thirty-two years, still occupying the post of his father's duties, and walking in the steps of that good old man, as a faithful and beloved Shepherd of Christ's Flock. The Bishop loved, in his social intercourse with his friends, to revert to this scene of his former ministry—to talk of those zealous members of his congregation, who were wont to hold up his hands in his arduous duties, and to recount the many evidences of his Heavenly Father's goodness, then vouchsafed to him. The reader will pardon me for here introducing one or two of the many anecdotes which I have heard him relate: It pleased God at one time eminently to bless his labors, by an unusual influence of Divine Grace among his people. There was a true revival of Religion—the work of God's spirit, and not the ephemeral effect of those hot-bed contrivances and human devices, which have, with pernicious consequences, so often been resorted to for doing that work which the Holy Spirit only can really effect. Within a few weeks, more than sixty persons were added to the list of his communicants. During the prevalence of this happy state of religious feeling, Dr. Moore went to officiate in the chapel where he regularly performed divine service in the afternoon. After the services and sermon, the blessing was pronounced; but, instead of the usual business of a retiring congregation, entire stillness pervaded the assembly, interrupted only by suppressed sobs. A church-warden arose and said, "Dr. Moore, the people are not satisfied: they desire more of the bread of life; will you not preach again?" Hastily selecting a portion of Scripture during the singing of a hymn, he again preached an extempore discourse of the usual length and pronounced the benediction; but all was quiet; and again this people, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, asked and received in a third sermon heavenly food from their shepherd's hands. The afternoon by this time being far spent, and the strength even of this able laborer having been exhausted, he was obliged to entreat the enchain'd throng to depart to their homes. Such an instance may in vain be searched for since apostolic times.

On another occasion, the Doctor was invited to meet a company of highly esteemed friends at dinner. Just as he was getting into his gig, a messenger arrived from a distant part of the island, requesting him to visit a very poor communicant who was dangerously ill. Obedient to the call of duty, he relinquished his proposed pleasure, but still with some reluctance, wishing the call of duty had not been made, and almost inclined to delay it until the morrow. When arrived at the humble cottage, he was unusually successful in imparting the consolations of Religion, and succeeded in quieting the fears and animating the hopes of his humble friend. As he knelt on the dirt floor, the Grace of God warmed his affections, and with unwonted fervor he poured forth his supplications for the dying Christian before the Throne of their common Father and God. As he returned home late in the evening, with his own faith strengthened, and his Christian graces enlivened, he wept at the thoughts of the reluctance with which he had gone to so delightful a duty, and was humbled under a sense of his ingratitude to that merciful God, who had thus by his very kindness rebuked him. That night his sick friend died full of peace and hope. The Bishop continued to his death to look back to that evening, spent in the dying Christian's chamber, as perhaps the happiest of his life; and he learned from the occurrence a lesson which he did not forget, never under any circumstances to postpone duty to pleasure.

In 1809, Dr. Moore was called by God's providence to a still more important sphere of usefulness in St. Stephen's Church in the city of New-York. Here he continued five years. His labors were very great; but neither the strength of his fine constitution nor the ardor of his zeal failed, and he was again, as on Staten Island, richly rewarded for all his toils by the abundant bestowment of God's blessing on the work of his ministry. He found a small congregation, and only about thirty communicants. After a short ministry of five years, he left a crowded church and between four and five hundred communicants. There is, I believe, to this day, in St. Stephen's Church an honorable monument to the zeal and efficiency of his ministry while there. When the whole church had become crowded, every pew, not only in the body of the church, but also in the galleries being occupied, a gentleman called on the Rector and applied for a pew: there is none, was the reply. Will you permit me to build one? was the answer. Where? said the Doctor. There, over the gallery against the wall, said the persevering applicant. But how will you obtain access to it? said the Doctor. By cutting a small door in the wall, and building a private stairway outside of the church, said the zealous man; and there, I understand, high up against the wall, is that pew to this day, a lasting memorial of pastoral zeal, fidelity and eloquence, such as few Ministers of Christ are cheered by.

The next important change which occurred in the life of Dr. Moore, was his call to the Rectorship of the Monumental Church at Richmond, and to the Episcopate of Virginia. These events occurred in the Spring of 1814. The peculiar history of the church of which he now became Rector, is too well known to require more than the remark, that it was built upon the site of the old theatre—the burning of which had caused the death of more than a hundred persons, and involved Richmond in the deepest distress. Entering upon his charge at so favorable a time, for a serious consideration of the claims of religion, his zealous labors were soon rewarded by a full church, and rapidly increasing communion.

But the superior importance of the subject must withdraw our attention, for a time, from his parochial to his Episcopal character. Never was there a man more happily constituted for the peculiar work assigned him, by the Divine Head of the church, than was Bishop Moore for the trying duties of Diocesan of Virginia, at the period when he entered upon that sacred office. The Episcopal Church, in this State, then labored under accumulated difficulties. The evils which grew out of the colonial system of ecclesiastical affairs, were still felt. The want of Episcopal supervision, of the administration of the Episcopal functions, and of the restraining influence and discipline of executive control, had greatly retarded the prosperity of the infant church. She had not the benefit of her own ecclesiastical government, and was too far removed from her distant mother to be much benefited by the connection which was still maintained, or much restrained by a ruling power so far distant, and consequently so inefficiently exercised. Without an executive head, there was no sufficient restraint laid upon her ministers. Orthodoxy in doctrine, and piety and morality of life, among those who were the spiritual guides and examples of the people, could only be enforced, when needed, by an impeachment on the other side of the ocean, before the Bishop of London, who was the ecclesiastical head of the colonial churches. This, owing to the invidiousness of the office of accuser, the distance of the tribunal, the expense of the voyage, and the delay of justice, was rarely done. The colonies, in consequence, became the last resort of some of those bad men, who, in all ages and churches, will intrude into the holy office, and who feared the discipline of the church at home. Others, who from inefficiency, could not find desirable cures in the mother country, easily obtained situations, in a rapidly growing community, where ministers were greatly needed. From the operation of these causes, the colonial church in Virginia long labored under the infliction of the inefficiency, immorality, and want of piety of some in her ministry. The disastrous influences of this great evil were widely felt. The confidence and attachment of the people were, in a great degree, weaned from their spiritual guides. The efforts of the good and zealous were much thwarted by the counteracting influence of evils, which there was no power in the defective system of church government to eradicate. At this critical juncture came on the American Revolution. The strong prejudices which were excited by this great event against a church, which was then connected with the oppressive government of England,—the jealousy which was aroused in the dissenting denominations in consequence of the possession by the church of valuable glebe lands—the dispersion of most of her ministers—and the zealous efforts of her enemies in the use of all these means of injuring her, when added to the sore evils under which she had before groaned, constituted a burden too heavy for her strength, and she sunk to the dust. An extended population being thus deprived in a great degree of their religious teachers and of moral restraints, and exposed during many years to all the distracting and demoralizing influences of war, presented, after the protracted troubles were over, an inviting field for that subtle system of infidelity, which was introduced from France, and was zealously, and too successfully, disseminated by men of high standing and talent. Added to the baleful influence of this demoralizing system, those who undertook, under God, the arduous task of reviving the church in Virginia, had to operate on the minds of a high-minded people, long unaccustomed to the restraints of religion. Thus infidelity, immorality, repugnance to restraint, and inveterate prejudices against the Episcopal Church, produced fearful difficulties in the way of a revival of the church. This great work, however, was begun by a little band of faithful men, who trusted in God's promise, that "the gates of hell should not prevail against his church." Still, at the time of Bishop Moore's arrival, the evils above-mentioned were widely prevalent. He seemed to have been raised up by Divine Providence to guide the church successfully through these difficulties. He entered upon the arduous task at fifty-two years of age, though with all the vigor, animation and zeal of youth. His evangelical system of doctrine, his pure and beautiful style of preaching, the tenderness and pathos of his appeals, the gracefulness and eloquence of his delivery, aided by a venerable form, a countenance beaming with benevolence, and a heart glowing with love, rendered him to all an acceptable preacher.

In his visitations through his new diocese, crowds everywhere assembled to hear him; and charmed by the man, many went away disarmed of their prejudices against his office and his church. His gentle and conciliating manner of pleading the claims of the church of their fathers, soon awakened in many families an attachment which had slumbered, but had never become extinct. The mild, forbearing and parental manner in which he exercised the power of his office, won the hearts of his ministry. His widely spread reputation for piety and zeal, soon drew to his diocese a large accession of efficient clergy. His faithful inculcation of true religion elevated the tone of piety in the church, and secured the confidence of the community. In his private and social intercourse with the families of the church, their Bishop won all hearts. To the courteous and graceful manners of a well-bred gentleman, he added a singularly pleasing amenity. He was kind to all, for he loved all. His benevolence overflowed towards all mankind. His venerable appearance, and countenance beaming with love, disarmed enmity; his sprightly and entertaining conversation attracted old and young to his society. He presented religion to view in all her most pleasing and attractive graces. More austerity of manners would have failed to win back hearts long alienated from the church. Greater sternness in the exercise of his authority, would have strengthened and perpetuated the prejudices entertained towards his office. But he seemed to have been happily endowed with the very qualities as a man, a christian and a bishop, which peculiarly fitted him for the exigencies of the church, when he entered upon the duties of her chief Shepherd. Having guided the church committed by the Great Shepherd to his care, safely through her early difficulties, having witnessed the rebuilding of her fallen edifices, the extensive revival of true religion through all her borders, the return of her formerly alienated children to her bosom, a rapidly increasing attachment to her excellencies, a fast growing esteem and respect even among those without her communion, he well deserves for her sake, as well as for his own virtues, the love and reverence of all who love the church of God. Truly, God has blest his labors, and those of the godly man who has aided him of late years in the Episcopal office. When he came to the Episcopate of Virginia, there were in the Diocese only four or five actively laboring ministers—now there are about ninety-five, most of whom minister zealously at the sacred altar. Never, probably, was there a Bishop more universally popular, and more ardently loved by his ministers and all the members of the church under his episcopal charge.

But it is in his parochial character, as Rector of the Monumental Church congregation, that he is best known and most beloved in Richmond. His pastoral labors here, for twenty-seven years, have exceedingly endeared him to his congregation. Gentle, amiable, kind and courteous, with a heart full to overflowing with benevolence, with a charity which included in the wide circle of his affection all the lost world for whom the Redeemer died—always under the influence of the most kindly feeling for all men, and the tenderest sympathy for the afflicted, he associated with his people as their spiritual father and guide. He delighted in the Gospel; Christ crucified was his constant theme, and he loved especially to dwell in his preaching on the bright and cheering topics of christianity. The mercy of God, the tender and kind invitations of the Saviour, the soothing consolations of Religion, and its glorious hopes, constituted the burthen of his preaching; and when set forth with great animation, the most moving pathos, in an eloquent style of composition, aided by a delightful voice and fine manner, gave to his preaching a peculiar charm which all appreciated. He dearly loved the Liturgy of the church; and as in its eloquent and holy strains he presented to God the prayers and praises of his people, he often wept. Love to God and love to man dwelt in his bosom and pervaded his conversation and sermons. He could seldom speak of the dying love of Christ without tears; and, like the beloved Apostle, whom Jesus most loved, and whom he greatly resembled in character, the prevailing sentiment of this aged Minister of Christ during his latter years was, "little children, love one another." O! that his bereaved people may remember and obey this godly admonition. They all love him, and well they may; for there are few of the younger part of them whom he did not receive in those arms now cold and stiff in death, and at the baptismal font dedicate them to God's service, and admit them into the church of Christ, and make them heirs of all the precious promises of the Christian Covenant. O! that they may never forget the obligations then assumed for them, and that they may not, by failure to comply with the conditions of salvation, forfeit that rich inheritance, the title to which was then bestowed upon them. Most of those of his flock, who now mourn his loss, also had their earthly happiness cemented by him in holy matrimony. The large body of communicants now worshipping in the Monumental Church, were all, with very few exceptions, admitted to that sacred means of grace by the imposition of his hands in the apostolic and beautiful rite of confirmation. Often have they assembled around that chancel, before which his venerated remains so lately lay cold in the embrace of death, and seen that much loved form instinct with life, within their kneeling circle, and heard that gentle and dear voice, now silent forever, invite them in the most affectionate tones to the spiritual feast of their Lord, and receive from his hands the emblems of the crucified body and shed blood of their dying Redeemer. Brethren, let the memory of these consecrated scenes of the communion of saints never fade from your minds, and never forget the faithful teaching of this godly old man. Few among you, who so lately followed this beloved pastor to his last resting-place on earth, have not been led by him to that city of the dead, where his dust will lie, until summoned on the resurrection morn by the archangel's trump, to a new and eternal life; you have there seen him commit your loved ones to the grave in the solemn service of your church, and with the trembling accents of the deepest sympathy and tenderest love. Remember, also, those solemn scenes—and O, prepare to follow them to the tomb, and him to the bliss of Heaven! He loved social and friendly intercourse with his people, and all have enjoyed his sprightly and cheerful conversations, and heard his fatherly advice and spiritual encouragement around their firesides.

Never did the writer, whose opportunities of observation have been constant, during the last five years, know a minister who equalled Bishop Moore, in the kindness, frequency and efficacy of his attentions to the sick and the afflicted. The gentleness and kindness of his manner, the depth of his sympathy, the soothing character of his conversation, his happy and tender mode of presenting the consolations of the Gospel, all accompanied by prayers of the most appropriate character, and of remarkable fervor, rendered this department of his parochial duties eminently pleasing and useful. Truly did he love his dear people, as he was wont to call them: he was the friend of them all. How often has the writer heard him mourn over those of them who are impenitent, seen him weep for them, and heard his ejaculatory prayers ascend to God on their behalf! How often has he seen him bear the communicants of his flock in his heart, and on his lips, to the throne of Grace, and pray God to strengthen their faith, and confirm them in all christian graces, and in all good works.

Who can withhold the tribute of admiration for such a character—who would desire a more enviable lot than his? Enjoying for fifty-four years the high privilege of declaring the glad tidings of the Gospel to ransomed sinners—beloved by all, eminently successful both in his ministry and in his Episcopate, without enemies, his death has been like his life, gentle, calm, full of love and hope and peace. Let it be repeated, he had no enemies, for he was just and upright in all his dealings; he had a tender regard for the reputation and feelings of all, and never spoke evil of any; and who could cherish aught but love and reverence for one so full of love to all? The citizens of Richmond loved to see his venerable form and benevolent face as he walked the streets. His best eulogium is the love and veneration of the whole population of Richmond—the tears of the immense assembly that thronged the church at his funeral; yes, of all, old men and matrons, young men and maidens and children. Who can forget the sobe which were heard throughout that vast crowd? Who was not impressed by the unparalleled multitudes which swelled his far-lengthened funeral procession?

To crown so lovely a life, God awarded him a death such as is granted to but few of his ministers. He enjoyed all the real blessings of life to the last; with unusual physical strength, and mental faculties but little impaired, except his memory, he continued his duties even to the end. Two days only before the last visitation on which he died, he officiated and preached at a funeral. His address was extempore, and such was his energy, animation and fervor, and such the influence of his exhortation, that an old christian of another christian society, said "surely this must be his last, last message to Richmond." It was so; two days after he obeyed the call of duty, and commenced, in his 80th year, a journey of one hundred and fifty miles, to Lynchburg, to perform Episcopal functions. He arrived in Lynchburg on Thursday, the 5th of November. On Friday, he attended Divine service in the forenoon—in the afternoon he met at the Rector's house the candidates for confirmation, and made them a very admirable address on the qualifications for that holy rite—in the evening he attended service again; and after a sermon by one of his presbyters, he made an address, which is represented to have been characterized by pathos, animation and energy in the highest degree. Eyes that seldom wept, were suffused with tears; and some of the most hardened in impenitency were softened, when the old and venerable servant of God, in tenderest accents, and with outstretched and trembling hands, and fervent love, heralded for the last time the good tidings of the Gospel, and entreated them for Christ's sake to be reconciled to God. That night, after a day spent so usefully in his sacred office, and only about three hours after his voice had proclaimed, in the Temple of God, the gracious invitations of his beloved Saviour, the fatal shaft which no skill could extract, pierced him. Feeling unwell a little after midnight, he arose to call for help; but his strength failing him, he fell on the floor, and lay there helpless for some time before his returning strength enabled him to make himself heard. When raised and placed on his bed, he was found to be laboring under a violent attack of pneumonia. He lived for five days, suffering but very little pain, and during most of the time none. Generally he was in a profound stupor, but occasionally he roused up, and his eyes and countenance would for a little while resume their usual intelligent and benevolent expression. When thus himself, he was resigned, calm, full of peace and hope, and free from all fear. When asked whether there was any thing to be done in reference to his temporal affairs, he said no, that every thing had been attended to—that nothing remained but to bid the Rev. Mr. Atkinson to bear his love to his dear children. When told (by Mr. Atkinson, at whose house he died, and who, with his wife, were son and daughter to him in the absence of his own children,) that death was at hand, he said, "It is well—I trust I am prepared either for this world or the next." On Thursday, at about half past one, A. M., after hours of entire freedom from pain, and in the gentlest and most peaceful manner, without a struggle or a groan, this good man fell asleep in Jesus—and now, we believe, is in the society of the Patriarchs and Apostles, in a world of blessedness.

Laboring to the last, in the midst of his duties, and zealously doing his Master's work, this old and faithful Soldier of Christ fell with his armor on, and brightly burnished with recent use. Well may the Apostle's language be applied to him: "I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

The circumstances attending Bishop Moore's death render the following lines of Montgomery remarkably appropriate:

"Servant of God I well done;
Rest from thy loved employ;
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy.
The voice at midnight came;
He started up to hear;
A mortal arrow pierced his frame;
He fell—but felt no fear.
Tranquil amidst alarms,
It found him in the field,
A veteran, slumbering on his arms,
Beneath his red-cross shield:
His sword was in his hand,
Still warm with recent fight;
Ready that moment, at command,
Through rock and steel to smite.
Soldier of Christ! well done;
Praise be thy new employ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Saviour's joy."

THE PAST YEAR.

Like a bubble borne upon the stream of time, another year of life has floated by and is gone!

Another page in the history of man is written. Time, in his swift, and sure career, has come; is gone; yet still is present, and noteth down each moment as it passes.

What changes, what joy, or sorrow, has the past year brought! Perhaps wealth has been made poor; whilst poverty and want have strode with time, and reached the goal of affluence.

Three hundred and sixty-five days ago, we looked forward to the present,—as the future; and now, we turn upon those very days, to seek for records of the past !

Another revolution of the wheel, and lo ! the present fades from view, as onward, with the rapid march of time, we hold our journey, unheeded or forgot.

And what, though Fortune, in her bitterest mood may cast the clouds of sorrow o'er our path ! What, though the merry laugh of joy may find its echo in the mournful cry of sadness or of misery ! What, though the tide of Fortune, like the mighty ocean's wave, shall rise, and sweep resistless over us ! We are not conquered yet ; our spirits still are free : we dash its blighting spray aside, and like a goodly gallant barque, we breast the storm.

There is a beacon-star which burns with undimmed lustre, to light us on our way.

There is an heavenly spirit, which beckons us still onward.

And lo ! high o'er the ramparts of the wished for goal, a flaunting flag is given to the wind ; behold the talismanic words, inscribed in living characters of fire upon it, Hope and Persevere.

Yes, hope, in all our cares and sorrows, still cheers us on our way ; hope so sweet, that danger is forgot, and sorrow flies before its inspirations.

It whispers in our ears a charm so full of joy, that life seems new ; and once more, we launch our barques upon the sea of life, to tempt its storms and try its winds again.

Thus comes, and goes, ' Old Time.'

Though empires rise, and pass away ; though sadness, misery and joy be companions in his train ; though the green happiness of youth did flourish ; though the seeds of discord spring ; though poor beggary and squalid want do pinch ; Time stays not, heeds not.

The mind by passions tossed ; the heart that burned with strong desires ; the bold aspirant, clothed with fierce ambition,—whose thoughts, and words, if coined into deeds, would make earth tremble, and nations groan ; the good, the well-disposed of men—whose bosoms nourished the noblest and the best of human feelings—who walked the path of righteousness, and found no greater happiness than doing charities, and sheltering the oppressed : in this short space of time, one single year ! thousands, possessors of such attributes, have perished, scarce cared for, or unknown.

As a leaf upon a tree withers, dies and falls, so man, with his passions, perishes.

Man springs up, flourishes, and ripens ; the ' Old Reaper' cometh, with his keen and well tried sickle, to gather in his harvest. Seated on his ponderous car, he swiftly urges his mettled and tireless steeds on to eternity.

He hurries through the living human field, to cut its tenants down.

Swiftly cleaving the intrenchant air, his glittering blade falls quivering on the thread of life, and lo, 'tis severed !

Thus, year after year goes he by, bearing in his train the hopes and joys, the cares and sorrows of man.

If tears shall water our course, Old Time, as he flies along, with a single flap of his broad wing, can dry them up.

Yet happiness too may often be broken and scattered by him.

Our brightest visions of the future may, to our awakened senses, take their real shapes, and don the garb of misery ; whilst the fancied sorrows of to-day may melt like noxious vapors, 'neath the genial sun of fortune, and disclose the sweetest imagery of life.

The future ! the unknown future ! wisely shut by an Almighty hand from our eager foolish view, still undisclosed lies spread before us.

Amidst our unhappiness it may burst forth, like the brilliant orb of day, a light to cheer us on, and bid us see again.

The future may have in its keeping so bright a store of love and joy and happiness, that but to view it—e'en through the dim vista of the far-off coming years—will make the sad heart leap for very joy.

Behold in the year which is now commenced another page in the history of man.

The clerk of Time stands ready, pen in hand, to note our actions, good or evil.

Behold, in the commencement of the coming year, the foundation of a mighty monument of Time, springing up beneath his tread, and rising high, as day on day of his strong masonry is added to the pile, until the close of another year shall cap its summit.

The fair unsullied page has been unrolled, on which our actions will be written : Shall it be the record of time well spent, or virtue shunned and disregarded ! shall we hand the undying page, foul and blotted by our acts, to posterity, whose legacy it is !

By it, perhaps, they will be guided.

Shall we be the ignis fatui, to lead them in an erring course, o'er rugged paths and dangerous swamps of life ? or shall we rather be a beacon light, a polar star, by which they may steer unto the port of happiness ?

Let the monument which another year shall raise bear the records of time well spent, of virtuous actions and of noble deeds.

Oh ! let it not teem with records of burning shame and misery ! Let it not tell of lawless passions unsubdued, unchecked ; of crying want unheeded, or innocence betrayed.

But rather, let it be a living monument, on which our virtues, like the glittering stars of heaven, shall glow, a beaming light—when we shall be no more—to guide succeeding ages on the way of life !

FEMALE INFLUENCE. IN SEVEN CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

THE RETURN.

"Tis sweet to know there is an eye, will mark
Our coming, and grow brighter when we come."

"Ada, what dress shall I wear to-night?" said Evelyn Mordaunt rather despairingly to her sister, who seemed quietly engaged with her drawing; and without waiting for a reply, she continued, "I do declare you are a perfect enigma to me, for there you sit, as indifferent about your dress, as if it was the choir, or one of your prayer-meetings, you are to attend, instead of our uncle's long talked of fête."

"Why really, Evelyn, your taste, you know, is acknowledged to be indisputable, and so wholly independent of another's, I think whatever it selects, that you should decide upon. I am somewhat surprised that you, who have been so successful a votary to fashion, should be thus unusually concerned about your appearance this evening."

"Not more so, my prosy sister, than I own I am at your apparent nonchalance about Carrol Stanley's arrival; for, if my memory be faithful, his departure caused your usual equanimity and self-possession to be a little disturbed. But I see plainly I have no place in your interest, or I would not so often fail in exciting it."

Ada sat still at her drawing; not a word escaped to pacify her sister, whose taunt she regarded as unjust; therefore, the wisest course was to pass it by unnoticed: but had Evelyn looked a little more attentively at her, she would have perceived the usual brightness of her dark gray eye dimmed, its lid quivering, and a drop, lucid as the early dew, resting on the rich fringe of nature's own hanging. But Evelyn Mordaunt was unhappily a spoiled child of fortune; consequently, the remembrance of the many wounding words, that, in moments of caprice, fell from her lips,—which seemed too beautiful to breathe other than those of softness and love,—rarely haunted her; and Ada was too forgiving to cause them to rise in judgment against her, whom, in spite of her waywardness, she loved better than all else beside.

Ada gave the finishing stroke to her sketch; and, with a sigh, arose to put it aside, as more domestic occupations demanded her attention below. Evelyn, when she found herself alone, returned to a re-examination of the various splendid dresses which her maid, with all her French volubility, displayed, vowing this one was most sweetly charming—the other best suited to her young lady's beautiful complexion. The taste and opinion of a femme-de-chambre are not often rejected, especially if her tongue be well spiced with flattery; and Evelyn very complacently listened to all Nesbit had to say.

It was a lovely evening when Carrol Stanley found himself rapidly approaching his native place. Four tedious years had glided by, carrying along with them various changes; and on no one, had the hand of mutability more sensibly laid its touch than on Carrol. He left buoyant with the fresh and happy spirit of youth; for then all things bore on their crest, the impress of unsullied beauty. Life seemed to his eye as fair and placid as the unruffled waters of the calmest lake. He returned with that spirit dampened, those feelings sensibly tempered and lost in the dignity of self-command. He left glowing with boyish beauty, and delicate gracefulness of activity; he returned with a person bearing the stamp of muscular vigor and manly ease. Carrol was indeed changed—not merely externally, for the opening capabilities of his mind had become expanded and highly cultivated by the rich lore gained during his sojourn in those lands, where

"Art and Science walked hand in hand."

O'er every feeling but his love of home, had the scythe of Time marked its course; that dear affection he garnered up with a miser-like care: it clung around his heart more tenaciously than the creeping ivy clings around the trunk of a blasted tree. As he passed each familiar haunt of his boyhood, how his bosom gladdened to see it untouched:—unlike him, the old church, where first his infant mind was made to comprehend there was an all-wise God, "maker of heaven and earth," still reared high its lofty spire, and the smooth green around seemed yet more green: but dearer far than all, was that sweet home where first he drew the breath of life. The old butler's eye glistened, as he grasped his young master's hand; the line of domestics cheered loudly, as he bounded past them to meet the warm embrace of his only parent, who, after a few moments of unrestrained indulgence, silently drew his son into an adjoining apartment.

The father and son mingled long their tears together. The deep wounds caused by the death of Mrs. Stanley, which the lapse of four years (for she died shortly after Carrol's departure,) had somewhat healed over, seemed freshly opened—bleeding anew with a painful intensity. But sorrow rarely outlives joy; and, with a resigned but saddened composure, they began to discourse on other themes, feeling the full joy of a happy reunion. It grew towards twilight, when Mr. Stanley reminded Carrol of his preparation for the expected fête in honor of his arrival.

"And where are my sweet cousins all this time? Am I not to see them, before the curious throng assembles—for surely, they are slow to offer me their sisterly welcome?"

As he said this, the door opened, and Ada, with a blushing timidity, but a face redolent with joy, approached him—her tendered hand was fervently pressed, and a still more fervent pressure of his lips on her lovely cheek, caused it to glow with carnation's deepest tint.

"But, dearest Ada, why are you alone? where is my cousin Evelyn? or does she deem my joy sufficient for the present, and think to prolong its continuance, by delaying her appearance?"

"I left her discharging the necessary, but onerous duties of the toilet," replied Ada—"but no doubt she will soon speak for herself. Like every one else, she is delighted at your return; and you may perceive by various bustling preliminaries, we have prepared for you a fit welcome."

CHAPTER II.

THE WELCOMING FETE.

"A thousand hearts beat happily! And where Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes looked love to eyes which spake again!"

Evelyn Mordaunt was indeed a being of rare and unsurpassed beauty. Her person was somewhat above the general height, with a bust combining every perfection of disputed taste, and a waist rounded by the flowing ease of Nature's span, which needed not the torturing process of the odious stays to compress it into the present wasp-like and disgusting smallness. Thus much may be easy to describe; but her face! the most glowing description would be tame—the richest language too poor to do it justice. On that evening, well did the mirror's reflection cause her heart to exult, and her bosom to throb, with a pardonable vanity. For who ever possessed the seducing gift of Beauty, and had one of those tell-tale friends of the boudoir, that remained insensible to its value, and experienced no desire to make others feel its powerful effect? Surely not a woman.

A dress of rose-colored sarsenet, after much hesitation and reflection, was decided upon for the evening; well did its delicate tint become her brilliant complexion. Her hair, soft and dark, was braided, with a Madona-like ease, and over a brow of the smoothest fairness. A few wavy curls on one side, floated carelessly on her neck of unblemished white; while those on the other, were caught by a jeweled arrow, gracefully confining their flowing motions. A serpent hissing dazzling gems, coiled at the back of her well formed head; but amidst their brightness, Evelyn Mordaunt's eye lost none of its light. Her cheek so bright and glowing, seemed to woo that veriest of urchins sent for man's vexation, to nestle in its rosy shades. Her lips, slightly parted, "out-blushed the rich red fruit of Autumn's prime." It was scarcely necessary that such a being should have taxed the aid of any artificial arrow, or ornamental weapon; for, in every smile, one, full barbed, was sent deep into the heart. Who that could have seen her thus beaming with all the pride of conscious beauty, would not have felt expression fail, and in description, feel that

"But the poorer half had been told;
For see how far the substance of my praise,
Doth wrong the picture!"

As Evelyn gave the last touch to the tout-ensemble of her faultless (because highly fashionable) array, her buoyant thoughts seemed to concentrate into one strong focus of action, viz: the captivation of Carrol Stanley's heart.

"Yes, he shall feel my power this night, though in early days he scarce acknowledged it: let me see if this dangerous arrow be becomingly seen. Bless me! poor Herbert has well nigh been forgot in this new and mighty conquest of my desires; but pshaw! one will even grow weary of the sincerity and constancy of such as Herbert—fascinating as he certainly is. Yes, indeed, I actually must add another laurel to my (so they tell me) never-fading wreath; and I dare say, Carrol will be quite a choice evergreen. For Heaven's sake, Ada, turning to her sister as she just then entered the room, do you not intend to dress to-night? why the guests will arrive, ere you are half ready. May I ask your opinion now of my looks?"

"Yes, dearest Evelyn," said Ada, gazing on the triumphant looking beauty in transfixed admiration, "you may; and it is, that, to my perception and taste, nothing seems wanting. If my sight be thus dazzled, how will it be with your host of willing slaves!—for to-night any and every one may deservedly render you, the heart's undivided homage. Bend down, my beautiful sister, and let those sweet lips give me the assurance that you will never again so cruelly think your place in Ada's heart and interest second to another's. But"—— she timidly paused, and coloring said, "Evelyn, do you not think you have conformed a little too strictly to the present fashion of low corsage and high sleeves?"

"Oh! no, Ada, you are such a squeamish prude and Methodist in your notions. I suppose, if I were to listen, you would read me Addison's vision on the tucker; but I pray you to excuse me just now; my maxim is 'Fashion is every thing;' consequently she demands strict attention."

With a proud step and exulting heart, Evelyn entered the brilliantly lighted, but empty rooms; and it was something unusual for the fashionable Miss Mordaunt to be the first to do thus; but she had been told Carrol was already there, and her vanity impelled her to try the effect of a sudden appearance. He was thoughtfully examining some old family prints, which, like the faces of family friends, he loved to gaze upon. So deep was his reverie, he heard not the gentle step of her, who above all others, he most wished to see.

"'Pon honor, surely my cousin's auricular sense cannot be very acute; or is it that my

'Treading would not bend a blade of grass,
Or shake the downy blow-ball from its stalk?"

"See," said she, as her silvery voice caused him to start and turn—"I have actually upset an ottoman, and you did not hear me!"

Carrol continued rooted to the spot, as immovably as a statue.

"Well really," she continued, inwardly delighted at his amazement, "I regret the lapse of a few years should have so completely banished me from Memory's niche; however, my warmest greetings, fresh from the heart, are offered you." She held out to him her beautifully jewelled hand, which was passionately seized, and, gazing on her as if his eye was taking its last long look, he pressed it to his almost bloodless lips—stammering out something about sudden surprise and transcendent beauty.

"I'll pardon you, cousin, provided you will have the gallantry to add, 'unexpected pleasures are always the most appreciated;' then you see my vanity will be somewhat mollified at your very flattering recognition!"

"Well then, if that addition will procure me your forgiveness, I know you will believe me, when I do not plead guilty to the latter implication. I did think it was impossible to imagine one more beautiful than my cousin Evelyn was, when I left her—but I find that four years have given her a more than a Nourmahal's gifts, adding every touch which the most ardent poet or painter ever sighed for."

"Bravo, coz! you have fully expiated your offence. Surely Paris has not improved your candor, for I see you've learned the tact of flattering quite to perfection. Believe me, (shaking her head,) your sex will have a great deal to answer for in thus offering to ours the poisonous chalice, and weakening our minds with its intoxicating power."

How willingly Evelyn would have forgiven the world its questionable veracity, and have thought mankind would be all-wise and excusable in adopting Carrol's opinions, respecting the fascinating beauty of the celebrated Miss Mordaunt!

Guest after guest crowded in, still Carrol seemed totally insensible to the presence of any, save of Evelyn; and she was evidently engrossed with the conquest she was rapidly making of her handsome cousin. Ada, with sickening heart and waning spirits, witnessed the devotion of his manner to Evelyn; not that her's was a nature, too envious, to receive any pleasure at being eclipsed by her more brilliant sister; not that she coveted one glance of admiration, or one just tribute of praise offered at the shrine of such radiant loveliness; but it was the disappointment of Nature's long cherished hopes, the tearing away of that specious veil which had been unconsciously thrown over her sanguine perceptions.

"Miss Mordaunt, I claim the fulfilment of your promise made a few evenings since to waltz," said a handsome young man approaching Evelyn, whom she blushing introduced to Carrol as Mr. Herbert Cameron.

"Excuse me for the present," replied she hesitatingly—"the space is already occupied with couples, and I do not think I can trust my giddy brain to the, if possible, more giddy waltz, to-night."

Cameron bent towards her, and whispered a few words into her ear; the next moment, the delicate waist of Evelyn was encircled by his arm, and soon were they left to the undisputed possession of the circle—every couple leaving, to witness the unrivalled waltzing of the reigning belle, and the accomplished Mr. Cameron. Carrol turned away with a disappointed heart:—his eye just then detected the fashionable licence of Evelyn's dress. Heaving a sigh of pain, he looked in another direction, wondering that the ethereal purity and delicacy of mind, which should ever dwell in so fair a tabernacle, should thus yield to so disgusting and indecorous a fashion. He started at hearing some one near him echo his deep drawn sigh, and casting his eye around, it fell on the youthful form of Ada, attired in simple white, her native loveliness wholly unadorned by any effort of display, or obtrusive ornament. Drawing her arm gently in his, he said—

"Where have you hid your sweet face so long, Ada! I am glad to see that you resist the prevalent propensity to indulge in the odious waltz—a dance which the more I see, increases my astonishment that it should ever have been adopted by American ladies, who have so justly the reputation for refinement of character and domestic purity. It was always my aversion, but since I visited Paris, it has actually become my horror. But, (seeing she hesitated to answer him,) perhaps I will have to claim your forgiveness for the free expression of my peculiar opinions; they may probably clash with yours."

"Oh, no!" she replied, "they are in entire accordance with mine, and I grieve to see Evelyn's excessive indulgence in it—for it often arouses within me a dictatorial spirit towards her I so dearly love; but see with what inimitable grace she moves!"

The waltz just then stopped, and Carrol with a flushed cheek, saw Evelyn, well nigh exhausted, receive from her partner such support, as he, notwithstanding his claims of relationship, would not have dared to offer her. But alas! how fashion will oft sanction and pardon every departure from long established customs in society, and how completely uncompromising she is in her acts of defiance!

"Come, Ada, you will dance a simple cotillion or quadrille with me, for I am too outré to figure in any other—I love such, and will enjoy it more to have you, the partner of my boyish dancing, mine to-night," said Carrol, as he perceived she was about to leave him.

"Indeed, I am as ignorant of both, as of the waltz, for I never dance at all; however, if you will wait awhile, for I see my uncle beckoning to me, I will procure you a ready partner!"

"Look how astonished Mr. Stanley seems that his cousin does not dance," said a young lady near to a gentleman; "I dare say he is unaware of the cause, and also of her title, 'the little Methodist Miss Mordaunt!'"

"I suppose so," replied he—"what an angel of goodness she must be! Ada Mordaunt may truly be regarded a star of heavenly light, to the distressed and afflicted, let whatever be the epithet, ridicule may choose to bestow on her—for she shines almost alone in this sublunary sphere of selfishness."

"What think you of her beautiful sister? Surely you will not be guilty of such unpardonable heresy, as to withhold the incense of your idolatry from the altar of the fashionable idol!"

"I fear you will have to brand me with such a sin; though she is as beautiful as a Houri, she is not a goddess that I can worship. The court of Catharine de Medici would have proved a fit orbit for Evelyn Mordaunt to shine in."

Carrol paused to hear no more; his bosom had been sufficiently pained, and wandering through the rooms, he endeavored to banish his unpleasant reflections; but at every turn, it was his fate to hear many remarks on his beautiful cousin, accompanying those of loud admiration, which smote him sorely. But when he drew near her in close converse, all were forgotten under the influence of her intoxicating beauty. Never was a planet more steadily followed by satellites than Evelyn was by her lordly train;—and Carrol was compelled through courtesy, to resign any particular claim on her attention. A whist party was proposed; Evelyn with a brightening eye threw down her gauntlet to Mr. Cameron, laughingly defying him to a game with her. As he plead his excuse of ignorance and dislike to gaming, her lip curled, and the usual soft light of her eye was lost in that of the most flashing irony.

"This is not the first time, Mr. Morality, you have resisted my persuasion to play with me; but to-night I am resolved to conquer your parson-like squeamishness. I verily suspect you dread some future weakness will arise, perhaps from your first act of submission; come now answer me, do you not?"

Herbert colored highly, but very firmly answered—

"Miss Mordaunt well knows my repeated rejections of her challenge proceed only from an utter detestation to every species of gaming—and not to any other, when she is my lawgiver; she must remember too, that the acorn produces often a wide spreading oak—and I candidly own her suspicion has truth for its origin."

But Evelyn was nothing daunted by this decided and bold avowal; she still plied her many arrows of attraction to her well strung bow; and when almost despairing of her aim, she fixed on him a look of meaning, the effect of which he alone knew and felt; the next moment, the vacant chair was filled by the hesitating Herbert—the cards were placed triumphantly in his trembling hands—and Evelyn, with an exulting smile, named the stakes.

How well the brilliant ornament in her hair corresponded with her character! That night the slumbers of Evelyn were undisturbed, for two points had been gained; her arrow had been well directed to the heart of Carrol Stanley; the serpent had at last coiled around the firmest resolve of Herbert Cameron; her victory was complete!

Parties and balls are generally deemed trifling and innocent in their effects; every feeling engendered, is considered transient and ephemeral; but had we a telescopic view of the future, how often would we find many important developments, depending upon the most trite and common events—as we shall see in the sequel.

CHAPTER III.

A RETROSPECTIVE VIEW.

"Yes! it is love—if thoughts of tenderness
Tried in temptation, strengthened by distress,
Humored by absence, firm in every clime,
And yet—oh! more than all, untir'd by Time."

Mr. Mordaunt married Mrs. Stanley's only sister, who, ere his two daughters had passed the threshold of infancy, fell a victim to the pestilential climate of the West-Indies, whither he had gone on mercantile business. His heart-stricken widow brooded over her sorrowful loneliness but a few years, and Evelyn and Ada, at the early ages of ten and eight, were left under the guardianship of their uncle, the heiresses of their father's princely fortune. They shared with Carrol every paternal and maternal instruction, as well as the most tender affection. The lovely principles of Christianity were faithfully instilled into their young minds by the pious and amiable Mrs. Stanley. To Ada, they proved the richest legacy ever bequeathed; to Evelyn, but as an oft-told tale, signifying nothing but gloom and dull monotony; and to Carrol, a bulwark to those many avenues of natural desires, so concomitant to youth. It is true, there were times when temptation often caused him to banish their early influence—rendering him careless and indifferent; but when the sober reins of Reason were resumed, he found the soothing power of first impressions hang faithfully on his memory—checking those many turbulent passions which agitated his bosom.

He loved his mother with an intensity of affection. Her death had saddened his spirit, and crushed the dearest feelings of his heart, more than any stroke of affliction had ever done; the poignancy of his grief was greatly increased, by the heavy stroke's falling when absent from her.

Yet Time, that great restorer, had scarred over the sad wound; but when he, in gladness, returned to the dear scenes of his boyhood, the joyousness of anticipation fled—the bounding heart sank into an almost pulseless state, when the sorrowful conviction of his loss pressed so heavily on him. When he remembered there was left him no fond mother to welcome back the long absent wanderer, tears, those sweet harbingers of mental relief, which had long been strangers to his eyes, silently came to his aid.

At the time Carrol set out upon his continental tour, Evelyn had arrived at the sweet age of sixteen, Ada fourteen; and he just entering his twentieth year. He then thought Evey, as he called her, was too beautiful to receive any improvement from the hand of maturity—he did not desire any additional touch, but fondly wished that on his return, he might find her the same peerless thing. Ada he loved with the utmost brotherly tenderness; her mild mediation had often interposed to soothe the outbreaks of his anger, which the wayward petulance of the spoiled Evelyn often excited. She was ever its peacemaker in all their childish disputes, and the dispenser of harmony, when discord sounded rude notes. But Carrol was a complete slave to beauty; and like most men, could pardon any glaring imperfection of the heart and mind, provided the face was fair, the eye bright, and the lip beautiful. He never dreamed of being actually and literally in love with Evelyn, though her image ever haunted him as the brightest; nevertheless, he continually found himself drawing comparisons between the fair ones of the many lands he visited, and his still fairer cousin! He had never thought of breathing the language of love into her ear; though he frequently wondered at the lips' silence, when his heart felt its power; memory, too, hoarded well the truth and freshness of such feelings; yet, notwithstanding all these symptoms, Carrol would have ridiculed and rejected the idea of their being designated as other than those of the purest brotherly love.

"But why is not my sweet cousin Ada so often mingled with my thoughts, wishes, and dearest memories, as Evelyn is?" was a query his heart scarce took time fully to answer; though it never failed to acknowledge her purity, and almost freedom from the taint of those earthly passions, which evidently swayed Evelyn. Thus was it with Carrol, when he again met his cousins, and beheld Evelyn at twenty, more glowing with beauty, more brilliant than ever; he ceased to school and catechise his feelings any longer, for "A change—so swift his heart was made to feel,

It rushed upon him like a mighty stream,
Bearing him heedlessly on."

He felt she was indeed the object of his wildest idolatry, and one who was henceforward to rule his destiny of earthly happiness or misery. Almost unresistingly, he yielded to the "majesty of her loveliness;" and fearlessly did Carrol lay the first offering of his warmest and purest love at the shrine of the spoiled belle, who scarce knew the value of such an affection.

"Time glided noiselessly by, for Nought steals so silently as his tread"—

and Carrol felt he only lived in her presence; that the very atmosphere she inhaled was sweeter to him than the "sweet south wind's breath;" no place was dull, cheered by her smile; no amusement caused satiety, when Evelyn shared it with him.

It was some weeks after his return, that Carrol and Evelyn were seated beside an open window, admiring the ever-varying and gorgeous hues of an Indian summer sunset; the balmy influence of the hour swayed with a cheerful power Carrol's every hope; the passionate avowal of his long treasured love was trembling on his lips, when Ada's entrance bid back the sweet confession;—for the first time, in his life, did her gentle presence call up a rising murmur of regret, her sweet face seem unwelcome to him.

"Evelyn," said she, timidly approaching them, "I have come to tell you poor nurse Mason grows worse; I fear she has few days left of her span; your recent neglect in visiting her, seems to grieve her faithful heart; so, to soothe and gladden her, I promised to bring you with me this evening. Will you accompany me now?"

"Why, indeed, Ada," said she, rather falteringly, "I am sorry I cannot conveniently do so just now—but do take her something comfortable and nice, and tell her, I will come and sit all to-morrow morning, and read the 'precious Bible,' as she calls it, to her. I have an engagement with Herbert Cameron this evening, which must be fulfilled."

"Nothing will be so comfortable or consoling to poor nurse, as the kind sympathy and attentive presence of those she has ever regarded as her children; on whom, she has lavished almost a parent's fondness! But I will endeavor to reconcile her to the disappointment of not seeing you, by delivering your promise, which, I do hope, you may not find too late to fulfil."

Ada, with a swimming eye and lagging step, left the careless, selfish Evelyn, to the exercise of that freedom of will, which had never been sacrificed to another's pleasure.

The slight mention of Herbert Cameron's name, had caused Carrol's

"———cheek to change, his Sinking heart lay still;"

and ere he could gather resolution enough to hazard the truth or fallacy of his boding fears, by casting all upon the hazard of a single die of confession, the man, whom he least wished to see, was announced. Carrol's patience was incapable of another test, and immediately remembering his promise to meet an old college friend, he suddenly withdrew. The lovers were left alone.

CHAPTER IV.

PAINFUL DISCLOSURES.

"What stamps the wrinkle deeper on the brow?
To view each loved one blotted from Life's page,
And be alone on earth as I am now?
Before the Chastener humbly let me bow,
O'er hearts divided, and o'er hopes destroyed!—
Roll on, vain days! full reckless may ye flow,
Since I am rest of all my soul enjoyed!"

It was about twilight, when Carrol left his friend. Finding the house entirely deserted, he bent his course towards nurse Mason's cottage—for she was one he had never neglected, even in the most careless period of his life; and now, that she was evidently so near her end, his attention and care increased. As he dwelt on her long life of goodness and faithfulness—on those years of watchfulness over his infancy, he felt an unusual melancholy steal over him; a heaving sigh escaped his sorrowful bosom, that it should be his fate to see

"—each loved one blotted from Life's page."

Passing the favorite bower of his cousins, a low, earnest voice fell upon his ear; he paused, perceiving it was not that of a female.

"When, dearest, will you terminate my torturing probation of suspense? You have owned I possess your love; you have consented to bless me with this beautiful hand, the most precious boon of Heaven; and still, I cannot prevail on you to name the period for the consummation of my happiness!"

"Have patience, Herbert; believe me, I continue true to my vows of love, and will in time fulfil them; but really I cannot see the necessity of any haste in terminating our individual liberties. Will you deem it weakness in me, when I confess, that, a desire of seeing my stately cousin in subjugation complete at my feet, to hear him breathe his tale of love—though I well know, I already possess it—induces me to extend the term of your probation? He acts most charmingly the 'sighing furnace;' and you know, your eclat will be greater for vanquishing and thwarting the aspirations of the matchless Carrol Stanley."

Carrol heard no more; with astonishing speed, he sought his room; and there alone did he pour forth the burning lava of anguish, which well nigh threatened to overwhelm his soul. His fondest hopes, and all his airy castles lay around him, more shattered than the crumbling tower; his love was crushed; his tenderest affections trodden down and withered, like the flower of the field; the chilling breath of female heartlessness had passed over their freshness and beauty—leaving the heart more waste and desolate than the barren heath. A deathly languor seized his frame, and in one hour he endured an age of grief.

Oh! what a sad hour that must be, when the young and happy first feel the presence of a deadly blight upon their fondly cherished hopes! To those, whose only refuge is to the false and fleeting comforts of the world, dreary indeed becomes its offered consolation. Carrol opened the window to woo the night air to cool his fevered brow. It was damp with the sweat of his agony; and his eyes burned, as if they had felt the sun's scorching rays for days. The calm and balmy influence of the lovely starry night, seemed to tranquillize the inward tempest. Reason gradually resumed her reign, and with her steady and unerring light, guided his reflections into the channel of sober resignation. With subdued passions, but saddened heart, he resolved on informing Evelyn what he had heard; to take a final leave of her, and then to cast himself again an exile and wanderer upon the world; to bid adieu once more to his happy home. In the bitterness of a crushed spirit, Carrol wrote her the following:

"It is a severe and mournful task, my cousin, for the fond 'heart to root affection out;' to tear away that love, which, like a tendril, clings to the heart. Bitter indeed is it to be called upon to renounce as unworthy, the object of one's adoration; but such I find, Evelyn, the task imposed upon me to-night. Your confession to Herbert Cameron in the bower was accidentally heard by me; need I say it chilled back to its fount the deep current of my love for you! Yes, most beautiful, but heartless cousin, my soul sickens, when my thoughts endeavor to measure out the almost unmeasurable love I have felt for you. Suffice it to say, this absorbing feeling had usurped every other; and well has it happened, that reason and circumstances have conspired to open wide my eyes to such a sinful idolatry: for I was rendering to a creature, that adoration and devotion, which should alone belong to the great Creator. And now that He has assisted me, I can, without a murmur, resign all my fond hopes, and endeavor to offer up to Him that devotion I so foolishly and blindly bestowed on you. We part, perhaps forever! Receive my wishes for your future happiness, and may the love of Herbert Cameron suffice to repay you for the anguish you would have so remorselessly inflicted on Carrol Stanley."

With a still sadder heart, if possible, Carrol then wrote to his father, explaining the cause of his sudden departure, imploring him by all that deep affection he bore him, to permit his exile—and to make no effort to combat his resolution of never returning, until Evelyn should be the bride of another. Closing his letter with a strict injunction of secrecy respecting his movements, he determined, notwithstanding the late hour, to visit, perhaps for the last time, his faithful old nurse. He also remembered Ada was to sit up with her, and then he could bid farewell to that being of angelic perfection. How expressive of sober truth are those lines of the master poet :

"Love is not in our own power,
Nay, what seems stranger, is not in our choice;
We only love, when fate ordains we should,
And blindly fond, oft slight superior merit."

Such was the case with Carrol, when dwelling on the transcendent beauty of Evelyn, and on the heavenly purity and goodness of Ada,—and powerfully did he feel the applicability of the above truths, to his own heart.

The moon, then just in her perfect crescent, guided him with her placid light through the garden;—with a cold shudder he passed the fatal bower, and almost breathless from his painfully crowding thoughts, he reached the cottage. The lamp burned with that usual sickly glare it ever seems to shed in the chamber of death; the door was slightly open. Carrol paused to control his emotions ere he entered, for his heart melted at the sight within. Ada was seated beside the bed; before her, lay nurse Mason's old, but well kept Bible, from which, in the softest voice, she was reading that beautiful Psalm, where David fearlessly places his trust in that God, whose mercy and protection had all the day long "been extended unto him." She closed it, and bent over the invalid to hear what her faintly expressed wish was. It was to soothe her struggling soul by prayer. With bended knee, and fervent humility, did that young being implore her "Heavenly Father to speed in mercy the parting soul of his dying servant; to calm it in the coming strife, and to take back those vows which she had so faithfully paid by a life of devotion to Him, who now made her feel the precious influence of a Redeemer's love."

Never had Carrol Stanley been so moved by the voice and language of prayer; instinctively he had sunk on his knees, and fervently did he follow in spirit and thought, the simple but beautiful appeal for Divine protection. Ada's pale cheek brightened with the deepest glow, when she turned and saw Carrol silently enter; her heart, which had become calmed by the influence of her soul's communion, now beat wildly as he drew near; her hand trembled, as if palsied, when he gently took it. For some moments, a deep silence reigned. Ada, recovering her self-possession, bade him make himself known to the dying saint. At the sound of his voice, she fixed on him a look of the most grateful recognition, and feebly raising her hand, laid it on his bending head with an earnest pressure; and, though expiring nature forbade the lips expression, yet the silent eloquence of her upturned eyes attested well the fervor of her last benediction. The midnight hour ushered into the portals of Heaven the soul of the faithful old Christian. Ada and Carrol closed those eyes, which had so untiringly watched over their infant footsteps, which had so often beamed with a maternal fondness on their childish pastimes. In sadness, they returned to the house. Few words were spoken on the way—for Carrol's voice died away ere he could bring himself to disclose to her his intended departure; and Ada's heart felt too heavy, with thick and coming memories, to give utterance to any words. When they entered the hall, and as she was bidding him good night, he convulsively seized her hand, and pressing her to his bosom, kindly brushed away the coursing tears, hoarsely saying—"Farewell, sweet Ada, our last meeting has been beside the bed of the dying; our next may be in another world. Oh! dearest, pray for me, for God will never turn a deaf ear to such petitions as spring from your heart; and Heaven knows I need them now, when in the utter desolation of parting from all I hold dear on earth. To-morrow," he added more calmly, "I leave here, perhaps never to return; your sister alone can explain the cause of such a resolve;—and oh! dearest Ada, though I have at last wrested her from my heart, yet sweet being of love and truth, guard her, for my sake, with your heavenly counsel, and if possible, shield her from coming harm."

Unresistingly, because completely astounded, Ada received his parting kiss; and when she felt returning recollection, it was to find herself still standing on the spot where he left her. Slowly and mechanically she retired to her chamber, and there gazed long on her beautiful sister, who lay wrapped in a tranquil sleep;—the calm and lovely repose of her perfect features, bore not the slightest impress of unworthy passions. Sad was the lonely vigil of the sorely tried Ada—for the luxury of sleep seemed denied her care-worn senses. Again did she bend before the throne of grace, to seek aid in this her most fearful desolation; for what can be greater than that proceeding from a despairing renunciation of "all the soul enjoyed"—when the cruel hand of dread reality disrobes the young heart of its fancied security—leaving it to writhe "neath its cold destitution!"

Ada Mordaunt felt all this in that hour; for she had long loved Carrol, though she saw Evelyn evidently possessed his undivided affections.

The next morning found Carrol journeying on his distant pilgrimage—there to bury in "strenuous action" all remembrance of his sorrows. Mr. Stanley's health almost sunk beneath this second separation from one he so devotedly loved; but he stilled his parental feelings, and strictly adhered to his son's injunction, not to recall him, or seek to entice him back again to those scenes which had been so fraught with untold anguish—until some happy interposition of Providence should cause him to return with a gladdened spirit. Ada mourned him as lost to her forever; and she measured his love for Evelyn like her own, when she thought that another would never possess it. Hers she resolved to subdue, not to bestow it again on a new object, but on Him who, she knew, oft chastened those He most loves, and in kindness sometimes tempers the fiercest wind to the shorn lamb. Her broken spirit, though chastened, felt humbled. With a martyr-like resignation, she committed all her sorrows, cares, and hopes of future happiness, into His hands—knowing and feeling how vain it seemeth in man to will, when Omnipotence holds in the hollow of His hands the destinies of worlds, and with a watchful eye, numbers even the hairs of our heads. Could Ada Mordaunt fail to be comforted, when thus supported?

A few months afterwards, Evelyn ratified at the altar, her vows of love to Herbert Cameron. She felt and looked happy. Carrol's conscience would have smote him, for his apparently unjust suspicion, that she could love naught but herself—that she was incapable of such a noble and refined feeling as woman's love. Could he have seen her look of perfect confidence, when she committed her all into the keeping of that being she so solemnly vowed to love and obey, confidently would he have said Evelyn in that moment forgot even her important self; and she did; for next to that insatiable Juggernaut of her soul, she loved Herbert Cameron. How differently Ada felt, as she stood beside her blooming sister—for, all remembrance of her own blighted affections, was drowned in that of Carrol's cruelly slighted love, and in the anticipation of his pain, were he a spectator on such an occasion; she endeavored to conceal those unbidden emotions, when she saw the happy gaiety of the brilliant bride; and when her farewell congratulations were offered her, Ada felt she stood indeed alone, like the last Summer flower in the garden of wasted feelings.

CHAPTER V.

A SHIFTING OF LIFE'S PANORAMA.

"The keenest pangs the wretched find,
Are rapture to the dreary void;
The leafless desert of the mind,
The waste of feelings unemployed."

The whirling eddy of time rolled on over three years—a lapse fraught with unclouded joy to some, to others chequered with changing ills, and chilling disappointments. None had been more tossed on the fluctuations of life, than Herbert and Evelyn Cameron. The first year of their wedded career, ushered in a brilliant promise of future bliss. Surrounded by every luxury which wealth could procure, and commanding in the fashionable world an extensive influence, Evelyn's uncommon beauty invested her with many attractions. Her society was courted, and she was flattered by all. To one so little fitted for domestic enjoyments—whose mind was so warped by the excessive adulation rendered her from childhood, this was the acme of all her desires. There was no resource of pleasure, no avenue of seducing gaiety, that Evelyn did not enter into with avidity. Herbert then seemed to desire no other employment, than that of a constant and love-like attendance on his beautiful and admired wife; no enticement of society detached him from her side; no other smile seemed half so bright. But the sky of even the fairest life, rarely remains free from those passing clouds which seem to darken the pathway of the most blessed and happy. Such Herbert found threatening on his horizon,—and Evelyn, when the flush of passion, the charm of novelty, passed away, felt all things, even the most continued love of her husband, fail to fill the "dreary void within." And thus it will ever be with woman, when her principles and feelings are wrongly biassed, and when she departs from that channel which nature assigns her. The second year of their marriage found Herbert gradually yielding to temptations from home; the returning influence of old habits and associations began to be felt, disturbing the quiet calm of his perfect love and connubial happiness; and the third, alas! witnessed him bestowing scarcely a common-place attention or thought on his almost deserted and neglected wife and home. Evelyn could not fail to become sensible of his altered and weaned affection; and being so completely a creature of waywardness and caprice, when she found his love waning, hers increased with surprising intensity; for, in the early days of their union, she appeared perfectly indifferent to manifesting any return of that devotion and love he so fondly lavished on her. Such she deemed her just prerogative; and by her cold and heartless carelessness, the warmth of Herbert's feelings were chilled and thrown back upon him; there, within his heart, to become stagnated by the commingling of distrust and disappointment, caused by her fashionable neglect.

No truism nor sentiment uttered by him, who so "faithfully holds the mirror up to human nature," finds a louder response within the human breast, than

"That we have we prize not to the worth While we enjoy it, but being lacked and lost
We reck the value."

And thus was it with Evelyn, when convinced that other objects usurped her place in Herbert's affections; other pleasures engrossed his time, giving few moments to her. A burning desire possessed her to fathom the growing mystery of his frequent absences from home, and the cause of that anxious and weary expression ever resting on his face—now become so pale and haggard. Hers was a resolution too indomitable to be overcome. She determined to rouse every energy, to con over every stratagem whereby her object might be attained, let it be ever so horrible; and truly was her resolve executed; horrible indeed were the circumstances which disclosed to the miserable Evelyn she was the wife of a confirmed and desperate gambler!

It was a fearfully cold and boisterous night in November. The winds raged with an alarming violence, threatening to move from its solid foundation, even the splendid mansion of the fashionable Mrs. Cameron, when she, its now lonely and desolate mistress, sat anxiously noting every stroke of time, that brought near the hour she expected the arrival of her sister. Sadly altered was that once brilliant face, so redolent with all that was beautiful. The lines of painful thought showed their deep indentations on her pale brow;—that eye, once so sparkling and beaming conscious happiness, now wandered with the restless brilliancy of unsatisfied expectation;—and the cheek, once glowing with health, was wan and sunken, as it leaned on her small and delicate hand. Long and melancholy was the deep revery of the neglected, nay almost isolated, Evelyn; for it had been some time since the gay world had poured into her ear its wonted tones of adulation, so completely had she withdrawn from those amusements which once constituted the end and aim of her happiness. The night wore heavily away—sigh after sigh escaped from her despairing heart.

"I wonder if Herbert will be here to welcome Ada—for a smile of something like olden times, lit his face when he read her letter? Alas! how shocked her tender affectionate nature will be, when she sees what a small share of domestic happiness has fallen to her only sister's lot; and this poor person, which was so much her pride and boast, as well as my own, how changed she will find it"—for the opposite mirror just then gave back the reflection of her face contracted and careworn. "But ah! my sister, if the sight of my alteration will wring your heart, how will that of my still more unhappy, misguided, Herbert affect you? Oh! why should I, the wife of his choice, the loved one from early youth, be thus doomed to such utter destitution, and be thought unfit to share his confidence, or incapable of alleviating his brooding woe!" Her cheek just then glowed, a sickening sensation crept over her; for the throbbings of remorse had not yet become too extinct in her worldly bosom, to reject the lashings of memory, when it called up vividly those two first years—so thoughtlessly spent in heartless indifference to his love,—and her complete desertion of that sweet home, to which, in the fondness and pride of his heart, he had brought her. Conscience bid back another murmuring interrogatory within her now repining bosom, and ardently did she wish to repay for her past errors by a future life of faithfulness in discharging those long neglected duties. Humiliating indeed were Evelyn's reflections; but the soothing contrition of hope wooed her on to days of recovered happiness; and not until she heard the rapid rolling of the stages past the house, was she aroused to a recollection of the lateness of the hour, and that that long expected time had not yet brought Ada. Soon the streets became deserted, as the "hall after a gay festival,"—and with a disappointed, saddened heart, Evelyn was about to retire to her lonely chamber, when her eager ear caught the sound of the well-known step of her husband. He entered, and scarcely casting a look on her, as she rose with an exclamation of joyful welcome, he threw himself on the sofa, gruffly ordering some coffee.

It was with a palpitating heart, and in silence, (for her thoughts were too overwhelming with the influence of her recent self-arraignment, to give utterance to any remonstrance at his abrupt and unkind manner,) Evelyn awaited his commencement of conversation. After swallowing hastily several cups of coffee, which he pronounced "execrable," he impatiently ordered a light to his library—for he had business to transact ere he left home.

"Surely, dear Herbert, you will not so imprudently brave the tempest that now rages with such violence. Do not, I implore you, leave me to endure alone, the horrors of such a night."

He carelessly answered—

"Ada I suppose will not come now, and as she certainly will to-morrow, I must complete my business to-night, so that I may be disengaged when she arrives. It is time you had become inured to the luxury of solitude—for hang me, if I care to intrude upon it, when your moping face is all that welcomes me."

Evelyn offered not another word of opposition; for just then her thoughts were busy with some sudden action and impulse; and as he rose to take the offered light, she said with a resigned calmness—

"I thought even my moping looks scarcely attracted your observation, for it has been a weary long time since your eye met mine with other than a careless glance, or rested on my face to note its usual expression, let it be what it may."

"Well, well, be it so—I have no time now to listen to your whinings and repinings, but I'll ask you one question, Evelyn Cameron; to whom and to what cause do you attribute your present loneliness? Cast back your mind to the scene which was once endured by your husband, and see if conscience doth not render the verdict of—nay, even a Shylock's retribution, being your just and merited due."

"Too true—but oh! Herbert, stay and hear my plea of future atonement!"—

The silence of the room gave to her ear the echo of his retiring footsteps, instead of one sympathizing look, or tone of reconciliation; the bubbling waters of a fresh and humbling repentance, were hushed within Evelyn's proud bosom. The bitterness of his sneering taunt, and deafness to her offered plea, had so completely chilled the inward current, that no trace of recent tenderness or reviving affection—no feeling of sacred honor, restrained her from the determination of thenceforward acting the spy on all his movements, even at the hazard of any personal exposure or sacrifice of her feminine delicacy of character.

"My all is cast upon this one great die," was Evelyn's exclamation, as she, with a resolved air and firm step, followed her husband to his room, that she might there watch his movements, so as to shape out her future course of action.

CHAPTER VI.

REVEALED TRUTHS.

"'Tis strange, but true; for truth is always strange—
Stranger than fiction; if it should be told,
How much would novels gain by the exchange!
How differently the world would men behold!
How oft would vice and virtue places change!"

It is said, "when woman hesitates, she is lost;" but the proud spirit of the resolute Evelyn did not even shrink or quail, when she condescended to act the ignoble part of a spy towards her husband; stealthily to elicit that confidence, which by her own conduct she had deservedly forfeited. It was a combination of feelings that urged her on, piqued love, distrust and dark suspicions, mingled with an irresistible curiosity, silenced that ever-speaking "oracle of God"—the voice of conscience. When this fortress of the heart becomes assailed and undermined in a woman,—especially in a wife,—how applicable and merited is the poet's sneer:

"Woman, thy vows are traced in sand!"

for, how desecrated had become those she so faithfully pledged at the altar. When Evelyn gained the door of her husband's library, she found it partially open, and, with a suppressed breathing, she kept her post of observation. He opened his desk and seemed intently examining a large pile of bank notes, which he tremblingly deposited in his bosom; for she could but notice how it heaved, and how livid his face became, as he did so;—after which he began to make preparations for encountering the still raging storm without. Evelyn rapidly descended, and enveloping herself in a large cloak, with an old cap slouched over her face, she unshrinkingly awaited his passing through the hall. In a few moments, he came with a hurried air, and a face of terrible contraction—Placing the lamp in its accustomed place for use on his return, he emerged into the street. She steadily followed him through several, which he measured with rapid strides; and finally halting in one, ominously silent and obscure, he threw himself on the flagstones, seeming to expect the arrival of some one. The driving sleet wind, and falling of the rain on the pavement, hushed Evelyn's cautious step, which otherwise, in such a dead silence, would have been heard by the quick ear of the impatient Herbert. She had just ensconced herself behind the remnant of an old lamp post, when the voice of an approaching person caused him to start up with an exclamation of growling satisfaction—

"The devil and his angels of darkness take you, for thus dallying with my time, and delaying your appointment; I had begun to regard your promise as worse in nothingness than a woman's."

"You did, did ye, Mr. Herbert Cameron! but you have most suddenly grown suspicious of me, whom experience has well proved true to deeds befitting such a night as this—but may your saluting wish be fulfilled, if I could come any sooner. However you can afford to lose the past few moments in waiting, as the number you have to spend in those most charming hells will be fewer!"

"Hush, you taunting scoundrel! you know well I am indebted to you for an introduction into those cursed places, which has brought me to my present disgraceful association with such as you!"

A chuckle from his companion followed this upbraiding retort of Herbert's.

"Humph! very well for you to place the commission of all your crimes to my account, thinking thereby to escape the just punishment of Heaven. But, Herbert Cameron, I now begin to think cowardice brands your brow with other sins; for, if I mistake not, I once heard you wish you had never seen your wife—that it was she who first tempted you to game. I have heard a deal of woman's influence, but the devil take this, for an uncommon instance; and by Jove, you have proved yourself an apt scholar to her ladyship as well as to myself."

A deep groan issued from the wretched Cameron's bosom; but mastering his emotion, in a voice of hollow calmness, he replied—

"Stop, Grimstall, thus far you have had the cruelty to go, but I will permit no further bitter sneer—my anguish and misery are already too overwrought to bear another from you, however deserved it may be. I know I did, in an unhappy moment, blame my injured and deserted wife for my love for gaming; but having foolishly yielded once to her thoughtless challenge, should be no excuse for my present horrible excess. Come, let us banish our petulant anger and attend to business. See, I have the notes, compare them with yours, and look well that all is right."

The rain had ceased, the winds had "crept back to their caverns," and the bright-round face of the moon peered above the still floating clouds. Her light was hailed with joyful eagerness by the two, as it benefitted their strict examination; but ere the roll was half completed, she withdrew her placid and cheering visage, leaving them in greater darkness. A curse or two escaped them, as they then silently bent their steps in another direction.

Evelyn's feelings were insupportable. "The war and chaos of her mind," might have vied with all the fury of the elements, amid the fiercest battlement of Heaven; but despair seemed to nerve her soul on to the dread discovery. Without the least hesitation, she followed. They soon entered a dark alley, and after a few muttered words of consultation, the door of one of those wretched abodes of vice—so aptly termed hells—was opened. Still Evelyn paused not; and with a less firm, but more stealthy step, she tracked her way after them—perceiving the door was, in their hurry, left unbarred.

After threading two or three dark passages, with only a light here and there guiding them, they paused to listen to what was going on in the next room. Grimstall's signal was in a few moments given, which, unlike the other door, was opened only by his 'sesame' word; and so great was the pleasure manifested by the inmates at the arrival of Herbert and his companion, all precaution to rebar it was lost in the general satisfaction. Evelyn, with a distended eye, and motionless heart, bent forward to watch their movements. Around a table sat about a dozen of the most miserably haggard looking men, whose countenances would have rivalled any of those in the nethermost regions—so visibly were they stamped with those fierce and guilty passions, which rendered them fit representatives of such a place.

The horror-stricken wife saw her husband, with one equally wretched, take a seat evidently reserved for him; and she determined, let what would happen—even at the hazard of her life—firmly to observe her vigil of strict scrutiny respecting the actions of those depraved violators of the laws of God and man. The fortunes of the night decided against Herbert, who, with loud and deep-mouthed curses, rose, and throwing down vehemently his pile of notes, with an impatient gesture, prepared to depart. Just as he neared the door, the whole gang rose with the clamor and madness of demons, loudly vociferating "Forgery—forgery! See to the villain, for by Heaven he shall not escape!" At this moment of fiendish excitement, Grimstall, with a shrill cry, wildly pointed to the volumes of smoke, which were furiously forcing their way through the door of the adjoining apartment, and with one bound, shrieking "fire," he left them behind to follow. Every one then thought alone of self-preservation; but even in that horrible confusion, those who had been lucky, were bent upon securing their gains: and Herbert rushing out in unthinking despair, was about to bolt the door on the sordid beings, who would soon have paid the forfeit of their crimes, by an agonizing death in the then roaring element, when his hand was staid by some one clinging to his knees.

"Herbert—oh God! for mercy sake forbear," was all he heard; and stooping down, he threw aside the cloak to see with starting eyes the insensible form of his wife.

"Gracious Heaven! what could have brought this unhappy woman to such a den of greater devils than now feel the horrors of a greater hell!—Evelyn, my wife, my beautiful Evelyn, is it, can it be you!"

But no time was to be lost in any indulgence of his amazement, for the flames were curling high above him, and the confusion increasing around: hurriedly wrapping the cloak about her again, and bearing her aloft in his arms, as if she was only an infant, he flew with the lightning's speed to his home without heeding any obstacle. The cries and commotion incident to fires now resounded through the before silent streets, so that Herbert's wild and furious movements were totally unnoticed in the general dismay. He soon gained the house, which he found entirely deserted, and bearing his wife to the parlor without calling any one to his assistance, he silently and bewilderedly watched the return of her consciousness.

"Herbert, dearest Herbert, are you indeed here with me, in our own home, and alone too!" said she, slowly opening her eyes, and partially raising herself; then fixing them wildly on her stone-like and immovable husband, clasped her hands—"Oh God! what a fearful dream I have had; methought I saw you"—; but the dreadful words died on her lips, as she now too plainly saw it was all other than a mere dream—for there stood before her the same ghastly looking Herbert, with hair wildly dishevelled, whose clothes here and there showed marks of the fire, and the cloak still hanging around her, confirmed the dread reality. "Cameron, my husband, my still loved Herbert," said she, frantically throwing herself on her knees before his statue-like person, "are you sensible! Oh God! spare the avenging hand: let it fall on my head, and in mercy leave him reason." She fiercely shook him—not a word escaped him—not a look or gesture of resistance,—and then despairingly entwining her arms around his neck, implored him to speak—that "it was only his Evelyn, his wife, who was near him."

Gradually his bosom heaved—the motionless current of feeling seemed again to move, and shrinking from her embrace with a vehemence which nearly caused her to reel on the floor, and scowling on her, in a low guttural voice, he said—

"My wife! ha—ha! true, too true you are—but alas! only in name. Would to God this now wretched and guilty bosom had never cherished such a beautiful serpent, whose sting hath proved more deadly than the most poisonous asp,"—and casting on her a shuddering look, he left the petrified Evelyn to all the warring loneliness of remorse. In the next moment, the door of his room was violently shut.

CHAPTER VII.

THE RESULTS OF FEMALE INFLUENCE.

"Between two worlds life hovers like a star
 'Twixt night and morn, upon the horizon's verge;
 How little do we know that which we are!
 How less what we may be!"

Evelyn's first impulse was to follow her husband: but when she remembered his chilling repulse, and upbraiding wish, all her former pride, which had been her bane through life, but had nearly from recent events spent itself, again took possession of her, and determined her to refrain from any indulgence of affection or curiosity which might again irritate his already remorseless bosom.

Notwithstanding the powerful excitement of mind and body she had that night endured—and though the hour was past midnight, yet Evelyn sat still—not daring to move,—for an indefinable suspicion of coming evil wrung her mind. The sound of the clicking time-piece, to her, seemed ominous of some heavy pending calamity. She thought, until thought became insupportable; she revolved and re-revolved over the probable consequences of Herbert's criminal excesses, until even suspicion became chaotic;—and finally, when the last fearful one of his attempting self-destruction obtruded itself, the unhappy Evelyn could bear the agony of her surmises no longer; and with no thought nor fear, but that of arresting her husband from the fatal attempt, she bounded up stairs, and knocked loudly at his door. A low moan was all that answered her. Frantically she again descended for assistance; and when she had succeeded in forcing an entrance into the room, it was with a supernatural firmness. She looked around, confidently expecting the prostrate form of Herbert, bathed in his own life blood, would meet her view. But when every thing around bespoke an undisturbed quiet, and the usual arrangement of the room met her eye, it was with rapture and thankfulness she approached the bed on which Herbert, her still living husband, was calmly lying. A grateful hope sprung up within her bosom, that he was still spared to be a happy witness of her future life of intended reparation.

"Thank Heaven! I see you safe once more, looking like my own dear Herbert; lie still, I will watch you through the gray morn. Oh! may tomorrow's sun witness the renewal of our former confidence, and the boon of recovered happiness again be ours." Yes, the proud and domineering spirit of Evelyn Cameron was bent, and her haughty lip most piteously implored the pardon of her husband.

He took her hand, and, gazing on her with a look of answering forgiveness, was about to speak, when his frame seemed terribly convulsed; his eye rolled wildly; and instead of the pressure of affection, Evelyn felt she was in the clenched grasp of some powerful fiend.

"Send, send for Dr. M.," said she, in a voice of thunder, to the astonished servants—but he firmly warned them back, and pointing to a vial on the table near him, bearing a deadly label, agonizingly exclaimed—

"No, no! it is too late, Evelyn—see my remedy for the hated curse of life—God or man cannot save me now."

The poison was rapidly coursing its way to the seat of vitality, causing the once proud and noble form of Herbert Cameron to writhe and toss to and fro, as if plunged into a sea of fire. Raging, he tore his hair, and then loudly called for water—imploping God's mercy to rescue him from the furious flames which were consuming him.

"My wife—oh! Evelyn, will you, even in my last moments, be unkind, and refuse me one drop of water to slake this hellish thirst?"

She approached him with some, and catching the glass from her with a maniac's force, swallowed its contents; then dashing it with violence on the floor, said—

"Avaunt most heartless, miserable woman! Lord of heaven knows it was your syren smile that lured me from my better self—plunging me into temptation;—and now, how it must gloat your soul to witness the dying agonies of your victim!" And with this awful reproach on his lip, the wretched man sunk motionless as an infant asleep—for the death he had so sinfully sought, had proved faithful to his bidding.

Alas! what a sorrowful scene awaited the arrival of Ada; the livid corpse of her sister's husband was about to be borne to its long home, and the once beautiful Evelyn a raving maniac. She knew not the dear sister who embraced her; she felt not the tears of sympathy, as they fell like rain on her pale face, and heeded not the soothing voice of consolation, but continually moaned,

"It is I—his wife, Ada, who has murdered him."

For many a long day did Ada watch the return of reason in her ill-fated sister, until she almost sunk beneath the sickness of feeble hope. Evelyn's ravings at last ceased; her impetuous movements became stilled; but the restless wandering of her still glaring eye, betokened that the full power of reason's light was still withheld. In a few weeks she recovered sufficiently in bodily health, to be removed to Mr. Stanley's; and with the fondest hopes that all would yet be well with one so dearly loved, the anxious friends of Evelyn Cameron again reinstated in her old home—watched over her with all that tenderness which the choicest plant commands from its kind and deeply interested protector.

Another year rolled by, completing the fourth of Carrol Stanley's exile—at the termination of which, he again found himself nearing his well remembered home. It was with chastened feelings he now wooded the bright vision of future happiness, as he approached the desired haven. The bright page of Christianity had offered to him a title to her brighter mansions. The period ending his first exile, saw him sensible of present existence alone; to him, Evelyn was as a bright star gilding his pathway with her smiles; now, he thought of another which was eternal. Ada was his guiding angel; around her head, the halo of truth and virtue beamed, bidding him follow in that path of peace which her gentle piety pointed out. The words of her simple prayer had vibrated in his ear through the long lapse of years, and the germ of pious maternal instruction began to expand, with all its vernal freshness—causing the work of preparation in his heart for a blissful reunion with his sainted mother. No splendid fête announced his second coming; no bright and beautiful Evelyn greeted him; nay, not even the gentle pressure of Ada's hand was ready to welcome him. The house seemed wrapped in stillness—but soon his revered father appeared with a sorrowful face, and murmuring, "Thank Heaven, my son, you are not too late," bade Carrol follow him. Bewildered and scarcely daring to heed the throbbings of dread suspicion, he obeyed; and, with an almost noiseless step, Carrol stood beside the couch of the dying Evelyn Cameron. Ada was there; with a silent rapture he fondly pressed her to his heart. Long and painful was his sorrowful survey of that once loved, and still beautiful being of his youthful idolatry. As he took her hand, she bent on him a look of inviting kindness, saying, "Fear not, Carrol—it is not the selfish, unthinking Evelyn Mordaunt, whom you now see hovering 'twixt two vast worlds; but it is a happy, yes an unspeakably happy, monument of divine grace and mercy. I die in the faith; for it was she (pointing to Ada), who has so untiringly guided my thoughts to this precious book, (laying her hand on a small Bible near); within it, I have found no mysteries to those who willingly believe. On its sacred promises do I now fix my hopes of eternal life; and oh! what a rock it has proved whereon my feeble feet may rest in the great ocean of eternity."

It was with upturned eyes of lovely thankfulness, that Evelyn paused, as if in secret communion with the great Ruler of that kingdom, of which she was so soon to become a subject. Ada had sunk beside the dying one; and Carrol, with head bowed and eyes glistening, seemed incapable and unwilling to disperse the holy calm of such an hour, by the echo of an answering word.

But a few moments were thus spent, when Evelyn, much enfeebled, again took his hand—and placing it in that of Ada's, murmured low, but distinctly, "Carrol, our present meeting may be painful to you, because of the memory of other days—but oh! strive to let our next be in that world, where nothing will bind our spirits; no rolling back of earthly feelings within our bosoms, will sadden reunion in that bright heaven my soul is now panting to enter. There, Carrol, you will find a crown more brilliant than the golds of Ophir can make it, because it will reflect the light of a Redeemer's smile. And now—one! yea, only one thought of earthly things do I breathe, ere I leave you; it is—take her, Carrol, to your noble, generous bosom—cherish her—for love her, I know you will—regard her as the brightest jewel for you on earth;—by this last, but best gift, do I hope to expiate my many early offences towards you!"

The expiation of Evelyn Cameron was more than accepted: for in a few months, Carrol and Ada were united. In after years, nought cast the shade of gloom over their happiness, but the remembrance of her melancholy fate. Their life of Christian benevolence, and mutually well-directed love, attested truly an abiding remembrance of her last injunctions.

KEATS.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

A feeling has gone abroad prejudicial to the manliness of Keats. Such an idea in relation to any one who has given undoubted proof of intellectual vigor, should never be confidently entertained. Strong sense generally accompanies strong feeling; and it may be fairly presumed that when a man of true force of character is chargeable with great weakness, it is usually to be ascribed more to physical and accidental causes than to any inherent and absolute defect. The whole environment of circumstances must be weighed in the balance with the genuine characteristics of the individual, before we can truly pronounce on the case. Keats was a man of a most affluent imagination, sensitive feelings, and high aims; but he was born at a livery stable; his constitution was radically feeble, and his affections grievously disappointed. Considering what a world we live in, and the traits of our common nature, this was a painful combination. Almost every young man cherishes an idea which he confidently expects to realize. A poetical mind unites with such hopes a singular intensity of purpose; failure is accordingly the signal for despair. It is not in moral enterprises as in trade. When the hopes of the heart are bankrupt, renovation is not easy; they are too often all risked upon one adventure, and when that miscarries, iron nerves and an indomitable will are required to stand the shock. The cherished aim of Keats was doubtless to retrieve his social condition by the force of his genius. There was nothing presumptuous in such an anticipation. He had evinced more of the 'divine afflatus' than many English poets of good reputation, and his powers were by no means fully ripe. He had an exuberance of fancy truly wonderful—the independence to choose his own path, and an honest ambition to win the laurel which he felt was within his grasp. He published his first volume at the age of twenty-one. His political opinions and those of his associates, drew upon his literary efforts the most severe vituperation; and when Endymion appeared in 1818, it was furiously assailed by the great critical authority of the day. Gifford declared his intention of attacking it, even before its appearance. The lowly birth of the poet, the character of his friends, and the humble nature of his early education, were turned into arrows, dipped in gall, to rankle in his sensitive heart. The courtesies of private life were invaded, and the grossest calumnies resorted to, in order to carry out the system of abuse then prevalent. With good health, and a reasonable prospect of continued existence, Keats could have faced the storm. He could have lived down opprobrium, and awed a venal press by the shadow of his mature genius. But feeling that the seeds of death were already within him, and having striven in vain

‘to uprear

Love’s standard on the battlements of song,’

he no longer hoped “to leave his name upon the harp-string.” He felt that he must pass away unvindicated. The criticism to which his death is commonly ascribed, was but the last of a series of painful experience. It is very unjust to select one, and that the least dignified of his trials, and represent him as thus unworthily vanquished. It was “in battalion” and not singly, that troubles overpowered him. It was physical infirmity rather than morbid feeling, that gave fatal effect to critical abuse. The “article” was the climax, rather than the arbiter of his fate. Byron’s facetious rhymes, therefore, pass for nothing. Keats was not “extinguished by an article.” It is untrue that he was “laughed into Lethe by some quaint review.” His woes were only aggravated by ridicule, and his last days embittered by the obloquy attempted to be cast on his name. It is obvious, therefore, that he was no lack-a-daisical sufferer. In fact, the state of his mind was inferred rather than known. He kept his feelings to himself, and they preyed upon him the more. He possessed too much delicacy to intrude his sorrows, even upon intimate friends. He “bore his faculties so meekly,” that to a kindly observer his silent griefs could not but “challenge pity.” There is a strength of quiet endurance as significant of courage, as the most daring feats of prowess. Keats displayed this energy of mind to a degree which completely blunts the edge of sarcasm as applied to his sensibility. He had, says one of his friends, a face in which was visible “an eager power, checked and made patient by ill-health.” Lord Byron, like all men who make their personal consciousness the only ground of judgment, often erred in his estimate of character. He does not appear to have made any allowance for the difference of circumstances and disposition between himself and Keats. He says the effect of the first severe criticism upon him, was “rage, resistance and redress, not despondency and despair.” Very likely. He was then in high health—had rank and money to sustain him, and nothing at issue but literary fame. Keats was poor, obscurely born, his health broken, and his heart concentrated on an enterprise affecting his every interest. His spirit also was too gentle to find relief in satire. Byron looked at his beautiful hand with pride, as Nature’s sign of high-birth: Keats gazed with sadness upon his—its veins swollen by disease; he used to say it was the hand of a man of fifty. In this one contrast, we have a token of their diversity of condition. To the one, poetry was a graceful appendage—to the other, all in all: the one, if unsuccessful with the muses, could fall back upon many an object secured by his social position and versatile nature; the other, if baffled with his lyre, was left no resource but the ungenial pathway of lowly toil:—Byron was a poet at intervals; Keats had wed himself “to things of light, from infancy.” He lived but twenty-four years. His education, as far as formal teaching was concerned, he derived chiefly from a school at Enfield. At an early age he was apprenticed to a surgeon; but his fine abilities soon brought him in contact with several of the leading minds of the day. His happiest hours appear to have been those dedicated to friendly converse with congenial spirits, and strolling along a pleasant lane between Hampstead and Highgate. This walk has become classic ground, frequented as it has been by such men as Coleridge, Lamb and Keats. Although the latter was convinced that his disease was fatal for three years before his death, he was induced by the hope of alleviating the symptoms and refreshing his mind with change of scene, to embark for Naples. He carried with him a breaking heart. Assiduous devotion at the bed-side of a dying brother, had wasted his little remaining strength. There was now an aimless fever in his life. The beautiful fragment of Hyperion, he had not courage to complete, since the cold reception of his earlier poems. In fact, he seems to have gone abroad only to die. The luxuriant beauty of Naples, and the solemn atmosphere of Rome must have pressed upon his senses with most pathetic import. No heart was ever more alive to the spell of loneliness or the charm of antiquity; but how full of “thoughts too deep for tears,” must have been their language when hallowed by the shadow of death!

A few years after, one of the kings of literature came from the same northern isle, to seek renovation in that gentle clime. But his goal was reached. He had enjoyed a long and bright career. The affectionate hopes of millions followed his feeble steps. He could look back upon many years of successful achievement; and was about to depart, like the sun at his setting, encircled with the light of glory. The younger heir of fame came a weary pilgrim to the same scenes, to die in his youth, like a star that rises only to twinkle for an hour, and disappear forever. Keats was fortunate in a companion. An artist who had known him long, appreciated his character, and was blessed with a rich fund of animal spirits and kindly feeling, "sustained and soothed" the sufferer, until he tranquilly expired at Rome, Dec. 27th, 1820. How many have witnessed, in imagination, the departure of the gifted young exile! The sweet words he uttered, his patience and gentleness and poetry beamed forth to the last. He whispered his epitaph to his friend—"My name was writ in water;" and already felt the daisies growing over him! The physicians marvelled at his tenacity of life, when the vital energies were so exhausted, and said he must have long lived upon the strength of his spirit.

Sometimes a lovely day occurs in the very depth of winter at Rome. The deep blue sky and soft wind are there more than ever alluring. Such a day I chose to visit the grave of Keats, guided to its vicinity by the massive, grey pyramid, called the monument of Caius Cestus. A plain white grave-stone, in the midst of numerous other memorials of foreign sepulture, indicates the spot. The turf around was of a most vivid emerald—the sky above serenely azure—the air balmy, and the scene almost deserted. The sigh of the breeze through a cypress, or the chirrup of a single bird, drawn forth by the unwonted warmth, alone broke the profound quiet of the cemetery. It seemed as if Nature was atoning to the departed for the world's harshness, by keeping a vigil of peaceful beauty at his grave.

To every poetical mind there seems to be a peculiar nucleus for thought. The sympathies flow in some particular direction; and the glow and imagery of song, are excited in a certain manner according to individual taste and character. To Scott, chivalry and all its associations, were inspiring—to Wordsworth, abstract nature. Cowper loved to group his feelings and fancies around moral truth; and Pope, to weave into verse the phenomena of social life. The poetical sympathies of Keats were strongly attracted by Grecian mythology. This was unfortunate as regards his prospect of fame. Neptune and Venus do not win the popular attention like Tam O'Shanter, Marston, or Childe Harold. Diverse as are these personages, they are all far nearer to the heart of man; they come greatly more within the common view than the pagan deities. The life of a great man of modern times, finds far more readers in this age than a classical dictionary. On the other hand, Keats found in the field he selected, a freedom of range which his warm fancy craved. Among the Grecian gods he could indulge in the most luxuriant invention; he could draw pictures of beauty, and visions of bliss, and tales of passion, according to an ideal standard. In this enchanted ground he need not conform to the actual, but his thoughts could be "as free of wing as Eden's garden bird," and his muse emulate "the large utterance of the early gods." We have frequent evidence of his love of these themes:

Behold! he walks

On heaven's pavement; brotherly he talks
To divine powers: from his hand, full fain,
Juno's proud birds are pecking early grain:
He tries the nerve of Phœbus' golden bow,
And asketh where the golden apples grow:
Upon his arm he braces Pallas' shield,
And strives in vain to unsettle and wield
A jovian thunderbolt.*

It was his delight to see

Phœbus in the morning;

Or flushed Aurora in the roseate dawning;
Or a white Naiad in a rippling stream;
Or a rapt seraph in a moonlight beam.†

In these ambitious attempts, the young poet paid little attention to artificial rules of versification. The lines run into one another with scarcely any view to the effect of the pause. The rhymes seem often forced. Fancy rather than form—sentiment rather than art, predominate. The couplets are often illegitimately joined; but their offspring, born "in the lusty stealth of nature," frequently o'ertop more regular aspirants for the favor of the muses. The mould of his early creation was a secondary object with Keats; but it should be borne in mind that good rhymes are common, but men of original poetical power, rare. It is conceded also, that an occasional unauthorized expression must be added to the sin of careless versification. Few critics can be expected to pass, unlashd, such words as "lush," "wingedly," "minish," "graspable," "hoveringly," and the like. He seems to have often written without forethought or revision. There is a very spontaneous air about his long poems. They flow out like a spring set loose, winding along in a vagrant and free course. This kind of poetical audacity is very provoking to critics, and doubtless incited them not a little in their endeavors to crush the new-fledged warbler. Palpable as are the artistical defects of most of the poetry of Keats, its bold and singular beauties are equally apparent. And herein consists the shame of these "invisible infallibilities," as some one calls reviewers,—that with the sense to perceive the crude and incorrect structure, they lacked soul to feel the exquisite sentiment and sweet imagery of these poems. They should have remembered, that a good versifier is no uncommon personage; but a creative genius is not vouchsafed to this planet every day. They should have acknowledged, that study can reform a careless style; but that no such process can give birth to thoughts of poetic beauty. While, as experienced observers, they suggested an improved manner to the young bard, they should have cordially—ay, reverently hailed the credentials Keats proffered of his high mission, and blest the advent of a poet-soul. A few glances over these poems would have furnished rich proofs of their promise, and won attention from their defects. Here and there a loving eye could certainly have discerned perfect gems, even of style, and often perceived a freshness, freedom, and power of fancy, unequalled in English verse. But blind attachment to a school of poetry—as if such a thing were possible—political considerations, the factitious influence of birth, companionship and fortune, were suffered to magnify every fault, and dwarf all excellence. There are those who cannot welcome an angel with ruffled wings!

A casual survey will discover felicitous touches of description, enough to indicate to any candid mind, how full of poetry was the soul of Keats. He speaks of the “patient brilliance of the moon,” “and the quaint mossiness of aged roots.” Whoso feels not the force of such words, will look in vain for the poetic, either in life or literature. Here are a few traces of the footsteps of genius, taken at random, like wild-flowers from among the grass:

—Autumn bold

With universal tinge of sober gold.

Vesper—

Summons all the downiest clouds together
For the sun's purple couch.

Time, that aged nurse,
Rocked me to patience.

Silence came heavily again,
Feeling about for its old couch of space
And airy cradle.

Cold, O! cold indeed
Were her fair limbs, and like a common weed
The sea-swell took her hair.

—ere the hot sun count
His dewy rosary on the eglantine.

Sudden a thought came like a full-blown rose
Flushing his brow, and in his pained heart
Made purple riot.

A lively prelude, fashioning the way
In which the voice should wander.

—the silver flow
Of Hero's tears, the swoon of Imogen,

Fair Pastorella in the handit's den,
Are things to brood on with more ardency
Than the death-day of empires.

He ne'er is crowned
With immortality, who fears to follow
Where airy voices lead.

Now indeed
His senses had swooned off: he did not heed
The sudden silence, or the whispers low,
Or the old eyes dissolving at his woe,
Or anxious calls, or close of trembling palms,
Or maiden's sigh, that grief itself embalms.

Such turns of thought and sweet fancies, and they abound in the poetry of Keats, would suggest to any tasteful and unprejudiced mind, the warmest hopes of poetical success. They occur indeed in the midst of blemishes, and the way to them is sometimes fatiguing; but all the serious deficiencies of the poet flow from the exuberance, rather than the paucity of his gifts. A charge of effeminacy has sometimes been preferred against his warmer pictures and the tone of his sentiment. This is to be ascribed, in a great measure, to his want of bodily energy. A very sensitive and earnest heart in a feeble body, is apt to give birth, in fanciful creations, to an over-softness of portraiture. There is sometimes too much of the languor of reacting passion. Endymion and other of his personages, faint and sleep, and almost “die, like Raphael, in the arms of love.” It is said that Keats acknowledged, with regret, having occasionally written when his mind was not sufficiently braced to its task, and when a luxuriant imagination was suffered to expend itself, unsustained by due judgment. Such lapses were, however, but occasional and temporary. The poet's organization from its very delicacy, seems to have been peculiarly favorable to luxurious impressions. We can easily imagine such a man, basking with delight in the fragrant sunshine of Spring, or wrapt in quiet delight over a Grecian vase or a beautiful countenance. He has one or two festal descriptions which are quite delicious:

—recline

Upon these living flowers. Here is wine Alive with sparkles—never, I aver,
Since Ariadne was a vintager,
So cool a purple: taste these juicy pears,
Sent me by sad Vertumnus, when his fears
Were high about Pomona: here is cream
Deepening to richness from a snowy gleam;
Sweeter than that nurse Almathea skim'd
For the boy Jupiter: and here undimmed
By any touch, a bunch of blooming plums
Ready to melt between an infant's gums:
And here is manna pick'd from Syrian trees
In starlight by the three Hesperides.*

And still she slept an azure-lidded sleep,
In blanchèd linen, smooth and lavender'd,

* Endymion.

While he from forth the closet brought a heap
Of candied apple, quince, and plum and gourd;
With jellies sweeter than the creamy curd,
And lucid syrops tinct with cinnamon;
Manna and dates, in argosy transferr'd
From Fez; and spiced dainties, every one,
From silken Samarcand to cedar'd Lebanon.*

Perhaps, there is more cant than strict truth, in what is often said about the early promise of a poet who dies young. Perhaps we sometimes mistake the fruit for the blossom. What though the minstrel has struck his harp but for an hour! Perchance that brief space has called forth its deepest harmony. What though the early-called has not written an epic or a tragedy! If we look thoughtfully at his lyric or sonnet, we shall discover, it may be, the essence of his genius there preserved. What if he died young? There is a poetry that cannot survive youth. We are ever lamenting that an admired bard does not undertake a great work, when it is more than probable that such an office is not adapted to his powers. Thanatopsis is as precious as if it formed part of some long poem, which few would read. If it is objected that the poetical efforts of our day are fragmentary, let it be remembered that our time, our reading, and our very life, partake of the same character. It is not the amount nor the form, but the intrinsic excellence of poetic creations, which is our highest concern. Some of the most living and true verses in our language, have been written in youth. It is the divine peculiarity of the art that it demands not, but rather repudiates the lessons of life that prudence extols. The young poet sometimes executes what the old philosopher cannot appreciate. In the freshness of the soul are often taken its noblest flights. The dreams of youth are sometimes the most truly glorious efforts of the human mind. The poetry of Keats is not all a "feverish attempt;" it is often a mature result. He has at least left one poem, which, for invention, structure, imagery, and all the elements of the art, is as faultless and as rare a gem as can be found in English literature. Judged by its own law, it is a production of itself sufficient to stamp its author with the name of a poet. If it does not live, it will be because taste and the love of the beautiful have died. The Eve of St. Agnes is a delightful and original performance. What an idea of cold the first stanza conveys:

*St. Agnes' Eve—Ah, bitter chill it was!
The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold;
The hare limp'd trembling through the frozen grass,
And silent was the flock in woolly fold:
Numb were the Beadman's fingers, while he told
His rosary, and while his frosted breath,
Like pious incense from a censer old,
Seem'd taking flight for heaven, without a death,
Past the sweet Virgin's picture, while his prayer he saith.*

This description of moonlight streaming through

* Eve of St. Agnes.

a stained glass-window, is acknowledged to be unrivalled:

*Full on the casement shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast,
As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon:
Rose-bloom fell on her hands, together prest,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory, like a saint:
She seem'd a splendid angel, newly drest,
Save wings, for heaven.*

What poet ever described a maiden unrobing in terms of such delicate yet graphic beauty as these?

*Anon her heart revives: her vespers done,
Of all its wreathed pearls her hair she frees;
Unclasps her warmed jewels one by one;
Loosens her fragrant bodice; by degrees
Her rich attire creeps rustling to her knees:
Half-hidden, like a mermaid in sea-weed,
Pensive awhile she dreams awake, &c.*

Nor is this all. The poet follows the fair creature to her couch, and describes her soul in sleep, as

*Blissfully haven'd both from joy and pain;
Clasp'd like a missal where swart Paynims pray;
Blinded alike from sunshine and from rain,
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud again.*

With this last exquisite metaphor, I take leave of Keats. His genius was a flower of uncommon richness; and, although he meekly laments that it had "no depth to strike in," its bloom and perfume will never cease to charm—for he has truly said, that

A thing of beauty is a joy forever.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART II.

When information was received at Rome of the execution of Sir Thomas More, and Cardinal Fisher, who suffered for their attachment to their ancient religion, and for their steady opposition to any encroachments upon it, the Roman Pontiff, considering it on the part of the English King an inexcusable crime, summoned him and all his adherents, to appear at his capital, within ninety days, to answer for their various offences. Should they not heed this command, they were, one and all, to be excommunicated; the King was to be deprived of his crown, and his kingdom laid under an interdict; his issue by Anne Boleyn was to be declared illegitimate; his leagues with all Catholic Princes to be void; and his kingdom given to any invader. His nobility were commanded to revolt, and his subjects were absolved from their oaths of allegiance; his commerce with foreign States was to be interrupted by any who might choose to do it; and the effects of his subjects, who were to be enslaved, were to be appropriated to the use and benefit of those who might obtain possession of them. These severe ordinances were not to be immediately promulgated to the world; but, being made known to Henry VIII, were held in terrorem over him, to be used in case his future actions required their enforcement. Paul III, in threatening to depose the British King, used only the power which had been conceded to his predecessors for upwards of five hundred years; and instances had repeatedly occurred, as we learn from Burnet's History of the Reformation, not only in Spain and Italy, France and Germany, but also in England, where monarchs had been deposed by popes, and their possessions given to other princes. An instance in point, is that of Childeric III of France, who was dethroned, and his crown bestowed on Pepin. During the reign of Gregory VII, it was assumed "as a right and prerogative of the Papal crown, to remove princes, and absolve subjects from their oaths of allegiance, and set up others in their stead." And it is remarked, that whenever, after that period, any Sovereign went contrary to the wishes of the Pope, his seat on his throne was very precarious; while if he conformed to the Pontiff's request, he was sure, on all occasions, to receive the countenance and support of the Holy See.

Fortunate it was for Henry, that at the time he rebelled from the Pope's authority, and despised his threats, Francis of France and the Spanish Emperor were at war with each other. Their power was so equally balanced, that they could not interfere, even if they had wished, in the affairs of England. The British King was left free to act as he pleased; and, being of a generous disposition and extravagant habits, he made himself beloved by his Parliament; and through their means, he defied the Papal See, and obtained over his subjects an absolute sway.

The only opposition which merited the attention of Henry, was that offered by the friars and priests, who were connected with the numerous nunneries and convents which were scattered over the whole extent of his kingdom.—To frustrate their attempts he appointed Cromwell, who was Secretary of State, to act also as Vicegerent; and by virtue of this new authority, he could name commissioners to visit all the religious houses in England, and make known their abuses. The most active in this service were Layton, London, Gage and Price. Rigid reformists as these men were, and armed with innumerable questions, all tending to entrap unsuspecting nuns and pious priests, they rigidly conformed to the wishes of their Sovereign; consequently, the result of their labors was known even before they had commenced their inquiries.

By the King's command, the doors of all the nunneries were thrown open,—and all the inmates who were under the age of four and twenty, were declared free to leave without the permission of their superiors; their vows being null; as these were taken when they were too young to act and judge for themselves. But as few availed themselves of this liberty, and as the King was desirous of increasing his revenue, he had recourse to his Parliament; which passed a law in February, 1536, by which "three hundred and seventy-six monasteries were suppressed; and their revenues, amounting to upwards of thirty-two thousand pounds a year," were granted to the Crown, as were also all their plate and other goods, which were reckoned at half a million of dollars more. Some few monks, who had their property confiscated, threw themselves on the mercy of their monarch, and received small pensions from the wrecks of their general ruin. Burnet states, that, by the destruction of these lesser monasteries, they all being under a thousand dollars yearly rent, ten thousand monks were, from a state of comparative ease, thrown upon the world as mendicants, not having the means wherewith to get their daily bread. While we will allow that many of the priests were of dissolute habits, and that many of the nuns in different convents were frail in their characters; yet it is evident, in this general persecution, that many of those who suffered were religious people, who lived a life of seclusion, and were principally engaged in assisting the poor as far as their limited means would allow. The assertion in Parliament of Stokely, bishop of London, who strongly advocated the suppression of all the monasteries in England, "that the lesser houses were as thorns soon plucked up; but the great abbots were like petrified old oaks; yet they must needs follow; and so would others do in Christendom before many years were passed," was not long in being verified. The abbots of the larger convents, fearing that if the King was suffered to remain quiet, he might turn his attention towards them, created at one time a general rebellion among the people, which at first appeared of a serious nature. But by the exertions of the Duke of Norfolk, the risings in the different counties were quelled; and the leaders of them, Lords Darcy and Hussy, with one Ask, a gentleman who had evinced in the rebellion much perseverance and courage, were executed.

When Henry received information that the rebels had been kept in arms, by the assistance of some of the monks, who had not only yielded all their revenues, but had even melted the plate belonging to their monasteries for this unlawful purpose, he appointed a committee to inquire into the state of these institutions, and to learn if the rumors which had reached him of their treason were true. By the report of these commissioners, and from some records now in existence, it would appear that much was discovered which was derogatory to the character of Christians. Among others, the confessions of the Prior and Benedictines of a convent in Northampton, were the most remarkable. They stated, that they had not only neglected the worship of God, but had lived in idleness, gluttony, and sensuality; and for thus doing, they feared the "Pit of Hell" was ready to swallow them up. A suit also, which was instituted in a court at this time, created no little excitement against the monks; and without reason, as he only who committed the crime should have been punished—but in those days the sin of one was visited on all. From the report of the trial, it would appear, that on some persons entering the convent of the "Crossed Friars," in London, at eleven o'clock in the morning, they discovered the Prior in bed with a prostitute;—he, kneeling down, begged that the circumstance might not be made known;—but, as the bribe of sixty pounds, which he promised to give to those who discovered him in his unpleasant situation, was not forthcoming, the fact became generally known. The King, that he might, with a show of more justice, suppress the convents, had every thing circulated which could tend to injure the character of these institutions. "Battle Abbey," with "Christ Church," in Canterbury, and several other places, were publicly declared to be little Sodoms,—and the complaint of the Abbess of Chepstow, that Dr. London had attempted to corrupt her nuns, was also as generally told. By these means, the public mind was prepared for the suppression of the convents and monasteries; and, when the order appeared from the King for that purpose, there was but little opposition shown to the measure.

While these things were going on in England, the Pope was not idle. Publications were continually appearing at Rome, in which Henry was termed a "second Pharoah, Nero, Diocletian, or Belshazzar, and the veriest tyrant who ever wore a crown." All his proceedings against the monks and priests, whom he had attainted and executed for high treason, were represented as the effects of savage and barbarous cruelty; and his suppressing the monasteries, and devouring what the devotion of former ages had consecrated to God and his saints was termed "ravenous, and impious sacrilege." But with all these denunciations, the Roman Pontiff was not content—for he came out with his bull of deposition, the substance of which we have previously given. Many historians have denied the fact that this document ever appeared; but, in this statement, they have erred; as it will now be found to exist entire in "Cherubio's Bullarum Romanum," a work which is well deserving of an attentive perusal for the many interesting papers which it contains, relating to the Papal See, both before and after the period to which we now have reference.*

* As an instance of the mutability of fortune, it is worthy of note, that the noble family from which L'Isle Adam was descended, continued to exist in France at the end of the

Thus fully have we entered into the history of the English reformation; as after Paul III, no one witnessed its progress more anxiously, or suffered more from its result than did L'Isle Adam of Malta. The distinguished Order over which he presided, acknowledged the Pope as its head; and whatever emanated from his holiness, was to receive implicit obedience. The enemies of the Pope, were the friends of Henry; while the friends of Paul, were the enemies of the British King: and grievously were the Knights of St. John made to suffer for their attachment. The British monks held large possessions in England; and, when the monasteries were suppressed, their revenues were seized by Henry; and most of the Hospitallers, from enjoying large fortunes, were thrown upon the charities of their friends; while some few became the servile pensioners of the Crown. Sir William Weston, "who, as the Prior of London, sat on an equality with the first Baron in the realm," was offered by the King a pension of a thousand pounds a year; but, of this sum, he would never receive a shilling; and, from grief, occasioned by his own misfortunes, and those of his friends, he shortly after died. In Brayley's Londoniana, it is stated that this nobleman was buried in the chancel of the old church of "St. James," Clerkenwell—and that on his tomb he was represented as an emaciated figure in a winding sheet. When some improvements rendered it necessary to open the grave in 1788, his remains were found to be in a state not unlike the figure which had been sculptured on the tomb which covered him.

Some of the English Knights, from their rigid adherence to their faith, suffered by the axe of the executioner. Four are named, who thus died, viz: Ingley, Forest, Fortescue, and Bohus. Mytton and Waldegrave died in a dungeon; while Richard and James Bell, John Noel, and many others who were in the greatest distress, abandoned their country and fled to Malta. In 1534, by an act of Parliament, the Order of St. John was abolished in England. It is told, much to the credit of the Order, that the English refugees were pitied for their sufferings, and relieved from their wants; and one historian asserts, that it was the care and anxiety to which the rigorous measures of Henry VIII gave birth, that bent the gray hairs of the Grand-Master in sorrow to the grave. L'Isle Adam expired on the twenty-first of August, 1534, and on the tomb of this great man were these simple words engraven:

"Hic jacet virtus, victrix fortunæ."

We take leave of the history of this Prince with regret; his long reign was marked with checkered seventeenth century, but so reduced in circumstances, that a gentleman of the name became a common carter in the neighborhood of Troyes, in Champagne, to support his aged father.—L'Art de vérifier les Dates.

and trying scenes, and in them all, he proved himself a Christian, and has left no one action on record which can be told to his disgrace. Were it but for his determined defence of Rhodes alone, the name of L'Isle Adam deserves to be borne in honorable remembrance, and to give him a place in the history of the Order, which few have ever obtained.

For these facts we are mainly indebted to "Knolles' History of the Turkish Empire," "Burnet's History of the English Reformation," "Hume's History of England," and Bosio's, Boisgelin's, Vertot's, and Alexander's Histories of the Knights of St. John.

Fra Pierino del Ponte of the language of Italy, Bailiff of Santa Euphemia, and uncle to Pope Julius III., was elected as Grand-Master at Malta to succeed L'Isle Adam on the 26th of August, 1534. As the reign of this Prince, who accepted of his appointment with regret, was but of fourteen months and twenty-two days continuance, he had not much opportunity of distinguishing himself, and indeed but little is mentioned in his history which is worthy of notice.

Hariadenus Barbarossa, King of Algiers, and Praefect of Solyman in Africa, being emboldened by his successes in Italy, Spain and Sardinia, was making preparations to invade Sicily, and attempt the conquest of Naples. This movement, Charles V was resolved to thwart, by becoming the aggressor, and obliging the noted pirate to remain at his capital and defend his usurped possessions in Barbary.

Hariadenus was the younger of two brothers, ignobly born of a renegade Greek at Mytilene, the capital of the Island of Lesbo. Of a cruel disposition, and weary of an idle life, he, in company with his brother, and unknown to his father, stole a galliot, with which they put to sea. Meeting with Camales, a noted corsair, they leagued themselves to his fortunes. Horrucus, the elder, soon distinguished himself by his activity and bravery. He became a Captain to command many men, who afterwards were chronicled among the most celebrated warriors of the Ottoman empire.

It was during these piratical expeditions, that Sinan, the Smyrnaote Jew, first was known.

Horrucus, after cruising a time in the Mediterranean, taking various prizes, and making many slaves, went into Algiers, and offered his services, and those of his fleet, to Selymes, the King of Cæsaria. This monarch was at war with his brother, Mechenetes; who, assisted by the Arabs, was attempting to get possession of his throne; and it was only by the aid of this new ally, that he was enabled to rout his enemies, and enjoy his kingdom in peace. Selymes, being of an amiable and unsuspecting character, unfortunately made Horrucus one of his chief councillors and most intimate friend. It was not until the moment of his death,— being strangled while in his bath,—that he was aware of the fatal error he had committed in putting so much confidence in a renegade villain, who commenced as a thief, and was aiming at his crown.

Horrucus, after the murder of Seylmes, and several others who had pretensions to the throne, caused himself to be proclaimed King of Algiers: this, with the assistance of his nine thousand Turkish soldiers and seamen, he easily effected. Some few Numidian chiefs, who could not be induced either by threats or force, to acknowledge him as their lawful monarch, were bribed with the treasure of him he had deposed, to submit to his authority, and aid him with their forces. The reign of the usurper however was short. Before his good fortune failed him, he drove the Spaniards from the city of Bugea, and routed their General, Diego de Vara, before the walls of Algiers. He also compelled Hugo Moncada, who landed in Barbary when on his way from Italy to Spain, quickly to embark his forces, and put to sea. This fleet being shortly after overtaken by a heavy gale, was mostly lost. The crews of the vessels which were driven on shore, were, as they landed, immediately slain, or chained in the Turkish galleys.

Horrucus, ever ambitious, in attempting to extend his conquests, lost his kingdom and his life. When making an attack on the fortresses of Ora and Portus, strongly garrisoned, and bravely defended by Spaniards and Moors, he was completely routed; so fierce a pursuit was made, that he was overtaken while attempting to fly with a few friends,—his enemies not stopping to gather the pieces of gold, which he threw on the sands to tempt them to dismount, and thereby assist him in making his escape. Being immediately decapitated, his head was taken on a lance through all the principal seaport towns of Spain, to the great joy of the inhabitants, who had so severely suffered from his piracies and cruelty.

Horrucus being dead, his brother Hariadenus succeeded him on his throne by common consent; and in a brief period so distinguished himself, by his various captures at sea, and numerous conquests on shore, that he was feared in all the christian countries and islands of the Mediterranean.

The Sultan, Selyman, being engaged in his Persian wars, Charles V of Spain made known to his allies his intention of raising a large army; with which, in person, he intended to invade Africa, and chastise the insolent Horrucus, by driving him out of all his usurped possessions. So popular with all powers was this proposition of the Spanish Emperor, that in a few months he was joined in his intended expedition by seventeen galleys from Genoa and Liguria; five and twenty caravels and one huge Galeon under the Portuguese flag, commanded in person by Lewis, the brother of the King; by sixty large ships from Flanders; ten vessels sent by Paul III, Bishop of Rome; and four gallees of the Order of St. John, with the large carrack, formidable from the valor of the Knights who were on board to defend them. Although the destination of this huge fleet was so generally known by all Christians, yet singular it is, that the first intimation which Barbarossa received of it, was from the Moors, who spied it from the watch towers on the hills of Utica. It was then standing towards the African shore, against a light and southerly wind.

When Horruccius observed in the offing at Tunis, upwards of seven hundred sail, and among them eighty-two large gallees, all densely filled with people, and dressed with their flags and pendants, he was sorely troubled. Calling around him his chief captains, when he heard from some Mahomedan slaves, who at night escaped from their confinement, that Charles was on board the Admiral's ship, he addressed them in words of much encouragement, and to the following effect: Even if our enemies be so numerous, why should they be to us a cause of alarm? Have they not come hither to fight in a country which is to them unknown? Where will they be able to procure provisions for such a multitude? And how will they guard against the frequent attacks of our Numidian horse, when suffering from the heat of our summer sun, and struggling under their heavy armor, knee-deep in our light and burning sand? Of this be assured, that so long as this war shall continue, you shall neither be in want of food, of arms, or of my constant aid; to you will my old armories be opened, my magazines be broached, and my treasures be given. One thing only I would urge upon your attention, which is, never to yield the fortress of Goletta; for that will doubtless be the point of our enemies' attack; upon the safety of that castle, depends the preservation of Tunis and our kingdom.

Of all the valiant captains whom Barbarossa addressed, the first in importance, for his age and experience in war, was Sinam, the one-eyed Smyrnaote Jew, whom we have before named; and who, for one of his deeds, deserves a long remembrance. After him, came Haidimus of Cilicia—who, for his bravery and impetuosity in fight, was surnamed Cacciadiabolo. There were also numbered among the barbarians, as men of great renown for their deeds in war, Salec of Ionia, Tabacches of Laodicea, and Giaffer a Janizary.

When the Christian fleet had been safely moored near the shore, Charles made a signal for his army to land: this naturally difficult and dangerous movement, was effected with the utmost regularity. The Moors who had gathered on the beach to impede the landing of the soldiers, were so alarmed at their hideous cries, and at the precision with which they discharged their musquetry, that they, in the greatest disorder, hastily retired. The Spanish General leisurely selected his position, and with such trifling opposition, as hardly to lose a man from his command.

When an army is safely landed under the walls of a besieged town, half its conquest is gained. Deeply did Horruccius regret his not having opposed the disembarkation of the Spaniards, Italians and Germans, when too late to remedy the fatal error, which he had so ignorantly and inexcusably committed.

Charles having advanced his army as near to the castle of Goletta as was necessary to commence his military operations, he gave the command of the most exposed position to the Count of Saire, an Italian of an ancient family, and much distinguished for his martial prowess at the battle of Corona. At this appointment of danger and honor, the haughty Spaniards were much enraged. Hardly had the Count, with his companies, advanced to the mount, which he had by the Commander-in-Chief been chosen to defend, ere Salec made a desperate sally from the fortress upon his troops; and then feigning as if he would retreat, drew the Italians into the plain and completely routed them, turning suddenly upon the Christians, when they were supposing themselves victorious and scattered in hot pursuit. The Count of Sarne, with his kinsman Belingerius, covered with wounds, and scorning to retreat, fell bravely fighting at the head of their soldiers. The result of this conflict was as grievous to the Italians as joyful to the Infidels. The Spaniards carried their jealousy so far, that they were rather pleased than chagrined at the defeat of their allies; which, it is stated, they might have easily prevented, had they been thus inclined. As idle spectators, they remained on the field of battle, and saw their friends discomfited and slain. The head and right hand of the Italian Count, were sent by Salec as trophies to Barbarossa.

Knolle, whose history of this war we continually consult, supposing it to be the most authentic, justly observes that it oftentimes so falleth out, that whilst men laugh at their neighbors' harms, their own are not far off; so it chanced with the Spaniards. Tabacches, another barbarian chief, emboldened at the success of Salec, sallied out of the garrison at the dawn of day with a chosen body of men; and so suddenly did they pass the trenches, and so secretly did they come upon their enemies, that many of the Spaniards were slain in their sleep; while others, stupified with fear, were shot and sabred, without making the least resistance, as they vainly attempted to escape. So great was this alarm at first, that the Emperor in person hastened in his armor, to assist his retreating troops; and severely did he chide them for their inattention and cowardice. When order was restored, Vastius, the Spanish General, summoned all his chief officers in council; and addressed them in these words :

"Friends; you seem to me at this time to have need to be called upon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approved valor; for, as far as I can see, the remembrance of your ancient fame is, in you, grown altogether cold; your hands have become faint for fear; and your bosoms heartless, showing no courage for the subduing of these naked pirates. Yesterday, as many say, you smiled at the unskilful and unfortunate forwardness of your friends; for which they have paid dearly; but to-day, your enemies laugh at your degenerate, careless negligence. So that it concerneth you in honor, to blot out this foul and public disgrace by some notable and worthy exploit. Wherefore I expect, and I straightly charge and command you, that with all speed you prepare both your minds and your weapons for the achievement of some new honor;—if the proud enemy shall again presume to come forth and assail your trenches, you shall forthwith break out upon him, and beat him back even unto the gates of Goletta."

The officers, touched by this address of their General, and mortified at their pusillanimous conduct, as shown before their Emperor, swore on their honors to lay aside all jealousy and animosity one with the other; and to prove themselves hereafter in battle, by their manly carriage, as brave and valiant men.

While the Spaniards were indulging themselves under their tents to avoid the heat of a burning mid-day sun, Giaffer, a chief of great personal strength and daring courage, made a sortie from the castle upon them, with a body of Janizaries, and several companies of Moorish archers. So unexpected was this attack, that the Christians had not the least intimation of their danger, until the shot and arrows of their enemies were flying among them. With the sound of the drum, the Spaniards rallied, and made a desperate defence. Giaffer, like a warrior, fell dead, pierced with two bullets in the foremost of the fight. His Janizaries, as men who knew not how to retreat, while vainly attempting to remove his corse, covered it with their own bodies, and with those of their enemies who had prevented them from carrying their object into effect. The Moors fled to the gates of Goletta; but so closely did the Italians follow, that the Arabs, who were in the rear, could not enter the castle; those who were in the garrison being compelled suddenly to close the gates, for fear the Christians might enter with them. Neither could the Turks fire their ordnance on their foes as they approached; as at every discharge their friends would have also been killed; so mingled were the combatants in this cruel conflict. The soldiers of Vastius suffered severely as they retired, leaving many of their comrades dead. The victors in this fight could claim but little honor for their conquest, as those who made the attack were few, and fought against an encamped army of many thousand men.

Charles having resolved after various consultations with his officers to storm the castle, ordered his galleys to be moored nearer the shore that their fire might be the more destructive.

On the twenty-fifth of July, when every preparation had been made, both at sea and on shore, the bombardment commenced; it did not cease until several breaches had been made in the walls, through which the Spanish General commanded his troops, whom he had divided into three corps, "to advance and enter."

In this assault, the Maltese monks greatly distinguished themselves; not waiting for their boats to reach the shore, they jumped into the sea and swam to the place of their landing. Forming under a heavy fire, and commanded by their standard-bearer, they immediately advanced—passed through the breach, and, planting their flag on the walls of the castle, gave the first intimation to the Christians in the fleet of the capture of the place. Most of the Knights who engaged in this conflict were slain, only two escaped unhurt.

Though the fortress was soon captured, yet the garrison made a glorious defence. Never, at any one time, had Sinam, the Jew Governor, more than six thousand men; yet, with this small number, he had made three sorties, in two of which he had been victorious; and in the third, though defeated, he was not disgraced. He defended Goletta for many days against the united force of the finest soldiers of Italy, Spain and Germany. With the loss of five hundred of his garrison, he returned to Tunis.

Barbarossa felt the loss of Galetta most grievously; as, by its reduction, his squadron of "eighty-seven galleys and galliots, his arsenal and three hundred brass cannon," fell into the hands of the Emperor. Rather would he have had Sinam and all his men buried under the ruins of the castle, than that they should, as he said, have so quickly, and so disgracefully, left their quarters. The Jew, enraged at being chided, where he thought he deserved applause, quickly replied, that neither did his captains, soldiers nor himself, think they had done wrong in quitting the place. "They were exposed," said he, "to the devil and his infernal furies, who came against them with flames of fire and earthquakes—things of extreme terror and danger. So long as they had to fight with mortals, they conducted themselves like valiant men, as he well knew, and which they would prove by their aid in helping him to retain his city and his throne."

Muleasses, the exiled King of Tunis, who had been deposed by Barbarossa, wearing his crown, and dressed in his rich robes of flowered silk, made his appearance at this time before the Emperor, by whom he was most graciously received.

Being seated, he, through his interpreter, made a long and complimentary speech, and finished by craving the assistance of Charles to reinstate him in his kingdom.

This Prince, who is represented as having been a tall and handsome man, was one of the younger of thirty-four sons, whom Mahmed, the last Tunisian King, had by many different wives. His aged father promised his mother to make Muleasses his successor. This Prince, to make assurance doubly sure, poisoned Mahmed, and murdered all his brothers, save one Alraschid, who fled among the Arabs; and with their assistance, attempted to recover his possessions. After meeting with various reverses, and fearing that his soldiers would prove traitors and deliver him into the hands of his brother, he unfortunately delivered himself to Barbarossa; he was persuaded to go to Constantinople, being flattered with the hope that the Sultan would assist him in obtaining the fulfilment of his wishes. A vain hope; for Solyman put him into his seraglio; and of him, nothing more was ever heard.

When the Emperor was passing into Goletta through one of the breaches, by which the place had been captured, he observed to Muleasses—here is a gate open to you by which you shall return, and take possession of your throne. This promise he was shortly after enabled to fulfil.

Barbarossa, who had been reinforced by large bodies of Arab foot and Numidian horse, and fearing that his army would not undergo the privations of a siege, resolved to risk his all on the fortune of a pitched battle. Calling his councillors together, he made known his determination; and, prior to his leaving the city, recommended the destruction of six or eight thousand Christian slaves, whom he held as prisoners in his castle. Sinam, the Jew, as strongly applauded his intention of fighting, as he condemned his proposition to immolate his captives. In this opinion he was ably seconded by other Turkish officers; and thus their lives were most miraculously and mercifully preserved.

THE WEEPING WILLOW.

Deep mourner of the buried dead,
Thy instincts seem to be with grief—
In sadness, bows thy lowly head,
And wailing is in ev'ry leaf.

Thy drooping head so lowly hangs,
No upward look it seems to brave—
Subdued, it stoops to earth with pangs,
And weeps and grows o'er friendship's grave.

In Autumn's robes, thy tributes fall,
Like tears from hanging clouds of gloom—
Cluster'd, they spread their faded pall,
And sleep like death upon the tomb.

Where thou hast watch'd so long, so true,
There too, thy graceful form shall sleep:
Then, tears of night will fall in dew,
And Angels come thy place to keep.

ARABIAN LITERATURE.

PAPER FIFTH.

THE MOALLAKATS.

In resuming the consideration of the poems entitled the Moallakat or Suspended, it is proper that we should apologize to our readers for suspending the stylus for so great a length of time. Circumstances beyond our control, have prevented our devoting the time to the subject that was necessary for the preparation of the several articles. We hope now to find sufficient leisure to pursue our literary inclinations; and shall proceed regularly with our labors until the contemplated series of papers be completed. In the present article we shall record our impressions of the three pannels of the sacred gate of the Kaaba, devoted to Taraffa, Antar and Zohair.

TARAFFA.

The incident that gave rise to this poem, will be an illustration of the character of the author. A herd of camels was the joint property of the brothers Taraffa and Mabea, who attended them on alternate days. The beauties of nature, however, and the abstractions of poesy, had more charms for Tariffa than the watching of camels; and when it came to his turn to take charge of the herd, he would not unfrequently pass his time in wandering through the wood, "muttering wayward fancies;" or,

At the foot of some tall nodding beach,
That wreathed its old fantastic root so high,
His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
And pour upon the brook that bubbled by.

Aware of the danger to which his carelessness exposed the herd, Mabea often reproved him for his inattention; and demanded whether his powers of song could bring the camels back again, if their enemies should make a descent upon them, and carry them off while they were thus neglected. Remonstrance however was in vain, for Taraffa was as careless as ever.

Towards the evening of a day which he had spent in the enchantments of song, he sallied out to look after his camels; and found to his inexpressible surprise, that the whole herd was swept away by the Modarites. He applied to Malec, his cousin, for aid to recover the camels—but he met only the most bitter reproaches. He then applied to others of his tribe for assistance—but was rebuked for his idleness, prodigality, and libertinism. He was told that he was a disgrace to the tribe to which he belonged; and that his ill-behavior was always giving occasion to trouble and difficulty. Finding all against him, he turned upon them, and, like a lion at bay, repelled their attacks. He replied to their reproaches in the poem which we are about to notice—declaimed loudly in favor of his fortitude, liberality and military prowess; and openly gloried in his conviviality and voluptuousness. He opposes his own generous disposition to the unkindness of Malec, contrasts his generosity with the niggardliness of his father, and expostulates with all for their harshness—telling them that “the cruelty of relations gives keener anguish to a noble breast than the stroke of an Indian cimeter.” Towards the close of the poem he passes a high eulogium on an aged chief that was in the assembly, who was so much pleased with the poem, or at least with that part which compliments himself, that he makes the poet a present of one hundred camels; and thus proves that his poetry was able to restore what was lost.

The opening of the poem is pathetic. The author fancies himself standing by the ruins where the tent of Khaula had stood—and recalls to mind the day when the litters that bore the fair away, fluttered in the wind like the sails of the fleet ships. Khaula means the tender fawn; and it is on this account that he says there was a dark-eyed antelope among the tribe. The poem is written in couplets, and we have translated it in the same manner. We shall present our readers with a few extracts:

All desolate is Khaula's home, and the mournful ruins stand
On Tahmed's hills, like fading figures traced upon the sand.

When Malec's tribe o'er Deda spread, the litters with silken veils
That bore the fair, resembled ships with fluttering, painted sails.

Aduli's ships, or the barks that bear the merchant Yamin's stores,
And fly direct o'er the middle sea, or veer the nearer shores.
Proud ships that cleave with their brazen beaks the waves and frosted spray,
As a boy, with his hand, divides a heap of sand in sportive play.

A dark-eyed antelope was there with lips of a ruby dye,
And a graceful neck, where topazes and pearls in circles lie,

She strays away 'mid the forest lawns and feeds with the herd of roes,
And mantles herself with a nest of leaves where the golden fruitage grows.

She smiles and displays teeth that rise from their bases to the view,
Like privet flowers from the pure white sand, all moistened o'er with dew.

His brilliant water the sun hath given to the teeth in circling rows,
But not to the base of lead-like hue, where the spotless ivory grows.

From a notice of his mistress, the poet passes on to the next object of interest to an Arab—his camel—the excellence of which he celebrates in no less than twenty-eight verses. Many of the figures introduced are of a singular nature, but as we think they would not be very interesting to an occidental, we will content ourselves with the tail of the description, which happens to be the tail of the animal:

The lash resounds, she quickens her pace, and the sultry vapors spread
In wave-like rings, where the burning sands recede from her airy tread.

She spreads her flowing tail on the wind and proudly floats along,
As a dancing girl her vesture spreads, when she floats to the festal song.

We shall conclude our notice of the poem by the introduction of couplets in which the poet enumerates three pleasures, without which life would be to him a grievous burden—the drinking of wine before his censorious father and brother were awake in the morning—the succoring of a warrior encompassed with foes—and dallying with a beautiful girl beneath a tent supported by pillars:

To rise ere the censurers awake, and quaff the tawny wine,
Which froths and sparkles when poured in the cup, like jewels in the mine.

To bend to a warrior girl with foes, my steed fleet as the air,
And fierce as a wolf, 'mid the Gadha trees, when started from his lair.

To shorten a dark and cloudy day beneath the pillared shade,
By toying with the flowing curls of a lovely, slender maid;
Whose bracelets, and whose garters seem to hang on the polished stems
Of the Oshar trees, or the ricineis with its leafy diadems.

ANTAR.

Of all the heroes of Arabia, none have been more frequently the subject of the evening tale, the ballad, and the romance than Antar. His exploits occupy the same place in the legendary history of Arabia, that the expedition of Bacchus does in that of Egypt, or the labors of Hercules in the mythological annals of Greece, wherein truth and fiction are blended together; and events seen through the dim mists of ages, are shadowy in outline, and magnified in size. The present poem, which forms a part of the literary wealth of the Kaaba, is not to be confounded with a romance in several volumes, which was composed indeed by Antar, and which celebrates his own exploits; but was first committed to writing in the time of Haroun Al Raschid by Asmai, a learned theologian and grammarian. The poem which we are about to notice contains only eighty-one verses, and has reference to some of the events which transpired during the war that raged between the tribes of Abs and Dhobyar for forty years, and is known as the "War of the Racehorses." It arose in consequence of a dispute that took place in the contested race between the famous steeds Dahes and Ghabra.

The poem is discursive, and impatient of rule as the fiery barb of the desert—now indignantly boastful—now fierce and sanguinary,—at times descriptive, and again amatory and elegiac. The poet, at the opening of the poem, addresses the deserted bower of Abia, and laments the separation which he is doomed to endure—but as the martial portions of the poem will be more in accordance with the character of the author, and will vary the character of the extracts, we will present our readers with a few verses from the close of the poem. The part, in which he boasts that he had left Demdem, "a victim to be mangled by the lions of the wood and the eagles advanced in years," and fears that death may surprise him ere he has slain Hasein and Harem, the sons of Demdem, who had calumniated him, exhibits a spirit inveterately cruel and revengeful:

In the gulf of the fight when the battle grew warm,
Where the warriors plunged fearless with shadowy form,
Like a ship in the depths of the billowy storm;

When my tribe 'gainst the spears of the foemen has made
A shield of my breast, I was never afraid,
With no friend by my side, but my own shining blade.

Then my brave uncle's counsels this bosom has steeled,
When the loud din of Morra was heard in the field;
And the thick dust the sons of Rabeia revealed:

When the shoutings of Dhobol were heard from afar,
And, like sharp-biting lions when roused from the lair,
The troops fierce in conflict, rushed on to the war:

Then the mildest of tribes heard the battle-field's din,
And saw 'neath their standards, the skirmish begin,
And the havoc of death, where life's beauty had been;

Then I knew, while the legions thus thronged on the plain,
That blows on the helmets would patter like rain;
And from each cloven skull fly the birds of the brain.

When our enemies came in their pride, with the glance
Of the gold-studded banner and silvery lance,
I was first to rush forward, and lead the advance;

Shouting, Antar! the troops strove to rival my deed,
Whilst the enemy thrust, 'gainst the chest of my steed,
The sharp-bearded points of the longest jerreed.

Yet I still urged the foe with the charger I rode,
While the spear-opened fountain in purple streams flowed,
Till his neck and his breast were all mantled in blood.

With the lance in his forehead, my steed turned again,
And his moaning and tears well attested his pain;
Had he speech, he had uttered a soul-moving strain.

'Mid the black dust that rose from the myriad throng Rushed the horses, with faces disfigured, along—
Each stallion robust, and each mare that was strong.

Then my spirit was healed of its anguish and pain,
When the shout pealed aloud, of my warrior train,
Crying "Well done, Antara! Hurrah! Charge again!"

The boldness of the simile in the first verse which we have extracted, cannot fail to strike the reader—and however poorly it may be expressed in the translation, is still sublime in its associations. How well the "perilous ridges of battle" may be compared to the billows of the excited deep,—restless—heaving—tumultuous;—and the majestic form of the plumed warrior, now lost in the depths of the fight, now towering above the piles of dead and dying,—to the tall ship now sinking into the abyss, and again rising in sublime power above the waves of destruction. It was a favorite superstition with the older Arabs, that the Manah, a spirit in the form of a bird, resided in the brain: and that at death it rested upon the grave of the person departed, and mourned there till the general resurrection. It is to this that reference is made in the sixth verse of the present extracts.

ZOHAIR.

The "War of the Racehorses" also gave rise to this poem. When the contending tribes had grown weary of the contest, a treaty of peace was proposed and accepted. But Hosim, whose Harem had been slain by Ward, an Absite, had taken an oath that he would not bathe his head in water, till he had slain Ward or one of his near kinsmen. Not long after, he was enabled to bathe his head, after satiating his vengeance on a lineal descendant of Taleb, the common ancestor of the two tribes. After the short-lived peace, war blazed forth again; but as the hostile tribes were approaching each other in martial array, two chiefs of the tribe of Dhobal, named Hareth and Harem, determined to make an effort to prevent the effusion of blood. The son of Hareth was accordingly sent with one hundred camels to Rabeia, the Prince of the Absites, with this message—"That the hundred camels were sent as an expiatory atonement for the death of their countryman; and that it was hoped they would prefer the milk of the camels to the blood of the Absites. Rabeia conferred with the chiefs of his tribe, and finding them willing to accept the atonement for the infraction of the former treaty, confirmed peace with the Absites, which was thereafter faithfully preserved. To commemorate this event, Zohair, an aged poet, composed a panegyric on Hareth and Harem in the poem which bears his name. The opening of the poem is elegiac, and is addressed to the deserted mansion of Ommanfia, which has become "like the fading blue stains of wood, or the veins of the wrist." As he muses on the ruins, he seems to contemplate a troop of dromedars moving over the plain, and among them describes his mistress. He traces their route by "the locks of stained wool that fall from their carriages, and resemble the uncrushed berries of the nightshade," until they come to the valley of Ras; and immediately passes to an eulogium on the peaceful interference of Hareth and Harem, which took place in this valley. He praises the peacemakers—vituperates Hasein—speaks of the miseries of war—and closes with many sage aphorisms befitting his years, and not dissimilar to the "golden sentences" of Ecclesiastes. We will extract a portion of that which relates to the chiefs. The opening of the poem is, however, the most characteristic and beautiful; but we have had similar extracts from the former poems:

I have sworn by the sacred edifice; I have sworn by the holy shrine,

Where the Koreish and Jorham's sons move in a festal line.

I have sworn to give the illustrious pair the praise that is their meed,

Who have shown their princely excellence in every noble deed.

Hail chiefs! who Abs and Dholyan in a chain of friendship bound,

When Minsham's deadly perfumes shed their poisonous breath around.

You said, by peace, on a perfect base we will found the public good,

Though the price of the precious boon should be our treasure, sweat and blood.

Proud chiefs of Maad's princely ranks! May bliss your footsteps guide!

Who have oped for your country glory's gates, should yourselves be glorified.

When war, the direful fiend, was expelled from your plains, she was clothed with shame;

But she brandished again her red right hand, when you kindled anew her flame.

She ground you then as the millstone doth grind, with its nether stone, the corn;

Like a camel pregnant she became; and twins to her were born:

Distress and ruin were her twins: monsters deformed they lay,

As the dun camel Aad had, with sinews bent to slay.

The next paper will conclude the Moallakats, and will exhibit the finest specimens of the poems that adorn the temple. The mellifluous sweetness of Lebeid, the fire of Hareth, and the Anacreontic spirit of Amru, are each in its kind worthy of all praise.

TO ———.

"You! oh you, so perfect and so peerless,
Are created of every creature's best."—Shakspeare.

I've gazed on Beauty since we met,

On sylph-like forms and brows of snow,
And melting eyes of blue and jet—

Their beams dispensing joy or wo,—
On all they smil'd, or else might frown;
Yet none as beauteous as thine own.

I've gazed on lips, whose charms might tempt

The cloistered monk to leave his shrine,
Sweeter than e'er be Poet dreamt—

Yet none to me so sweet as thine;

And voices light as Peris' songs,

Have often thrill'd upon my ear—

Spell-bound, enchanting list'ning throngs;

Yet are thy Syren tones more dear.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

The interests of literary publications and institutions are inseparable. Without education, works will neither be written nor appreciated, and one of the chief objects of periodicals should be to uphold and promote the institutions of learning. The University of Virginia is emphatically the institution of the South, as will appear from an inspection of her catalogues. Her alumni are scattered over nearly half the States of the Union; but, wherever they may be, their hearts must yearn towards their alma mater; and their minds must turn with fond recollection to the time spent within her walls. Recalling the pleasures of that joyous season, and daily reaping the fruits of the instruction there received, they can but feel a lively interest in her prosperity. To them and to all your numerous readers, I would make your valuable work, the "Messenger," bear the claims which she now has upon their sympathy and action. Yours is truly the Southern Literary Messenger; and through no other channel can the claims of the University be more properly presented. To the North, too, we would send the name of our University; for we would be glad to see many of the sons of the Northern states in Southern colleges. Whilst the Union exists, (and may it forever,) it should be cherished; and in no way can more lasting and endearing ties be formed,—ties which will bind us to the soil over which we have roamed, to the companions with whom we have trod the paths of knowledge, to the state which has reared institutions for the improvement of our youthful minds, and to all who have extended to us the hand of fellowship, kindness and hospitality. Your magazine is rapidly extending its circulation in the Northern and Middle states, and drawing many of their ablest writers into the list of its contributors. It may therefore well be made the means of rightly informing the many there, as to the true rank and character of our state institution.

The loss of Professors Bonnycastle and Davis, gave the University just cause to mourn. They were among her chief supports, and were taken away in the meridian of their usefulness. We cannot forbear a slight tribute to their memory.

Mr. Bonnycastle was one of the early professors who came over from England with Mr. Gilmer in 1824. Though young, his high qualifications fitted him alike for several of the chairs in the University. He first filled that of Natural Philosophy, and, on the return of Mr. Key to England, succeeded to the mathematical, which he filled with preëminent ability up to the time of his death. He was always acknowledged to be the possessor of a great mind, which readily made him master of the most abstruse learning. The study of mathematics seemed to be to him but a process of attentive reading. As a lecturer, he was clear, patient and powerful; and, in matters of science, he was a complete agrarian, levelling its difficulties to the comprehension of every mind. At times, in one short aphorism, he would display a profundity of thought quite startling; and his students declared, that, by way of illustration, he frequently solved difficulties which had perplexed them in other branches of their studies. Mathematics was rendered by him, what he repeatedly said it was, "a pure system of logic." Many parts of his course were supplied by himself; and he wrote a text book for his class, which gained him great renown.

It has been already stated, that his acquirements were not confined to his own department; nor were they even to science. He was fond of rambling through the rich and varied fields of literature, and culled their fair flowers with no little taste and judgment. His general reading was extensive, he was a graceful and an imaginative writer, as is shown by the few productions which he has left, and his conversation was unusually entertaining and instructive. In society and at home, he was often taciturn; and it was only at certain times that he opened his stores of information; but when he did, he never failed to charm and to surprise. He was a man of thought, rather than of feeling, and, though he was observant of his duty, and mindful of his obligations, he acted more from the convictions of a well-regulated mind, than from any prompting of the heart. His character has been misunderstood. He was neither selfish, nor austere. The intellectual predominated; but he was not devoid of benevolence. His habits of deep reflection made him often indifferent to what was passing around him; and, in his moods of abstraction, he would sit in the midst of his playful children, perfectly unconscious of their bewitching gambols. Their easy confidence and familiarity proved that there was no austerity in his nature. In his domestic relations he was exemplary. He married a Virginia lady; and whatever deficiency of the softer and benevolent feelings of our nature, there was in his character, was amply supplied by her amiability and overflowing kindness.

I do not know that he ever became a citizen of the United States, though he frequently spoke of his intention to do so. He thought very favorably of our country and her institutions.

Mr. Bonycastle was a close student; and, perhaps, his devotion to study led to a premature death. He took very little exercise, studied in an unhealthy posture, and until a late hour of the night. The University sustained a great loss in his death; and may his successor prove it not irreparable.

Of Professor Davis much has already been said in the public prints; and he deserved all the eulogiums which have been pronounced upon him; for he deserved the highest. With the respect and admiration of the writer, was mingled a feeling of affection for him, produced by a sense of his many excellencies and of the kindness received at his hands. His eulogy should be written in the choicest language. He combined the qualifications of mind, disposition and character requisite to constitute a professor. His kindness was bestowed upon all, and all were endeared to him. He stood by the student's sick bed, supplied his wants, alleviated his sufferings, and received his last muttered benediction, as he died far from friends and home. As chairman of the faculty, to which office he was repeatedly elected, he was untiring in his zeal, and impartial in enforcing the discipline; he met his sad end in attempting to preserve the good order of the institution. He was modest almost to diffidence, but never shrank from any post to which duty called, though it was plain that he never prided himself upon the petty distinction conferred by the position in which he was placed. His mind was not brilliant, but he was an assiduous and accurate student, an able professor, and was fast raising the standard of his department to the highest in the land. His punctuality was remarkable; and the student was never encouraged to be idle or inattentive, by the absence or dilatoriness of the professor.

Disease and crime removed these Professors, and inflicted a serious blow upon the pride of Virginia. But disgrace has also done its part; which is mainly attributable to the neglect and inaction of the Visitors. Dr. Blatterman, who was displaced for gross misconduct, was also one of the professors brought over by Mr. Gilmer. He was always said to be a man of great attainments, but it is doubtful whether he has added any thing to his information for several years past. His habits and character rendered him totally unfit for his office, had he been the most resplendent genius. The Visitors would not have assigned him any important part in the government of the institution, and yet retained him as an instructor, in despite of his well known improper conduct. For several sessions the students openly complained of his unfitness; and it was a common jest that he was retained because of his acquaintance with the Anglo-Saxon language, which was said to be a great hobby of one of the Visitors. In 1838, a large number of students, thinking that their duty required it, signed and presented to the Board a memorial praying to have him removed. The Visitors would not grant the prayer, though they had themselves reduced his salary for the same offences with which the students charged him. It was not until he plainly degraded himself, that they had the independence to dismiss him. Thus a vague fear of giving offence, and of doing injustice to individuals, causes men to be retained in office to the public detriment, when their unfitness is manifest. These things are not said in malice against the dismissed professor, nor in angry feeling against any one;

but in love and zeal for the University, whose cause should be advocated plainly and positively.

Public attention was drawn to the University in a special manner by the death of Professor Davis, who was shot down by the hand which should have been raised in his defence, as the students' guardian and guide. This occurrence may have sent terror to the mind of many an anxious parent, who has perhaps resolved never to send a son to such a lawless place. Indeed, rumors have reached us, that students left the scene of so barbarous a deed in deep disgust. There is neither wisdom nor virtue in the resolution of the parent, nor in the conduct of such students. Properly considered, there is nothing in the present circumstances of the University to induce any to withdraw their confidence and support. If those professing to be her friends take unnecessary alarm, and yield to distrust, how can she hope for relief? Let their encouragement rather be increased; and errors will be rectified, her influence elevated and extended, and she will soon go forth the pride of every Virginian, the boast of every upholder.

No institution should be encouraged where vice and immorality are not put down, or where any thing allied to them, is tolerated. Are they tolerated at the University? Far from it. They are severely rebuked and punished; whilst every means of prevention is anxiously sought and adopted. Examine the laws of the University of Virginia, and learn how they are enforced, and it will appear that the discipline, though mild, is firm, moral, and, to a certain degree, religious. There is scarcely an institution in the country, whose statute book contains more moral and salutary regulations. Many persons, remembering a period in her history, to which none of her friends revert with satisfaction, look upon her as a horrid school for the morals of young men. They have not read her late history; they even forget what important reformatations a few years may bring about. The system of discipline instituted by Mr. Jefferson proved, even in his day, to be impracticable; and now, it has advocates only among those who speak what they hope and wish, rather than what they know and believe, of the character of young men. This system, which "undertook to conduct a body of youth by appeals to their reason, their hopes, and to every generous feeling, rather than to the fear of punishment, or dread of disgrace," while it ennobled the character of the students, gave them a license, of which, it is too well remembered, they most liberally availed themselves. On one memorable occasion, it required the appeals of Jefferson, Madison and Johnson to reach "their reason, hopes, and generous feelings." Some few have neither of these, and cannot be restrained by "the fear of punishment," nor the "dread of disgrace." In every society laws are made for the worst.

There may still be some, who cannot get over

"that late shocking occurrence." It should never be so far forgotten, that indignation shall cease to burn; but it should not affect the institution. What law could have unnerved the arm, or changed the purpose of him who perpetrated that deed? It was not the laws of the University which forbade it, and which he violated; but the laws of God and man. There was nothing in the place, nor its regulations, to prompt such a reckless spirit. It would have broken loose in realms of purity. Yea, it did break out there; and it would be as signal folly for men to turn their backs on the glories of Heaven, because Lucifer there raised the standard of rebellion, as to withdraw their support from the University because one had done his utmost to trample upon her laws. But all this will work for good, and tend to the good order of the College. The feeling will react; and the loss of so beloved a professor, in so shocking a manner, will make a lasting and deep impression on the minds of the students, which will regulate and restrain them for sessions to come. Such occurrences invariably lead to greater circumspection; and the vigilance of the faculty, aided by the diligence and "vehement desire" of the students, will produce the most beneficial results. Who can believe, that a student, with the recollection of Professor Davis' fate fresh on his mind, could wantonly indulge in rioting? Nor can the remembrance of it be easily erased: it will be perpetuated; and the anxiety of the professors, the indignation and grief of the students, and the sympathy of every one, conspire to render this session, if properly improved, the most auspicious for the University. Let her alumni, then, feel for her, act for her, and assemble to consult for her. Let them flock around her in numbers at their next meeting. They owe her much, and should endeavor at least to pay her a little.

But it would be idle and unfaithful to the interests of education, to maintain the cause of an institution, which is not worthy of it. The University is entitled to high praise; and, notwithstanding some defects in her organization, she is dispensing the treasures of science with a profuse hand. Still the eye of hope and solicitude beholds a position far above her present commanding one, to which she should and can be elevated.—This, however, depends mainly upon the Visitors, who have the controlling influence. The buildings are ample, the apparatus extensive, and every thing is ready for a noble college. The number of students has been large for several sessions, and may be greatly increased by proper management.

The newly appointed professors are now all at their post, and the University is going on under their auspices. Hope attributes to them every qualification requisite in professors; and confidence, so far as it can be based upon limited information, or bestowed upon untried men, rests upon them. Indeed they have all been tried in other, but similar situations, and the friends and patrons of the University may banish their apprehensions and suspicions as groundless and fruitless. Professors Tucker, Sylvester, and Kraitsir fulfil the indispensable requisition of reputation and distinction in their respective departments; and students may flock to them to learn, what they, by study and experience, have already fitted themselves to teach.

The time has now arrived when an important change might be made in the Board of Visitors. The University went into operation in 1825, and many of her alumni are now at the proper age to be entrusted with her guardianship. The alumni have formed a society, which, if it bring together annually ever so small a number, will be productive of great good. If the power of appointing Visitors were vested in this society, it would give it a dignity and permanence which would greatly increase its usefulness. It would then be more closely linked to the University; its objects would become more definite; its members would have an inducement to meet; and would come annually with hearts overflowing with love and zeal for their alma mater. There can be no doubt that the power of appointment would be as judiciously exercised by this society, as it is by the Executive. This, however, would require an alteration in the charter; but the Governor, by appointing alumni, will strengthen the bonds of affection, and promote the interests of the institution. The next 29th of February will give him an opportunity of trying it. It is pleasing to anticipate the time, when the distinguished and honored shall assemble as alumni of their beloved University; when presidents, senators, and others high in authority, shall deem it an honor to be classed among her sons. Then we may look for a revival of Virginia's glory, when the greatest orators shall incite her youth to love, to venerate and labor for her in those halls which she has provided for the advancement of literature and science.

There is one palpable defect, Mr. Editor, in the system of instruction pursued at the University. There is no department for exercises in writing and speaking. Every Northern College has such a department: and it is this which gives such an interest to the literary societies, and renders them productive of so much profit and pleasure. At the University, there is a class of belle-lettres, and the members are occasionally required to submit their productions to the criticism of the Professor. There are debating societies also, but very little writing is practised; and speaking is done so carelessly, and with so little preparation, as to yield but little improvement. Writing and speaking induce students to read; and at the North each one takes out his book, with nearly as much regularity as he goes to his meals; whilst the large and choice library of the University, is almost entirely neglected by a majority of the students. If a department of English literature were established, embracing exercises in composition and oratory and a course of history, it would be one of the most useful and interesting schools in the institution. The expense is the only difficulty. Its benefits would justify any expenditure. Cannot the society of alumni do something towards it by means of annual contributions, and devise some mode in which contributions can be obtained from those desirous of promoting intellectual improvement? A small sum contributed each year by the alumni would gradually accumulate; and the Legislature, witnessing so laudable an effort, would lend its aid by making an appropriation. The annual appropriation by the State is fifteen thousand dollars. Deducting the salaries of the nine professors, the sum of five thousand dollars is left—a portion of which might be set apart for the purpose of opening this new school. The original plan was to have ten professors, and to include several important branches now omitted in the course of studies; which, however, is very thorough and extensive.

Experiment has proved that Mr. Jefferson committed one great error in the system of government which he sought to establish in the University. But this was "as the dust of the balance" to that of banishing religion from her walls. The whole should have been planned and executed in reliance upon Divine aid and direction; for nothing can be truer than "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain who build it." Without being superstitious, the overruling hand of Providence must be acknowledged; and apprehensions sometimes arise lest Heaven has decreed the fall of the University, in order to prove to man the folly and impiety of founding such institutions, without invoking its blessing. Religion cannot be safely separated from any human undertaking. For literature and science to produce their salutary effects upon the mind and heart—to make man better as they make him wiser—they must be associated with, and tempered by, religion; nor should their connection be slight and incidental, but designed and intimate. The system of Mr. Jefferson has been abandoned; and there are now regular religious services twice a-week, and the students pay marked respect to the minister. But the fact of having a chaplain is a small matter. He must not be looked upon as a mere preacher and sermonizer on Sundays, but as pastor and instructor in religious matters; not as a mere appendage, but as an important, an essential part of the institution. Religion must be admitted, not as a secondary matter, but as of primary concern; not as an incident, but an essential; not through complaisance to public opinion, to allay the fears of anxious parents, nor as a compromise between the opposition of Mr. Jefferson, and the convictions of the Visitors. Every social fabric must fall—its materials will become corrupt and rotten, unless the spirit of pure religion be incorporated with them and made their preserver.

It is much a habit to decry the externals of religion. These are all important, not as superseeding the substance and the spirit, but as manifesting and embodying that spirit. In the University, the services are performed in the lecture-room, which is very inconveniently arranged, and where the mind is diverted by a thousand perceptions and associations. Every thing in connection with the spirituel of that institution would show, if we did not know the fact, that the introduction of religion was an afterthought. In all her extensive arrangements, there is not a single accommodation for religion. The association of ideas is powerful, and there is very little in the religious services of the University calculated to inspire the minds of the students with a sense of their essentiality. Nearly every thing tends to make their feelings permissive rather than submissive; tolerant, rather than tenacious; complaisant, rather than obedient and attached.

The first thing to be done is to erect a suitable chapel. The faculty are anxious for this to be effected, and presented a memorial to the Visitors on the subject. At the request of the writer, Professor Bonnycastle drew up an eloquent memorial to be presented on the part of the students; but as circumstances prevented the signatures from being obtained, it was not handed in. A chapel is not only necessary for the religious services, but for public occasions, anniversary orations, the use of societies, and for important meetings of the students, when they wish to do honor to the memory of a departed fellow-student or professor. It will also be useful as an ornament,—and this dreadful hiatus, so painfully obvious to every Christian friend of the institution, should be speedily supplied. This object is so important, that, if no better plan can be devised, the Visitors would be justified in sending special agents through the country asking donations. One of the chaplains promised to raise five thousand dollars from his branch of the Christian church; and, no doubt, the requisite amount can be obtained. One session is, moreover, too short a period for a chaplain to remain. Get a good one and retain him longer. There might still be rotation, but not such frequent rotation.

This theme is not yet exhausted; but we fear we have written too much; not more however, than the importance of the subject demanded. If any abler pen shall be incited to pursue it, we shall be highly gratified. The foregoing considerations, Mr. Editor, are deemed worthy of the attention of the Visitors and Alumni especially; but the public generally are greatly interested in this matter. Their sons are to be educated; the benefits of education cannot be confined to the recipient, but are reflected from him to all around. Let them, then, take the welfare of the University somewhat into their own hands—guard her, watch over her, and lend her their zeal and a small portion of their treasure. She will repay both; and they will rear an institution, in which it will be a proud distinction for their sons to be tutored. They will make Virginia the literary centre of the South; the fame of her splendid seat of learning will draw students from every quarter; and one common sentiment, together with a high degree of intelligence, will pervade our common country. Will men practically confess that nothing but political contention can excite their zeal and efforts? Will they not, then, raise up some place, where representatives and electors may be qualified rightly to discharge their respective duties, whence knowledge may be diffused, and men taught to settle questions by discussion, and not by disputing—by argument, and not abusive wrangling? There are thousands who seek to justify their faith and practice by the precepts and example of Jefferson. Will they stop short and not imitate his zeal for the prosperity of the University, which he, their political paragon, founded? Let them all remember, that he did not most glory in that, for which, they most laud him. He wrote his own epitaph; and the simple granite obelisk, which marks his tomb, bears no such inscription as “The Leader of the Democracy.” We learn from it, that he was the “Author of the Declaration of American Independence,” and “of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom.” This is not all that we learn. American independence is to be perpetuated, and religious freedom to be secured. Ignorance is the foe of both, and must be vanquished. His unsatisfied spirit sought another and a crowning honor; and he became “The father of the University of Virginia.”

ROMANCE READING AND WRITING.

MR. T. W. WHITE.

Dear Sir,—I am a champion of Romance Reading and Romance Writing. Please give me space to argue my point.

The story of a life, told in a plain manner, and without exaggeration, may be both agreeable and instructive. When circumstances have cast a coloring of romance over veritable incidents, and made that which actually happened, appear like fiction; when real and supposititious events have become so interlaced, that the nicest discrimination cannot separate them, nor the most unscrupulous and fastidious censorship find anything to condemn on the score of improbability—romance then becomes a most attractive kind of reading, and may be useful by enabling us to form correct estimates of character. Such is the well-known story of Robinson Crusoe. In it, fiction is blended with fact to the production of one of the most entertaining books ever written. We feel sure that a part of the adventures it details, actually happened; we may guess that a part never did; and yet, were we to accept a challenge to lay our finger on any particular passage with an affirmative of its falsehood, we should be as likely to impugn the passages susceptible of verification as those which were the coinage of Defoe's own brain.

I consider verisimilitude to be the highest praise of authorship—the fiend that “lied like truth,” could not have been the worst of his class.

I do not mean to be witty, when I say it is owing to the strong natural liking men have for novelty and romance, that books of voyages and travels are so popular—especially voyages and travels to lands replete with romantic fiction—the former abodes of classic song—the romance of earlier ages: and to lands clouded with present difficulty and danger.

Descriptions of newly discovered countries, and of the manners and customs of people little known, are nothing but romance softened into history, by giving a habitation and a name to the imagined incidents and personages of romantic story. The love of romance and romantic legends is as natural, as the love of meat and drink, to the human species; this is most fully seen where education and factitious refinement have least warped the mind from the path of nature. The child listens with intense delight to fireside stories of the marvellous related by garrulous old age, with a never-tiring relish. The fur-clad warriors of the frozen north, red from the slaughter of foes, gathered around the Skald to bestow breathless attention upon his wild Runic rhymes. The North American Indian would forego every other amusement, give up even the death-grapple, to listen to the traditional fables of his tribe. The Persian Satriap summoned his tale-teller at the dead hour of night, to repeat the romance of the Zendavesta, and woo sleep to his pillow, by the music of the Sabian ritual with its romantic cosmogony and contents of angels and devils.

When I write a story, I am only anxious that those who believe it a fiction, shall think it an interesting one. I hold, that if useful truths be imparted, and reflections of practical value made, it is of little consequence in what shape or through what channel they meet the public eye—only that that is the best which has the best chance of extended circulation. If a romance inculcate better morality, or present truth in a more effective shape than a sermon—if its exposition of the moral and christian duties be the sounder one, the romance is certainly the better sermon—the better promoter of religion, and the more able advocate of truth. He who puts it forth, is the more useful preacher, and renders the cause of piety and virtue, the cause of morality and good order, the greater and more enduring service.

It has become the fashion—with those who think little, and talk much—“ancient Pistols” in a farce wherein they play not only the Welsh Captain, but Nick Bottom the Weaver—to declaim against all romances and novels, and to hold them as of evil tendency. Nothing certainly can be worse than a licentious novel written with power—a stupid one carries its own antidote with it. But this is not the age of licentious novels—it is no more the fashion now to write them, than it is to use indecent language in polished society. There are some exceptions, but these make the rule general. In the merry days of Charles II, the obscene jest was fashionable,—obscenity had then a particular claim to public approbation and patronage derived from the custom of a court and circle putrid with vice—as it were a splendid stew reeking with licentiousness. It is the taste of this day to make the novel the vehicle of useful information, and to use none but chaste and polished language in the communion of ideas.

See the improvement which taste and good sense have made in novel writing by comparing Madam Cottin's “Saracen,” with the “Talisman” of the Great Scottish Novelist. See Mr. James' novels illustrating the most important epochs of French history better than their own historians, and presenting us with pictures of Henri Quatre, Henry of Guise, Richelieu and Catharine de Medicis, as true as can be found in the galleries of the Louvre. See Miss Edgeworth, Miss Austin, Madam D'Arbelay, and many others dignifying human nature by their most accurate delineations of its best traits,—recording ennobling deeds by no means rare, and splendid virtues in common use and of lowly origin; the Jew Montenero, redeeming by his merit almost the whole tribe of Israel from ignominy, and all of them guarding us against evil by vivid pictures of its worst passions.

Such novels are of more value in any and every point of view, than a hundred ill-penned volumes, falsely called histories—to make up which the scissors have done far more than the pen. A licentious novel is “hell-broth” itself; but, I would sooner put into the hands of a child of mine one of that namby-pamby species, known by the name of the “Leaden-hall press novels,” even one of that still ghastlier class, called “Pictures of High Life,” with all their frivolities, “commodities of good names,” and make-a-dog-sick pretensions to fashion and exclusivism, than I would one of those historical abridgements so profitable to publishers, but so injurious to readers.

I will not war with men's tastes; but having once advanced my opinions, I am bound to their full exposition.

I hold that nothing so soon saps the foundation of human learning, as the supplying students of an advanced age, with mere manuals. They acquire by the perusal of these compendiums, a little knowledge at little expense—a smattering which enables them to—"shine as a substitute till a King be by"—to pass for learned, when none are present to detect their ignorance. They learn when the battle of Cheronea was fought; who Mark Anthony was; and where Julian the Apostate perished; what great event followed the battle of Hastings; and what fruitless glory the reign of the "Swede." Than this, they search no deeper; and so, their minds become merely imbued with a few facts, without an atom of philosophy; and they die without having once attempted to analyse the motives which stimulated the men of past ages. The records of departed days have passed before them as rapidly as the "line of Banquo" passed before the Usurper Macbeth; and their recollection is of a piece with the images left on our minds at the distance of years, by the succession of "baby Kings."

My opinion then is, that a good novel, not such as Bulwer's, but such as Miss Edgeworth's et al., is of healthy tendency—that it deserves to be read and its author rewarded, and encouraged; but that it is inferior in value to a well-written history, penned with a scrupulous regard to truth, and to a reasonable degree, minute and philosophical. But a book that takes up false or absurd positions upon any subject, that urges unsatisfactory or inconclusive reasons, decries the good and extols the bad—in other words, that is a false or vicious treatise, deserves to fall stillborn from the publisher's press, if it meet with no severer condemnation. And in the proportion that we expect historical truth from one writer, and metaphysical truth from another, and scientific truth from a third, is the work a failure, when it lacks it, compared with that which tells you, gratuitously enough, that it is a fiction from beginning to end. From history, theology, metaphysics and the natural sciences, we expect absolute, unqualified, unimpeached, and unimpeachable verity; whilst we are satisfied with poetry and romance if they be fiction arrayed in a pleasing dress, and in good keeping with known customs and manners. Sometimes they mount far higher in the scale of literary merit; as thus—when a novel inculcates good behavior, and virtuous conduct, it is a moral discourse;—when it urges to christian profession, and a life of faith, it is a sermon.

Shall we say, that such is the peculiar province of the pulpit? I will not believe so till a more conclusive fiat than I have yet heard, goes forth against me.

Yours, very sincerely,

ARCHÆUS OCCIDENTALIS.

THE CHILD'S GRAVE.

Sleep, child, thy peaceful sleep—

Thou art in mercy early called away—

While we, alas! are left to weep,

Who in this world of trouble still must stay.

Sleep in thy silent grave!

No dreams disturb thee of the anxious morrow;

Angels have wafted thee away, to save

Thy youthful years from sin—thine age from sorrow.

And shall we mourn that thou art gone,

Thus early, to a state of bliss?

No, no—we weep that we are left, alone

To linger in a world of care like this!

FITCH.

"But past is all his fame. The very spot Where many a time he triumph'd, is forgot."

Basil Hall, in his travels in America, has attempted to throw some light on the question, who was the first person that applied the power of steam to the propelling of boats? In this attempt, he has discovered an evident prejudice in favoring his own countrymen, which warps his judgment, and disqualifies him from judging of others according to their merits. Among others, he has mentioned John Fitch as being among the early inventors of steamboat navigation, and says his plan on trial, proved defective, and was abandoned. This, in my opinion, was not doing Fitch that justice his efforts deserved. He undoubtedly was the man who first applied the power of steam to the paddles of a boat, with complete success, in America.

I resided in Philadelphia from 1787 to 1793, and knew Fitch. He was one of those ardent spirits, who, in the march of improvement, was calculated to take the lead. Although illiterate, he possessed a strong penetrative mind, and untiring industry. He had a just conception of the power of steam, and great mechanical genius in applying it to machinery. At this time, it was a subject which but slightly engaged the attention of the scientific part of society; yet he prevailed on a considerable number of liberal minded gentlemen, to subscribe and form a company for the encouragement of steam navigation. This was no doubt the first association of the kind in America. They had a boat constructed of about fifty tons burthen, and gave Fitch the direction and management of the machinery. It was rude and imperfect; the iron of the boiler was too thin to withstand the pressure of the steam, and it gave way, which occasioned some delay to the experiment. The boat was put in operation in 1788, and performed a number of trips on the Delaware, to Bordentown, Bristol and Burlington. I was standing on the wharf when the boat came by, on her way to Burlington, and being invited with others to make the trip, I went on board,—we made good headway against the current of the river, generally at the rate of five miles an hour. The boat was propelled by five paddles over the stern, on a crank, which had a rising pulley, turned by a chain of short links, made in the form of a watch chain, and extending to the shaft of the balance wheel, on which was a corresponding pulley; the chain and paddles worked very roughly, and produced a great clatter; the extra steam was discharged through a short tube, which kept all hands at a respectful distance. Yet, on the whole, it was a very fair experiment, which did much credit to the projector, and did much to settle the question of the practicability of steam navigation. But poor Fitch was doomed to see all his hopes blasted in one night; a fire consumed the boat as low as the water would permit; the company abandoned the project, and he was left to make the most of his improvement in another quarter. He offered his invention to the French on the Mississippi, this river not being open to Northern enterprise; a period of ten or fifteen years passed over before the attempt at steam navigation was resumed, and Fulton did not perfect his improvements until the year 1807, about twenty years after the successful experiment of Fitch. Poor and neglected John Fitch wandered over the far West, "and none so poor to do him reverence:" his active spirit left its house of clay; and his bones lie mouldering on the banks of the Ohio.

MAIDENHOOD.

Maiden! with the meek, brown eyes,
In whose orbs a shadow lies,
Like the dusk in evening skies!

Thou, whose locks outshine the sun,
Golden tresses, wreathed in one,
As the braided streamlets run!

Standing, with reluctant feet,
Where the brook and river meet,
Womanhood and childhood fleet!

Gazing, with a timid glance,
On the brooklet's swift advance,
On the river's broad expanse!

Deep and still, that gliding stream
Beautiful to thee must seem,
As the river of a dream.

Then why pause with indecision,
When bright angels in thy vision
Beckon thee to fields Elysian?

Seest thou shadows sailing by,
As the dove, with startled eye,
Sees the falcon's shadow fly?

Hear'st thou voices on the shore,
That our ears perceive no more,
Deafened by the cataract's roar?

O, thou child of many prayers!
Life hath quicksands,—Life hath snares!
Care and age come unawares!

Like the swell of some sweet tune,
Morning rises into noon,
May glides onward into June.

Childhood is the bough where slumbered
Birds and blossoms many-numbered;
Age, that bough, with snows encumbered.

Gather, then, each flower that grows,
When the young heart overflows
To embalm that tent of snows.

Bear a lily in thy hand;
Gates of brass cannot withstand
One touch of that magic wand.

Bear through sorrow, wrong and ruth,
In thy heart the dew of youth,
On thy lips the smile of truth.

O, that dew, like balm, shall steal
Into wounds, that cannot heal,
Even as sleep our eyes doth seal;

And that smile, like sunshine dart
Into many a sunless heart,
For a smile of God thou art.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

THREE SABBATH MORNINGS.

Suggested on reading "Three Saturday Nights," in the Messenger, July 1841.

The Eastern sky is just blushing in the beams of the rising sun

"As first on this delightful land, he spreads
His orient rays on herb, tree, fruit and flower, Glistening with dew;"

beautiful is that sky, and beautiful the beams of that rising sun.

Every honey-dropping flower and every blade of grass sparkle, as if hung with diamonds. The air is laden with the richest odors, which come up from the enamelled earth like early incense—fit tribute to Him who spread abroad such beauty and enchantment.

Nature rejoices in the light; every grove echoes with the music of birds, and every tangled nook with the humming sound of insects.

The animal tribes come gamboling forth, exulting in the fulness of renovated strength. They come not to prowl and plunder; for all is innocence.

The lamb and the tawney wolf sport together; and the hawk and the dove wash their wings at the same ripple.

The earth seems sanctified, the very air holy; the sky, the deep blue sky, seems to grow more soft and beautiful, as the moon advances; the light clouds that float so gently over its surface are of such snowy whiteness, that they seem like a resting-place for angel gazers. And well I ween that angels are gazing down, for never was world wrapt in robes of richer beauty.

How tranquil is the bosom of the sinless man, who now comes forth from his slumbers! He is passing on to the place where he would pour out his orison; his eye is fixed heavenward; and his face is radiant, as if with Shekinal glory;—for care hath not worn it; it is not marred by sorrow, nor darkened by guilt; he is yet in the image of his Creator, and the destroyer hath not yet set his seal upon his brow.

His meek partner keeps her way by his side; the same holy thrill of quiet rapture pervading her bosom. On she passes with her lord, with equal step, save when her snowy fingers stay a moment, to dally in the mane of the majestic lion; or she stoops to sleek the glossy coat of the spotted leopard, which has come near to give its greeting to the passing pair.

"The groves were God's first temples;" there it is, that Adam, sole priest of nature, offers up his first morning's devotions; his consort, with mild blue eye uplifted, making the responsive Amen.

What a prayer! It is not penitence; it is the gushing words of love; it comes up from the deep wells of two hearts, as yet unpoisoned by sin. It is adoration; the adoration of souls, whose master-passion is absorption in the divine image; it is the pure tribute of the affections; affections as yet unsullied by a single stain, unruffled by a single fear of the Being on whom they rest; it is the giving of thanks for countless blessings; the giving of glory, and praise, and power, to the ever-living God—the "Father in Heaven."

The tribute is accepted! It goes up like the fragrance of heaven's golden censer, or the hallowed flame of the proto-martyr!

Oh! it is a moving, but beauteous sight, to mark that holy pair, presenting this their first morning's tribute! Every sound lulled, save the sound of thanks; every breath hushed, save the breath of praise. All is still—beast, bird and bee; e'en the breeze hath folded its wings; "nor leaf nor flowret stirs"—nature herself keeps quiet, for her only minister waits at the altar! It is Earth's First Sabbath Morning. It is the first and last Sabbath of Adam in Paradise, for ere the next, sin had dashed its gall into the cup of human life, and the hapless pair had,

"Hand in hand, with wandering step and slow,
Through Eden took their solitary way."

Time passed on. More than forty centuries had filled their cycles. Messiah had descended from on high; and his feet had trodden the streets of the sacred city. He had labored. He had wept. He had prayed. He had groaned. He had bled. He had died. And they had done unto the King of Glory as they listed. Darkness had settled over Salem; and Silence, her "sister-twin," had stretched her leaden sceptre over all her hills. Earth was prostrate in slumber—

"And Nature, as a meek and peaceful child, Slept sweetly on the bosom of her God."

The queen of night had shot out her bark upon the ethereal sea, and now looked calmly down, with her pure rays, upon the quiet city, as though guilt had never disturbed the passions of its sleeping people.

The breeze from Olivet, and the purling sound of "Kedron's lonely brook, or Siloa's sweeter fount," sent their murmurs on the quiet air, like magic music on moon-lit waters.

All, all were slumbering—the skeptical Scribe, the canting Pharisee, the scowling Priest, and the sycophantic Governor, repose softly upon their pillows: for the innocent object of their malignity has become their prey. "The man of sorrows," the meek Jesus, has yielded a victim to the combined hatred of his persecutors—the sepulchre was made sure, the stone was sealed, the watch set!

But let us stay awhile—the night has advanced almost into morning. The city still sleeps. All is yet quiet, save, now and then, the howling of the watch-dog, or the twittering sound of the bat, seeking its retreat.

Not far beyond the western wall may be heard the slow and heavy tread of a few brazen footed soldiers, or the jarring of lances against the mailed corslets of these veteran Romans. They are at the side of that sealed tomb. They are watching the remains of the despised Nazarene!

The last star of night is now dying out upon its high tower; and the gray gleams of light, as they shoot up from the East, reveal the hazy outlines of the surrounding hills. But lo, the earth trembles and quakes! These veteran warriors turn pale, and become as dead men. The heavens open; and light, more brilliant than the sun at noontide, bursts around them. The sound of angel-voices fills the air, and from amid the choral throng a white-robed seraph descends; his face is like the sun, and his raiment as the lightning.

The sealed stone is rolled away from the mouth of the guarded tomb. The dead shakes off his cerements, and comes forth, beautiful in his majesty!

Again the sounds of golden harps sweep through the high air, and the angel throng, with loud hallelujahs, repass the portals of heaven. The rapturous intelligence of a risen Saviour fills its high vault with shouts of glory and songs of praise. Death is vanquished; the grave has been robbed of its prey; Christ hath risen; his peaceful reign has commenced; the first Sabbath Morning of Christianity has dawned upon a long benighted world!

Ages and Empires had passed away. Change had followed change. States, cities and temples had crumbled before the corroding influence of years.

Other states, other cities and other temples, excelling in magnitude and grandeur, had taken their places. Science had long since reached its zenith; art its most perfect accomplishment; and the golden age of divine prophecy blessed the world.

The brightness of the millennial glory had risen, beamed its noontide, and passed away.

The church had been robed in her "beauteous garments," had been "the joy of the whole earth," had been "beautiful as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, and terrible as an army with banners." "The wolf had dwelt with the lamb; the leopard had laid down with the kid; the calf and the young lion and the fatling together" had been led in sportive triumph by a little child; the infant had played upon the hole of the asp, and the weaned child put its hand upon the cockatrice's den—for there "was none to hurt in all God's holy mountain."

White-robed Innocence had descended from heaven, and Peace had extended her olive wand over all the earth.

But this age, too, had passed away.

Satan was again unchained; and again went forth to deceive all people. The earth had again grown old in crime, and the cup of her iniquity was mantling to the brim! More! The last hour of time has come; the last vial of the wrath of the Almighty is opened, and ready to be poured out; the heavens are rolled together as a scroll; the elements melt away in fervent heat; the sun is in sackcloth; the moon is blood-like; and the stars have fallen from their spheres!

The great white throne of the Judge is set, and the myriads upon myriads of earth's dwellers, and all the risen dead, are gathered in his presence!

What a strange hour!

The deserted globe whirls with irregular and convulsed motion around the mighty convocation, flaming up as if one vast volcano. Lightnings, with their lurid and fitful fires, gleam around the solemnities of the last awful assize!

The books are opened, and the dead are judged.

The righteous hear their awards; and the unrepentant, their doom.

There is a pause!—the last unsentenced sinner stands before the bar! The words of condemnation pass with awful distinctness through the crowded ranks of breathless millions, and as they die away silence again reigns.

The earth once more throws up its sheeted flames with increased intensity; it is its last burning; and by its fitful flare is seen him who stood "with one foot upon the land and the other upon the sea," the Apocalyptic Angel. Now, standing by the mighty throne, he swears by Him who lives and reigns forever, that Time is no more! * * * *

Darkness, the darkness of a black and starless night, shrouds the universe—the wicked are driven away, and nought is heard, save the moaning of these banished ones, ere they enter upon their long exile, and the door of Hope closes forever!

Then bursts around the light of the seventh heaven; the portals of glory are thrown back; the morning stars again shout together; and amid the loud harping of cherubic millions, the long train of the redeemed are welcomed to their home.

Time's last Saturday night is passed away—the unending day has come, the day of the redeemed—the Sabbath Morning of Eternity is ushered in!

WHAT IS HOPE?

Of a dying lamp, the last bright spark
That flashes up ere all is dark—
The ray upon the tear of Grief,
The Polar star of true Belief!—
The faint yet roseate life-like streak
That dawns on wan Consumption's cheek—
Dawns! no, alas! its fleeting glow
Is sunset on a hill of snow—
The far-east gaze of her who'd greet
Some sea-worn barque she longs to meet—
The thing that dying patriots feel
Beneath the tyrant's iron heel—
The tear-drop in the Judge's eye,
Mark'd by the wretch he dooms to die—
A dream of life within his cell,
Who wakes to hear his own death-bell—
A single fibre that is loose—
Seen by him in the hangman's noose—
Cain's bloody brand char'd o'er again,
As if it never had a stain—
The smile that dead-men's lips do wear,
When mourning fools cry "Life is there!"
A riven shield—a broken brand
Grasped tightly by some dying hand—
The last—loose—rivetless breast-plate,
That man opposes to his Fate.

WHERE IS PLEASURE?

Selected from the unpublished Poems of the late Margaret Miller Davidson. Written at the age of thirteen.

Where shall I find thee, Pleasure?

Where meet thy smile again?

I have sought thy gilded treasure;

I have wooed thee, but in vain.

I find thee not in Solitude;

For Memory's fountain pours

Around my heart, the withering thoughts

Of brighter, happier hours.

I find thee not in crowded halls,

Tho' thousands there may be;

There's not a single heart which beats

In sympathy with me!

In wealth? I will not seek thee there;

Wealth never must be mine,

For well I know, they find thee not

Who worship at this shrine.

I find thee not in Folly's bowers,

Tho' sparkling gems are there;

Her wreath is twined with fading flowers,

As perishing, as fair!

I find thee not in Nature's arms,
 Tho' tranquil and serene !
 There ever lurks some wild alarms,
 To dim the glowing scene.

I find thee not with those I love,
 For Grief is ever there
 To check the smile, to chill the hope,
 To draw the starting tear.

And oh ! 'tis doubly sad to see
 The hearts we love in woe ;
 To mark their brighter prospects flee,
 And view their tear-drops flow.

I never find thee in the past,
 Each happier moment fled,
 A veil of deep regret doth cast
 Around my youthful head.

At times, the future beams with light,
 And glows with dreams of bliss,
 But ever lurks some cloud to blight
 This fancied happiness !

Where shall I find thee, Pleasure ?
 Where meet thy smile again ?
 I have sought thy gilded treasure ;
 I have wooed thee, but in vain !

INCIDENTS OF A CAMPAIGN.

THE GYPSY.

From the German. By Professor G. F. Struvé.

In the Spring of the year 1788, I marched with recruits from Micklosfare, in Siebenburg, to join my regiment, then stationed in the country of Orsowa.

There resided in a small village in the neighborhood of the army, a gypsy, whose chief support was in supplying the troops with various articles of marketing.

My recruits, who were superstitious fellows, had their luck in war predicted by this fortune-teller.

I laughed at the fun ; and, out of sport, gave her my hand also to examine. On the 20th of August, she exclaimed significantly,—nothing more. I desired some further information, but she only repeated the foregoing words ; and as I was retiring, she again called after me in an ominous manner, the 20th of August. It will therefore not appear surprising, that I bore this day in mind.

We reached the army, and shared its hardships and dangers. I shall not now dwell on them, but will only state that at that time, the Turks granted quarter to none of their prisoners, but on the contrary set a price of a ducat on the head of every one. The Janissaries availed themselves therefore of every opportunity that offered, to obtain the promised reward. The Austrian outposts in particular, suffered severely from this, as almost every night an overwhelming number of the enemy proceeded so secretly and expeditiously to work, that they seldom failed in their attacks, and the camp at break of day was in part guarded but by dead bodies. This instigated Prince Koburg to station, every night, pickets of cavalry behind the ranges of the videttes, for the purpose of supporting them. The pickets consisted of from 100 to 200 men each. The Turkish commander, enraged at seeing this retail business of his men thus interrupted, personally attacked these pickets with a far superior force, as thereby a considerable advantage was to be attained. Hence, this duty became such, that those engaged therein (previous to entering upon it) generally arranged their little worldly affairs.

Eight days previous to the 20th, the gypsy (whom I had often seen carrying about provisions) appeared at my tent, and made the following request : That in the event I should perish on the above-mentioned day, I should bequeath to her a legacy ; should I however (contrary to her warning) escape with my life, she engaged to present me with a basket of Tokay wine. This was very difficult to procure ; and such conduct in the woman appeared rather ridiculous ; still, however probable, under present circumstances, a speedy death might be, I certainly did not expect it on that day. I however acceded to the contract. The old creature was to receive two horses and fifty ducats, if I fell ; otherwise, she was to furnish me with the Tokay. A bystander, laughing at the proposition, took a note of the contract.

The 20th of August came. There was no appearance of an action. The turn of our regiment to provide the night picket for the right wing of the army arrived. I, for my part, however, felt quite secure, as two officers stood on the commander's list before me. Towards evening, I saw the Hussars preparing themselves accordingly, when the surgeon of the regiment rode up to the commander and informed him that the appointed officer had been suddenly taken ill ; consequently the next on the list, whose name stood above mine, was appointed to fill his place. He equipped himself immediately with the view of joining his men ; but his hitherto tractable charger reared and plunged and became perfectly unmanageable—the rider was thrown, and his leg broken. Now came my turn. I must confess that my feelings on the occasion were none of the most composed.

I dashed off with 80 men—a captain of cavalry, with 120 more, joined us from another regiment ; so that our picket numbered 200 men.

We were posted about a thousand paces from the lines of the right wing, in the direction of a marsh, overgrown with high reeds. No sentinels being placed in advance, the men did not quit their saddles. Swords in scabbards, and carbines in readiness, were the orders given. Every thing was quiet till within a quarter of midnight, when we heard a slight noise; shortly followed a loud Allah! and in a minute afterwards, all the horses of the front rank (from the shock and rush of from 6 to 800 Turks) were overthrown. By means of our carbines, as also from the effect of the sudden check, an equal number of the Turks were thrown to the ground. The enemy were acquainted with the locality; they surrounded and overpowered us; we cut, thrust, and shot at random over each other. I received eight sabre cuts from friend and foe; my horse was mortally wounded; he fell over my right leg, and rolled me in the sand. The quick flashes of the pistols shed light on the horrid butchery. I looked up from the ground on which I lay. Our men, in a state of desperation, defended themselves bravely; but the Turks, intoxicated with opium, overpowered and cut them to pieces. The imperial troops soon ceased to exist. The conquerors then possessed themselves of such horses as were still serviceable, plundered the dead and wounded, and then cut off their heads—for the bearing away of which they had provided themselves with bags. No one will envy me my situation. We, on the confines of Turkey, are for the most part acquainted with the language. I therefore understood the caution given, to hurry before our troops should come to the rescue. Whilst they were treading me under foot, and balls, lances and limbs were flying around me, my horse received another shot, which caused him to give a convulsive motion, (life not being as yet entirely extinct.) This gave me an opportunity of extricating myself. I immediately conceived the idea of plunging, if possible, into the adjoining morass. I had observed that some of our men had already attempted it, but were cut down by the enemy. The firing had in the meantime ceased, and the darkness therefore afforded me an opportunity of concealment in the swamp. It was not more than twenty paces off; still there was the probability of my sinking therein. I sprang however over men and horses; ran down several Turks, who grasped and cut at me; and, thanks to my agility and good fortune, reached the morass. I at first sunk up to my knees, yet I managed to work my way on, a hundred paces, until I reached the high reeds, when I stopped, worn down with fatigue. I heard a Turkish voice exclaim that a Giaour had taken refuge there, and that one must follow him;—others replied that no one had passed that way. This is all that I remember. A lengthened swoon of some hours from loss of blood, must have immediately followed—for when I recovered my senses, the sun had already been some time risen.

The 90th of August was one of my first thoughts when I awoke and found myself sunk up to my middle; and the visions of the preceding night, with my hairbreadth escape, flitted before my eyes. I now counted my wounds: they were eight in number; but none of any consequence, being mere gashes from side-arms.

The nights in this region being cold in summer, had caused me to wear a thick fur; and this circumstance greatly protected me. I still felt very much exhausted from loss of blood; I listened attentively; the Turks had left some time; the groans of the horribly mutilated horses were occasionally heard from the battle-field; the men were long since silenced.

I now endeavored to extricate myself from my situation. After hours spent in vain attempts, I at last succeeded. The track by which I entered was still visible: I followed it. However unfeeling a Turkish war tends to make one, still the sight that presented itself to me when I had waded half way through the swamp, was truly horrible. I at last got out, and stood transfixed on beholding the dreadful scene that presented itself to my eyes; but how shall I describe my despair, when I felt myself suddenly seized by the arm! There stood an Arnaut, a frightful looking fellow, six feet and upwards in height. O how delusive are hopes in this world! I addressed him in Turkish. Take my watch, my money, my uniform: do not—do not kill me! He replied, that is already mine—your head also,—at the same time loosening the ribbon, (which Hussars wear under the chin to fasten their caps,) and then my neckcloth. Resistance was useless, as I had no weapons. He immediately drew forth his broad knife, and would certainly have plunged it into my body at the least attempt at defence. I clung imploringly around him whilst he loosened my neckcloth; I conjured him to have compassion on me, telling him I was of wealthy parentage; and to make me a prisoner. You will receive a handsome ransom, I added. That is too distant, he replied. Now stand still, that I may cut,—and he was already removing the pin from my shirt collar. Whilst thus embracing him, I again appealed to him to show me some mercy; 'twas unavailing. As he was removing the pin, I felt something hard attached to his girdle; it was a steel hammer. He once more exclaimed, get ready—now stand still;—and these would have been the last words I should ever have heard, if the fear of death had not instigated me to snatch the hammer from his girdle. He did not suspect this, as he held my head in one hand, and clenched his knife in the other. By a powerful effort, I got loose from his grasp—I immediately availed myself of the opportunity to strike him in the face with the hammer, exerting therewith my utmost remaining strength. The hammer was heavy; I did not miss my aim, and the Arnaut staggered back. Time was valuable, and I lost not a moment in repeating my blow ;—the fellow sunk under it, and the knife fell from his hand. It is useless to add that I instantly seized it, and buried it several times in his body.

I immediately fled to our advanced posts, whose arms I saw glittering in the sun, and got into camp. I was afterwards seized with a severe fever, and carried to the hospital.

At the expiration of six weeks the physicians had cured my wounds, and I had recovered my health, when duty recalled me to the army. On my arrival, the gypsy brought me the promised Tokay ; and I learnt from others that during the period that had elapsed, some wonderful prophecies of her's had been fulfilled, and that she had thereby become possessed of valuable property.

In the meantime, two deserters (Christian serfs) had come over to our army : they had been employed to watch the baggage of the Turks, and had fled from fear of punishment for neglect of duty. They said as soon as they beheld the Egyptian prophetess, that she often came to the Turkish camp to carry tidings concerning us. This assertion did not a little surprise us, as this woman had often performed the same service for us, and we were only astonished at the dexterity with which she had often accomplished the most dangerous duties. They convinced us that they were present when she had described the positions of our outposts, apprized the Turks of our movements, advised them to increase their numbers, and excited them, in reality, to the attacks that followed. She had, they said, a Turkish cipher, which served her the purpose of a pass. This was found on her, and she was immediately condemned to be hung for acting the spy. Before her execution, I inquired of her concerning her prophecies with regard to myself. She confessed, that, through the two-fold information which she had procured, for the purpose of the double gain arising therefrom, she had learnt a great deal concerning what was to happen ; and the more easily, as those who had availed themselves of her astrology had confided a great deal to her, and she had turned it to much advantage. Through me she had aspired to considerable celebrity, as she had long before, at random, predicted to me a critical death. On the approach of the 20th of August, the enemy had been instigated by her to make an attack on our outposts on the night of that day. From her intercourse with the officers she had learnt that two stood in the list above me, and she had therefore sold spurious wine to the first which caused his illness—and the second, as he rode off, she had pressingly invited to purchase something of her, and had then introduced unobserved a piece of lighted fungus up his horse's nostril which caused the accident already mentioned.

SCENES IN THE WEST.

NO. II.

On a beautiful morning in early spring, I found myself in the saddle, equipped for a tedious journey of four hundred miles, over the south-western prairies.

During the winter, I had been prostrated by one of the dangerous fevers of the climate. At times, I had raved in the madness of delirium ; at times, I had languished in the helplessness of debility ; but through all its stages, I had felt the same morbid longing for the power of action, and the fresh air of heaven.

Disease passed sluggishly away, strength slowly returned, and directions were given me to join my troop, which at that time was encamped on one of the northern branches of the Arkansas.

Two invalid soldiers formed my train ; and as, with a light heart, but a feeble hand, I bore my rein to the south-west, my sorry detachment shuffled along behind me ; and what with their pale, lank faces, slouching air, and disordered dresses, I thought they would not be bad recruits, in their way, for Falstaff's ragged regiment.

Our route, for the first day, lay along the southern side of the Missouri, but high up on the "rolling hills," back from the dense low forest, which borders its banks. The day was beautiful. The young grass had just burst from its confinement beneath the rich mould ; and as far as the eye could stretch in the distance, the prairie seemed one vast carpet of green, while the ascending columns of rarified air gave it, by their powers of unequal refraction, that wavy and tremulous appearance, which reminds one of a living landscape. The little birds sang merrily in the hazel thickets ; at every step the prairie hen leaped from her tuft of grass, and with a startling whirl, sought some remoter resting-place. To my partial senses, all nature seemed rejoicing, and the very horse which bore me seemed to enjoy the part he played in this animated scene ; I gave him the rein, and when I had galloped until I was alone, I gave vent to the exuberance of my spirits, and shouted and sang for joy. It would have been a silly thing in a crowded thoroughfare, to be sure ; but what convalescent, in the solitude of such a scene, would not have yielded to his pleasurable impulses ?

Before leaving the station, I had made arrangements with an officer of the corps to join me on the route. He had started before me to visit his plantation, which lay within the State, about 200 miles to the south ; and, having business which called him eastward into the settlement, he appointed a rendezvous where I should meet him on my third day's march ; after which, our route for some days would be the same. This arrangement, together with a wish to obtain accommodations for the night, compelled me to regulate my days' journeys with accuracy. Though the trail I was following led entirely without the frontier, yet towards night, I generally deviated to the eastward, where I seldom failed in finding the log cabin of a settler, where those great western commodities, corn-bread and corn, could be had for man, and beast. Such "locations" are generally found, like advanced posts, pushed far forward from the line of civilization. These dwellings are indeed few and far between, and often placed in a hollow, or in some sequestered nook of "timber," where, at a distance, none but a practised eye can detect their position. The little patch of maize furnishes their supplies of bread; the mast-fed swine and fallow deer supply them with meat. None of the professional hosts of the eastern cities can greet their guests with that honest and natural hospitality, which the weary traveller finds at the cabin of one of these rugged woodmen. Often have I stretched my limbs upon my saddle-blanket, in front of a cabin fire, which the man of the house had piled with huge logs, and been lulled to sleep by some quaint and characteristic tale of rough adventure, with bear or savage; and often have I shaken hands in the morning with my rude entertainer, and marked him down in my note-book as "an honest man."

Before noon of the third day, I was enabled to reach the little clump of forest, where I was to meet my friend; and, upon descending the ravine to the little stream which watered the grove, I found him standing by his horse, awaiting my arrival.

My old friend, the Captain, was a remarkable man; one of those primitive and unaffected characters, which we love so well to contemplate, because so rare. He had been accustomed from infancy to all the vicissitudes of a frontier life; the son of a celebrated "Indian fighter," he inherited the nature of his father, and as a half-hunter and Captain of a troop of backwoods rangers, had battled away a long life, on the war-path and the hunting trail. Unused to the artificial notions of refined society, (for he had never been east of the Alleghany hills,) his intellect was as remarkable for strong and just, yet simple features, as his physical habits were plain and unassuming.

The storms of sixty winters seemed never to have blown rudely upon the head of my old companion. His face and brow, though scarred and weather-beaten, were still unfurrowed, while the broad chest and nervous limbs yet betokened the prime of life. All loved the old Captain: from the veteran field-officer, to the fun-loving youngster, he was always entitled to a smile of friendly fellowship. I had often wished for an opportunity to draw from the stories of wild adventure with which I knew his chequered life had been so crowded, and it was now with a feeling of satisfaction, that I found we were pursuing our route together.

We had travelled but a few miles, when we entered upon an unusually large tract of prairie; and but one or two small patches of "timber land," in the distance, seemed to break the monotony of unvaried green. I had kept my eye for some time upon a group of those singular conical mounds, which occur so frequently in the plains of the West, watching particularly the outline of one central and peculiar peak, as, owing to the direction of our journey, it became gradually unmasked by another which intervened.

I observed that my companion was occupied with the same object. "How singular," said I, "is the construction of that hill. Throughout the whole surface the eye cannot detect the minutest hollow, or the smallest shrub, to mar its regularity. It seems as if nature, in one of her vagaries, had mocked the ingenuity of art."

"I have very good cause," said the Captain, "to recollect the structure of that mound." I drew my reins towards him with an air of attention, and he proceeded. "Forty years ago, when the nearest white settlements were three hundred miles to the eastward, I stood upon the summit of that hill, and looked forth upon the plains, with no very pleasant sensations; for I was a ruined man. With a single companion, I had been in the country several months, and we had almost equalled our expectations by our success in trapping beaver. We had been in the habit of cautiously moving from one stream to another, and then keeping quietly in cover till the game became scarce again; for the numerous marauding bands of Indians, which coursed this region in every direction, deterred us from pursuing our sports openly. At the time of which I speak, we were encamped upon this next stream; yonder, to the right, where you see the tops of the 'timber' just peeping above the hill. Leaving my companion at the camp, to make preparation for the morning's meal, I went out as usual, shortly after day-light, to examine the traps, and prepare them anew. I was seated upon a stone at the edge of the water, stripping a beaver of his fur jacket, when I was suddenly startled to my feet, by the pressure of a strong hand upon my shoulder. What was my surprise, on turning around, to find myself confronted with the enemy I feared the most—a gigantic Indian warrior! My first impulse was resistance; but my rifle was at the camp. He saw my situation at once, and indulging in a smile of grim satisfaction, he threw the trap and beaver-skin over his shoulder, and beckoned me to the camp. Upon arriving, I found every thing in possession of a party of ten or twelve Osages, who were preparing for transportation my hard-earned packs of furs, my camp equipage and arms. My comrade, it seems, had fled at the first alarm. I soon learned from their consultations, that the greater part of the band were to set off immediately, with the booty, to their village, while two braves were to remain with me during the remainder of the day ; they were to gather, with my assistance, the traps which were planted above and below, upon the stream, and then follow at leisure. I heard this plan announced, with great satisfaction, and thought I could see in it, if circumspect, an opportunity for escaping. Having found the few missing traps, it was near the middle of the afternoon when we started upon our journey. Leaving the cover of the woods, we ascended upon the prairie, and soon fell upon a well-beaten trail, leading to the Neosho. My escort seemed anxious to overtake their companions, and their long and hasty strides proved none the less inconvenient to me, for being burdened by their traps : finding occasion to adjust my moccasins, I momentarily relieved myself of my burden, and kneeled down to do so. Irritated at the delay, my guards drew out their ramrods, and commenced whipping me. While at this, I observed that the rascal who carried my rifle, held it carelessly in his left hand. With the speed of thought, I wrenched it from his grasp, and springing off several yards, I levelled it at his head. The savage, totally unarmed, fled, and I saw no more of him. Not so his friend. Bringing the sights of my piece instantly to cover him, I called out to him, that the moment he raised his, I should fire ; thus we stood for at least five minutes, he striving for an opportunity to gain the advantage, and I intent upon preventing it. At length he showed a disposition to parley, and throwing the butt of his gun upon the ground, he said—'the prairie is very big.' With this he made a sweeping gesture with his arm, 'and the muskrat and beaver are more than we can both catch. The Moyatunga wishes to look for more game, or to go back to his wigwam and find more trap ; let him throw the powder from his gun, and turn his back upon his brother and go !'

"I saw that his object was to gain the very advantage which I had acquired at so much risk, and I replied to his proposition in the same strain. 'It is the gift of the red skin,' said I, 'to glory in the scalp of an infant, and to fire upon his enemy when he does not see his face. My brother has seen the little crayfish on the sand-banks of the little streams. Let us both walk backwards like them, till we see each other no longer.'

Much to my surprise he acceded to this singular proposal, and we both rapidly commenced our retrograde movements, he carefully watching for any inadvertency on my part, and I as carefully covering him with the sights of my piece, until beyond gunshot, when we both turned and resumed our respective journeys. After looking in vain for my fugitive comrade, from the top of yonder singular mound, I shaped my course to the nearest trapping depot, and soon obtained a new outfit and supply."

As the Captain concluded his narrative, the sun had already touched the western horizon, and our lengthening shadows stretching far away to our left, seemed to point to our accustomed resting-place.

"We must make our camp upon the next stream," said the Captain, "for we have left behind us the only trail which leads to a settlement hereabouts."

"But the provisions," said I ; not a little startled at the possibility of no supper.

"Never fear," replied my old friend, "an old ranger like me seldom depends wholly upon the corn-bread and 'chicken fixins' of the squatter farms. I have that in my haversack which will make you all ripe for a long march to-morrow, without the aid of a woman's skill to cook it. But come ! let us jog on, and select our lodgings."

We trotted briskly down a slope, and entered that never-failing indication of a stream, a belt of woodland. Picketing our horses where they could crop the tender pea-vine, and the young buds of the mulberry, we selected our bivouac beneath the wide-spreading branches of a huge cotton tree, threw down our saddles and blankets ; and so "our house was put in order !" The two men gathered dry branches and kindled a fire, while the old Captain drew from his saddlebags the stores which were to form our meal ; and I did not regret the change I had made, when I saw our supper was to consist of a venison ham, some broiled grouse and hot coffee.

The darkness of the night was beginning to be made more visible by the brilliancy of our fire, and two or three bright stars were already twinkling through the leaves of the tree above us, when we finished our comfortable repast. I had observed, with pleasure, that my friend was unusually happy and communicative, frequently in conversation cracking a sly jest, or so far departing from his habitual gravity as to make the forest glades ring with his hearty laughter. I was not surprised at his elation, for he had just escaped from a winter's infliction of the ennui of a garrison, and was pursuing the path which led to all he held dear ; but I could not refrain from taking advantage of so favorable a time, to request him to relate some tale of his youthful adventures.

"Just hand me the flask of Monongahela," said the old woodsman, smoothing the blanket on which he reclined, and resting his head upon a root of the cotton-wood tree, "it is good to make the mind run free over the course of half a century, like a wet sponge in the mouth of a racing nag."

The Captain's potation was very moderate—but he smacked his lips with exceeding satisfaction.

"I will tell you a story now, my boy," said he, "and it shall be a lesson for your benefit, if you ever have the fortune to get a wife in the woods. 'Tis not like the stories of men who marry wives in the white settlements ; for in it you will hear no tender passages about lasting love, and vows, and what not, but the plain story of a simple hunter, who imagined he could better his condition, by procuring a helpmate in the wilderness. I was born in Virginia, he commenced, and moved, at a very early period to one of the westernmost districts of Kentucky. My father was one of the earliest pioneers to the country, which was then more of a wilderness than this. Besides the natural difficulties of subduing the soil, we were forced for our very existence to wage a constant warfare with its savage owners. My father was a bold and stalwart hunter, and soon gained great celebrity by his fearful prowess as an Indian fighter. I find he is even now spoken of with reverence, and it gladdens my old heart to hear that his name is a glory to the west. Some of my earliest recollections must of course be connected with his exploits; I have seen him so often return to our cabin tired, and bleeding, from a fight with a band of Shawnees; and then I can recollect with more distinctness when I came to be a tall youth, with what pride I could shoulder my rifle, and trudge along behind my parent, on the accustomed war-path. Naturally strong of limb and quick of sight, it was thus, by our frequent forest skirmishes, that I gained the little knowledge I possess of the military art."

Here the veteran drew a long sigh; for his mind doubtless reverted to the numerous perplexities with which the tactics of Napoleon, with their squares and angles, lines, échellons and "prompt manœuvres," confuse one who has been educated in a system, whose principles are, a blind trail, a quick eye, and a leafy cover.

"But I am wandering from my story," he added, "and running off too rapidly. During my early boyhood, while I was yet only able to wage war with my rifle upon the squirrel and wild pigeon, most of my time was employed at a distant school, with the other boys of the settlement, in gathering the scanty stock of knowledge which our pedagogue had imported from New-England. As this was what was called a 'neighborhood school,' the pupils necessarily came from a great distance, their respective homes being widely separate from each other, and, according to the homely customs of the country, boys and girls, received their instruction in the same apartment. Among the latter was a child, a little younger than myself, the daughter of our nearest neighbor. Her name was Mary; she was a sweet and modest little girl; and this, with her frank and fearless disposition, had attached me to her from her childhood, as a constant playmate and companion. I can call to my mind now, the heartfelt, and yet to me, mysterious satisfaction, with which I have so often accompanied her from the door of her little cabin, through the long and winding forest-path, which led to our humble school. How merrily we were wont to trip along that shady avenue, she plucking the flowers and chasing the nimble ground-squirrel, while I carried the burden of her basket and books, with a light and happy heart. How often have I even looked anxiously for the panther or wild cat to step across our path, that I might show my devotion and exert my strength, in the defence of my little companion. But the attachment which I then felt and acknowledged was mysterious to me; I did not know even its name and nature, for I was but the merest boy. In the midst of its sweetest enjoyment, a change came over this happiest period of my youth.

"The father of Mary, anxious to push his fortune where he would find fewer competitors, packed up and sought a home still farther west, deeper in the wilderness. It was a sad thing to me, this sudden departure; but as I knew not well how to define my feelings, like every other childish 'like and dislike,' they melted away in time, like a momentary ripple on a lake. At fourteen, I left the school; with a natural fondness for active pursuits, I soon perfected myself in all the manly sports and hardy occupations of a western borderer. My eyes are dim now, my boy, and not the best at a long shot; but I could once bring down a running buck at the farthest range. When the scouts brought word that the Indians were on the war-path, I could take my place on the outlying picket, with the oldest of our hunters. And who could have a better teacher than myself, to scour a thicket in silence, or to step with a noiseless moccasin! Before the age of twenty, I became restless. With the eye of one who has been taught to consider the vast wilderness his home, I looked with distrust upon the rapid increase of new-comers.

"Every fresh arrival increased that sensation which I should suppose would be mine, if temporarily a tenant of a crowded city. The forests became cleared up; the game disappeared; Indian depredations were less frequent; and I pined for the woods once more. My determination was soon made, and I informed my father that I was about to seek my fortune in the west.

"He gave me his consent, and his blessing. It was a bright morning when I bade adieu to my friends, and launched my canoe upon the Ohio. My outfit was simple, but it was sufficient. As perhaps your ideas of an outfit, wherewith to begin life, call to your mind broad acres and bank-stock, I will describe it. A rifle of well-tried qualities, a knife, an axe, a blanket, haversack, and traps; these, with my canoe, a stout heart, and a ready hand, were the capital upon which my fortunes depended. My journey down the Ohio was then slow and difficult; the old cotter's wood trees on its sandy margin, had never then heard the noise of the 'escape-pipe'; the bars and banks were still where the uncontrolled current had left them, and the snags and sawyers threw out their arms in the wildest confusion. It was more than a week after my departure, and I had probably gained upwards of three hundred miles upon my journey, when I found myself, one starlight night, carefully managing the intricate navigation, and looking for a suitable place for repose on shore. As I paddled my canoe around a point, my eye was suddenly arrested by some living object, standing over the edge of the water; though the dim starlight did not enable me to see it distinctly, yet I did not doubt for a moment, that the animal was a deer, come down to drink.

"Laying my paddle down, I seized my rifle and levelled it at the object. At the very moment, when I was prepared to fire, my canoe having moved a few yards by the onward motion I had previously given it, a strong clear light streamed suddenly from behind a thicket, lighting up the barrel of my piece, and showing distinctly the nature of the game at which I was aiming. It was the figure of a woman. With a single stroke, I ran my canoe on shore, when I asked the young person if there was a cabin near, and lodging for a stranger? 'My father's house is but a few yards distant,' she replied, 'and strangers are always welcome.' There was something in the tones of her voice, which struck me as strangely familiar; and, impelled by a sudden impulse, I sprang from my boat and approached her. You can judge of my surprise and delight, when I found I was standing, face to face, with my little companion of the old-field school. The light I had seen proceeded from the dwelling of her father; and she quickly led me to him, where I claimed his hospitality. As you may suppose, I soon commenced my courtship. I will not describe it; but it differed much from the endless courtships of modern days, filled up with half love and half jealousy; with coqueting, flirting, jilting, repentance and reconciliation. In two days only my preliminaries were all settled, and the marriage concluded. The morning of the third, found me mounted upon a stout horse, and my wife upon the poney which was her dower; and thus I resumed my journey to the westward.

"I will not speak of the after-events of my life, farther than to say, that we coursed the untrodden wilderness until we found a home, far from the haunts of men."

The old Captain ceased speaking; the two men were already snoring by their fire; and raking together the embers, and heaping it with fuel anew, we wrapped ourselves in our blankets, and soon slept soundly.

It was in the morning of our fifth day's march, that we approached the point, where the road which led to the Captain's farm, diverged from the route I was pursuing. When we reached the "fork," the invitations of the good old man were so pressing and sincere, that I should spend a day with his family, I could not resist, though my time was short and limited.

"We have a long ride before us," said he, "and as our nags will rest to-morrow, we will pass over the space at a brisker trot."

As we advanced, the appearance of the country materially changed, in comparison with the monotonous prairie which had bounded our vision on the other course.

After riding through much uneven ground, covered with frequent patches of scrub-oak, we came to a more mountainous tract. Our road lay sometimes on the summit of a lofty ridge, sometimes in the gorge of a dark valley; the soil seemed barren; and from the frequent appearance of blackened scoria and half-vitrified stone, which covered the surface in every direction, I concluded this region had been subject to volcanic convulsions, though their sources were now extinct. This is the hilly range, as laid down in the chronicles of some of the old Spanish historians, when the adventurous De Soto, after his disastrous conquests and fruitless explorations, first wheeled the ranks of his shattered squadrons, to seek again the banks of the Mississippi.

That band of bold and stalwart gentlemen, picked from the choicest chivalry of the court of Spain, had started upon their fearful march, proud in all the pomp and glitter of a field-day pageant. With light hearts and bright hopes, they thought the subjugation of empires but an easy path to wealth and honor. Many a gallant cavalier already saw in anticipation the riches and laurels he was to lay at the feet of his lady-love.

From a lofty ridge, as the sun threw his declining rays across an adjacent defile, I almost fancied I could see the remnants of that weary and disappointed band, with broken armor and trailing lances, struggling with the obstacles of their homeward journey.

It was yet bright twilight, when, having forded a noisy and swollen stream, we found ourselves in the fertile valley, where my friend informed me his plantation was situated. A few moments brought us to his door; and then such a scene of gladsome and heartfelt greeting, I never witnessed. The huge watch-dog on the porch howled with a smiling face; the little negroes ran out, grinning intensely, in the very ecstasy of joy, while the good dame with her family hastened to meet us.

"This is my wife," said the Captain, after the first salutations were over; "and there are my sons and daughters. I will not stop now to call over their muster-roll, but I leave you to find out their names at your leisure from themselves."

This might be considered a difficult task for a modest man, but my frank and warm reception soon enabled me to accomplish it. Our evening meal was served in bountiful profusion, and when the table was cleared away, and the fire replenished in the huge fireplace, the whole household gathered around it. It struck me that I never before had behold such a pure and beautiful picture of domestic peace. The venerable ranger occupied the middle seat; one tall and comely daughter was parting the few grey locks which strayed over his weather-beaten brow; another sprightly girl was seated on a stool at his knee, listening with deep attention to some tale he was relating of the fashions of the Eastern ladies of the garrisons. The old lady, with an air of infinite contentment, occupied a chair by his side.

"The Captain has related to me," said I, addressing her, when a suitable pause occurred, "some passages in his early life and yours; am I to consider the tale as but a test of my credulity?"

"It is all true," replied she, looking quietly into the face of her husband, with a calm and happy smile, "he did take me for a deer."

But why should I draw the veil which covers the happy fortunes of my old friend, the Captain? Suffice it to say, it was with a feeling strongly akin to regret, that I found myself, on the third day of my visit, once more in the saddle. My pale and sickly escort seemed ten times more hungry looking than before, for doubtless they mourned the fine quarters and luxurious rations, the like of which they would not soon see again. My friend accompanied me on foot through the forest, to set me aright upon the trail I was to pursue; when, bidding me a hearty farewell, I bore my bridle hand once more to the south-westward.

D. B. G. N.

MY MUSE.

Born of the sunlight and the dew,

That met amongst the flow'rs,

That on the river margin grew

Beneath the willow bow'rs;

Her earliest pillow was a wreath

Of violets newly blown,

And the meek incense of their breath

Became at once her own.

Her cradle hymn the river sung

In that same liquid tone,

With which it gave, when earth was young,

Praise to the Living One;

The breeze that lay upon its breast

Responded with a sigh,

And the sweet ring-dove from her nest

Warbled her lullaby.

The only nurse she ever knew

Was Nature, free and wild:

Such was her birth; and so she grew

A moody, wayward child,

Who loved to climb the rocky steep,

To wade the mountain stream;

To lie beside the sounding deep

And weave the enchanted drom.

She lov'd the paths with shadows dim

Beneath the dark-leav'd trees,

Where Nature's feather'd seraphim

Mingled their melodies;

To dance amongst the pensile stems
Whose blossoms bright and sweet,
Threw diamonds from their diadems
Upon her fairy feet.

She lov'd to watch the day-star float
Upon the aerial sea,

Till morning sunk his pearly boat

In floods of brilliancy;

To see the angel of the storm

Upon his wind-wing'd car,

With dark clouds wrapt around his form

Come shouting from afar;

And pouring treasures rich and free,

The pure refreshing rain,

Till every weed and forest tree

Could boast its diamond chain;

Then rising with the hymn of praise

That swell'd from hill and dale,

Leave a rainbow—sign of peace—

Upon his misty veil.

She lov'd the wave's deep utterings,

And gaz'd with frenzied eye

When night shook lightning from his wings,

And winds went sobbing by.

Full oft I chid the wayward child

Her wanderings to restrain,

And sought her airy limbs to bind

With prudence's worldly chain.

I bade her stay within my cot

And ply the housewife's art;

She heard me, but she heeded not;

Oh who can bind the heart!

I told her she had none to guide

Her inexperienced feet,

To where through Tempe's valley glide

Castalia's waters sweet.

No son of fame to take her hand

And lead her blushing forth,

Proclaiming to a laurel'd band

A youthful sister's worth;

That there was none to help her climb

The steep and toilsome way,

To where, above the mists of time

Shines genius' living ray.

Where wreath'd with never-fading flow'rs

The Harp immortal lies,

Filling the souls that reach those bow'rs

With heavenly melodies.

I warn'd her of the cruel foes

That throng that rugged path,

Where many a thorn of misery grows,

And tempests wreak their wrath.

I told her of the serpent's dread

With malice-pointed fangs;

The yellow-blossom'd weeds that shed

Derision's maddening pangs;

And of the broken mouldering lyres

Thrown carelessly aside,

Telling the winds with shivering wires

How noble spirits died.

I said her sandals were not meet

Such journey to essay,

There should be gold beneath the feet

That tempt Fame's toilsome way.

But while I spoke, her burning eye

Was flashing in the light

That shone upon that mountain high,

Insufferably bright.

And soft upon the balmy air
 Castalia's murmurs came,
 And gentle spirits hymning there
 Breath'd forth her humble name.
 And bending from the dizzy height
 The blossom'd laurel seem'd,
 And wreaths of bloom divinely bright
 Like crowns of glory gleamed;
 While streaming from the Eternal Lyre,
 Like distant echoes, came
 A strain that wrapp'd her soul in fire,
 And thrill'd her trembling frame.
 She sprang away, that wayward child,
 The Harp! the Harp! she cried.
 And still she climbs and warbles wild
 Along the mountain's side.

LYDIA JANE.

ELOQUENCE IN NEW-ENGLAND.

Scraps from the Diary of a Virginian, sojourning in Boston, 183—.

Jan. 27. Called at Mr. S——'s office. L. S. C—— says, there is no such thing as eloquence in New-England. Cause: the cold, phlegmatic, matter-of-fact character of the people. In the Massachusetts General Court,* an additional cause is the total absence of equality between opposing parties; leaving no need for the majority, and no hope for the minority, to influence measures by much discussion—i. e. those great and soul-stirring measures, which are the only occasions of eloquence.

At 7 P. M., went, according to appointment, with W. P. H., to the great Temperance meeting in Bowdoin-Street Church. It is an immense building; and was packed then, as full of people as it could well hold—galleries, pews, and even aisles; 2500, or 3000 persons were present. We pressed forward, along the main aisles; and nearing the pulpit, a gentleman met us, and led us on to some pews which, he said, were "set apart for members of the Legislature;" and stowed us in one of them. Just then the organ and choir struck up an ode written for the occasion; making the most sublime music I ever heard, except from a military band, where the star-spangled banner, inscribed with was floating in the breeze.

The meeting having been organized by placing Lieut. Governor Armstrong in the chair, as Moderator, he rose, and begged leave to introduce to the assembly the Rev. Mr. P. Mr. P thereupon stepped forward, mounted a platform leading to the pulpit, and moved a resolution against the making or the sale of ardent spirits; supporting it by an address of 30 or 40 minutes. He laid his watch on the table before him, in order, he said, that he might not trespass too long. This implied, that he knew not what he was going to say: since, if he did, that, and not the watch would determine the limits of his speech.

* So the Legislature is there called. It consists, re member, of more than 600.

For a while, he went on very forcibly. His arguments to shew the immorality of the traffic, were powerfully stated; and some of them were novel to me; so were his illustrations. A parallel between the druggist who sells opium or arsenic, with which he knows the buyer is going to kill himself, and the grocer who sells spirit with the like knowledge,—was eminently well drawn. But at length Mr. P. 's memory 'gan fail; and incontinently, drew he from his pocket his speech all written, whereto he was thereafter ever and anon obliged abjectly to recur—and this, not seldom, amid his most towering and surprising impromptu flights and bursts. As a lady said, those were indeed earthward flights.

After Mr. P., the Moderator introduced the Rev. Mr. M.; who, taking the stand, moved, and supported by a committed-to-memory speech, a resolution commending the Temperance cause especially to young men. Nothing remarkable, in speech or speaker. He corrected a mistake of the Moderator, in calling him Reverend; an epithet to which he had no claim. A very young man he.

Next, Mr. S. d, of Northampton. I thought, from his thin, gosling voice, and thinner, boyish face and frame, that he was a scarcely half-fledged theological student, who, like the last speaker, was suffered to bore us with a præ-condite oration, because we were now jammed in the church past extrication. But I found afterwards, that he was a Representative in the General Court; yea, and a frequent speaker there!—His resolution was against the carrying of spirits among partially civilized people, with whom we have intercourse: and his speech was a forcible series of statements, shewing the quantities, and the baleful fruits of such exportations.

Next, Mr. Waterston, of Boston. "Another theological student"—thought I—"a murrain to them!"—Mr. W. seemed not over 20 years old. Thick lips and nose, rather full face, black or dark blue eyes, ruddy, college-studentish complexion: no promise of talent in his tout-ensemble. His resolution imported, that "the wives and children of drunkards were especial objects of commiseration." Never did a speaker so agreeably surprise me. For three quarters of an hour, he chained my attention as it had not been for years before—unless when I was to reply—and the attention of the whole audience, as I never saw such an one enchained. His speech—at least the greater part of it—was evidently extempore. His voice was moderately strong; and it was clear, and musical: his gesture natural, appropriate, and impressive, though not particularly graceful.

He delineated the effects of drunkenness upon a husband and a father—the beggared, ill-taught, vitiated children—the abused, sorrowing, heart-broken wife. From his own observation (for he seemed familiar with the haunts of misery) he gave several instances of families reduced to the keenest sufferings by intemperance; and told of 100 establishments for selling rum, in a single ward of the city—ward No. 2.

Never can I forget the blank horror, the profound, expressive silence and stillness, that reigned throughout the vast assembly, at one incident he told. A drunken husband,—a frequenter, too, of Abner Kneeland's infidel lectures—had two children, and a wife who was tidy, pious, affectionate, industrious. Her son, 3 or 4 years old, and daughter (7 or 8), were pupils at the Bethel Sunday-school, where young Waterston is a teacher. The little girl used to remonstrate, greatly shocked, with her father, for studiously teaching her brother profane and obscene language. The father swore at her, and treated her roughly. He tried to keep her from the Sunday-school; but ineffectually. At length she fell sick, and lingered for many weeks. Her mother nursed her day and night, besides having their little household to keep in order—to cook, to wash, and to make fires. She strove always to have things comfortably and orderly by the time her husband returned; as he did commonly, late at night, drunk. The sick bed of his child—even the faint expostulations of her pale lips, and the mute eloquence of her wasted cheek, had no effect upon him. He continued to come home drunk; to storm at his wife, and curse at the remonstrances of his daughter. "The d—d Sunday-school was to blame for her folly," he said. At last she died. He came home, drunk, as usual; and asked how she was. "She is dead"—said her mother; pointing to the shrouded corpse. He approached the bed—uncovered the face—looked sulkily at it a while—then tore off the sheet, twisted it up furiously with both hands, and dashed it in his dead child's face!

The speaker offered not a word of comment upon this narrative: nor was it necessary. His natural, simple language, his deep voice, rendered solemn by deep feeling,—his blanching cheek, and fixed, expressive countenance, reflecting back and heightening the dismay visible in the sea of countenances before and around him,—sunk each horrible fact deeper into every heart, than the most skilfully labored strains of rhetorical invective or lamentation could have done. He followed this up by an appeal to the young men; invoking them into this as their appropriate, noblest field of usefulness and of glory—a field not only attractive to them by the rich opportunities it afforded, but one in which they were peculiarly interested, because, just entering into the community, they held the largest stake in its welfare—a stake which nothing perilled so fearfully as Intemperance.

Mr. W. spoke about 45 minutes; and sat down amidst thunders of applause, in which, though very averse to that mode of expressing approbation, I could not help joining.

The Reverend Mr. Gannett was next announced. He is colleague, or alternate, to the great Dr. Channing, in one of the Unitarian Churches here. Enough had been told me of Mr. G.'s talents and character by Mr.  of N., to prepossess me strongly in his favor. He moved a resolve, that "The Cause of Temperance needs to be supported by earnest, kind, and plain language." I have seldom heard a discourse more neatly and logically distributed and connected, or more forcibly and appropriately phrased, than his was.

He meant not (he said) to exclude the other means of promoting the cause, upon which his precursors had dwelt: he contemplated the sort of language of which his resolution spoke, as but auxiliary to those means. He then proceeded to inculcate the degree of zeal which would prompt earnest language—expatiated on the momentousness of the Cause—the dread evils it warred against—the efficacy of the remedy proposed. To arouse the mass of our countrymen from their strange and unnatural apathy on this whole subject, those who professed to be its advocates must assume a tone more indicative of self-conviction and of alertness—must speak, as men, deeply possessed with important truths, will ever speak—must, with energy becoming the vital theme, utter forth "thoughts that breathe, and words that burn."

Secondly, Mr. G. enjoined kind language. We should remember, how new were our own convictions in regard to the Temperance reformation—remember the strength of hostile prejudices, and the inveteracy of adverse habits—habits, both of act and of thought. We should bear in mind, that they are our brethren whom we wish to bring over: and to them, fraternal language was due. Besides, with all mankind, reason, persuasion, mildness, were far more effectual for disseminating truth, than hectoring and violence. Yankees, especially, were to be operated upon only by the former means—for a full blooded Yankee would always listen calmly to your reasonings, and if he found them just,—none so ready to be guided by them: but the moment you offered to drive him,—he was the most stubborn animal on earth: he would not move one inch.

[A laugh of delight arose, at this tribute to sectional vanity. I could not join in it heartily; being a little displeased at its confinement to Yankees. I thought Mr. Gannett should have said Americans. In a moment, however, I reflected, that one of our orators would probably have been quite as exclusive—nay, more so—would have said, not Americans, nor even Southrons, but Virginians. Besides—the word Yankee is sometimes the sobriquet of all Americans : the proper, distinctive, and philosophical designation of the New-Englanders, at least in our Virginia vernacular, being, as every body knows, "D——d Yankees."]

Thirdly, Mr. G. enjoined plain language : that is, language at once intelligible and unequivocal. Such language as Paul used in his preaching. Such language as that of John Adams, when he said "Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to" the vote for Independence. Such as when Patrick Henry exclaimed, "Give me liberty, or give me death!"—Such language as ever flows spontaneously from a mind bent, not on displaying its own riches or power, but on imparting its impressions clearly and strongly to other minds. Such, in fine, as the prophet used, to the conscience-stricken King of Israel—"Thou art the man!"—Such language as this,—not temporizing nor mealy-mouthed, and not to be misunderstood, yet tempered by the kindness of Christian and fraternal feeling, and breathing that impassioned earnestness which a proper zeal for the Cause would naturally inspire—could not fail, Mr. G. said, to make that cause spread, and prosper, and triumph.

Applauses due, followed the close of Mr. Gannett's address. His person and manner are in several respects unprepossessing. His shoulders stoop awkwardly, with a carriage of themselves and the head, which the uncharitable might construe into affectation of humility. His wide mouth and flaccid lips betoken a want of energy ; and his voice is feeble, or rather sing-song and unmasculine, without the dulcet softness of woman's voice. But if he have not the statuary and music, he has much of the soul of oratory : and you need not hear him long, before the infelicities of his outer man are forgotten, in the tendency of what he utters, to please, convince, and persuade.

As each speaker ended, his resolution was put to the vote by "Mr. Moderator," in the queer fashion of Yankee land—saying, "As many as are in favor of this resolution will please to manifest!"—when, up went a thousand hands. Then, says he, "Those opposed!"—when up went no hand at all. He thereupon announced, that the resolution was "unanimously adopted."

A second ode, written expressly for the occasion, was then sung by the choir. At half past nine, the meeting was adjourned. The organ and choir gave parting strains, well suited to preserve the elevated and delighted feelings with which the two last addresses were heard. Nor was the spectacle of such an immense assembly, breaking up and moving towards the doors, all in perfect order—all visibly and deeply impressed with the solemn and powerful truths they had heard—the least imposing part of the scene.

I went away, to my lodging at the T. House, guided by my kind friend W. P. H.'s arm, congratulating myself on having come to this Temperance meeting, instead of going to a cotillon party at Mrs. F.'s in C., to which I was bidden some days ago. Yet I was quite anxious to attend the party : not only to see that form of Yankee mirth, but to try how far I could outdo these descendants of the Pilgrims in a sport wherein, by country and by usage, I fancied myself entitled to excel them.

Wished that L. S. C. had been at this meeting ; and wondered if he would then still have said "there is no such thing as eloquence in New-England."

THE WHITE FAWN:

A TALE OF WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Yes, 'tis a tale twice told—a tale of border life, woven with the incidents of early emigration to the West. But to me it is fresh and beautiful ; for with it, crowd up the recollections of the trials of my ancestors, and, at the same time, of that other race, who, little more than half a century ago, claimed these territories as their own. Here, upon these grounds, which I now call my own, and which are smiling under a teeming harvest, the proud Indian warrior once walked, the sole proprietor. Here, his swift foot pursued the panting deer, and his sure arrow drank the blood of the beast of prey ;—here, went up the loud cry of war ; here, the death song ; and here, when the shout of battle ceased, buried he under this venerable tree, the hatchet wiped from blood ;—here, he smoked his pipe of peace ; here, kindled up his council-fire. There, in that deep grove, the brave of a hundred scalps, gathered his children, with the young of his tribe, and recounted his deeds of prowess, and kindled in their breasts the flame of patriotism ;—there, in that same retreat, the young chieftain "wooed his dusky maid," and drank the rapture of her deep dark eye. On the surface of yonder gently flowing stream, he paddled his light canoe. But alas ! they are all gone : they left no historian to pen their story ; no poet, to celebrate their achievements in song. Forgetfulness, almost complete, has passed over all they had, and the very traces of their being are almost gone—

"The plough is on their hunting grounds,
The white man's axe rings through their woods!"

Reader ! If the oft-repeated narratives of this hapless race have ceased to interest thee, thou needest not read further : for this is but a simple recital of a simple incident, connected with the early history of thy country's settlement. It introduces one of that proud class of beings, who, as we said before, had neither historian nor poet, of their own, to commit their names to the rolls of immortality; their sole memorials consist in the traditional memoirs which our forefathers have related to us, when we gathered around them to hear of their border troubles.

The history of the settlements on our Western frontier is replete with the most thrilling incidents. It is not wonderful that it should be so; for it was there that the Indian took his stand, and endeavored to hold at bay the people who had already usurped a large share of his inheritance. It was there he made a desperate halt to oppose those approaches, and to check that rapacity which seemed to threaten the entire consumption of all that he possessed. In those scenes were displayed all the strength, greatness and ferocity of Indian character.

When this country was first visited by Europeans, they found its possessors kind, generous and unsuspecting, to a fault. They welcomed them as demigods, and received them with the open-heartedness of brothers; but they had opened their bosom to warm the viper—they found, when it was too late, that it had struck its fangs deep; and that though the poison acted slowly, it would not cease until it had consumed the whole body. Before the eyes of the red man were open, the pale faces had obtained too firm a footing to be dislodged; and after a few fruitless efforts to maintain his home East of the mountains, he turned his eyes for the last time to the blue Atlantic, along whose shores he had so often loitered, listening to the roar of the surge, as the mighty voice of his father—the Great Spirit; and then turned his footsteps to the hunting-grounds of the immeasurable West. True, it was not without regret; for as one of these stricken but proud men gained the highest peak of the Alleghanies, he looked back, and the strong feelings of his strong soul were moved to agony—an agony which writhed the features even of this “stoic of the woods.” There, thought he, are the graves of my sires; there, thought I to rest by their sides. There, I first pursued the chase; there, were the wigwams and the corn-fields of my tribe. But our fields are desolate, our council-fires are gone out, and our wigwams are in ashes!

As he thought of all these, a tear filled his eye, but it dropped not; it returned again to its fount, for the spirit of Vantappa was not a woman's. He could not weep; deep thoughts agitated his bosom. Once again he turned his eyes to his forsaken home, then Westward bled he to the vale of the Ohio.

The sinking sun was flooding the hill-tops and the forests with gold; and as he gazed upon the beauty of the scene, his soul was calmed, and he thanked the Great Spirit that he might yet have a home. “Here,” said he, “the enemy may not come—may not come!” he started at the echo of his own voice—“may not come!” and again there seemed to be a portentous echo—“he may come.” The very thought struck through every nerve, and distended his already herculean frame. With eyes and hands uplifted to heaven, he imprecated a curse upon himself, a curse upon his children, a curse upon his whole tribe, if they ever made peace with any white man. “Let him dwell by the waves of the great water—let him live in peace, but let him not follow in the trail of Vantappa, for here Vantappa will never pity! Ah! let the breath of the Great Spirit breathe in his face, if he cross this barrier; let sickness blast and wither him; let famine and thirst parch him; let not his arrows find game, nor the earth give him corn; let his children all be girls, and the hearts of his men become as the hearts of squaws. Great Spirit! hear the prayer of Vantappa!”

A few years passed away, and the tide of emigration rolled Westward. The enterprising spirit of the Virginians had carried them to the top of the mighty barrier which separates the exuberant valley of the Mississippi from the Atlantic regions; and there they were enabled to catch glimpses of a portion of country richer far than any that their eyes had before seen. Rumor had brought them tidings of the richness of its soil; of its mighty forests; its rich and extended prairies; its beautiful and majestic streams; the Ohio, “la belle riviere,” with its fairy isles; the Mississippi, “father of waters,” with its thousand tributaries; and it had been heard—so grand and fertile was this region—that here the aborigines fixed the place of departed shades, where the Great Spirit took his children after this life, and led them to woods where game never was scarce, and corn grew without labor.

It was determined to form a settlement. About twenty families departed, and soon founded “a local habitation” on a small branch of the Kanawha, in a well protected valley of small extent, and known by the name of Fenloe Valley. Never were greater hardships suffered by any people in making for themselves a home—but these need not be enumerated. The graphic pen of a Hall has delineated them so faithfully, that to most readers they are familiar things, and stand out before the mind like beautiful pictures.

Of the company we refer to, were Mr. Weldon and his large family. He had left a beautiful home in the East, not because want had driven him from it, for by moderate labor his plantation had yielded him a comfortable living; but his children were rising up around him—and he knew, that to divide his possessions among them, their patrimony must be small. Actuated then by the same spirit which has been prevalent in our own day, he sold his homestead with its numerous and valuable improvements, and with the proceeds purchased a more ample one in the valley we have named.

But he little anticipated the hardships which were to be the attendants of this change of homes! The very first year the murderous Indian had robbed him of three of his children; and more than once was the existence of his whole family jeopardized.

At the end of the sixth year, comfort, comparative comfort, began to be realized; and Mr. Weldon thought that the hours of trial were past. With all a father's affection, as his family gathered around him in the evening, and he saw every cheek blushing with health and buoyancy, and every eye beaming with delight and contentment, he thanked his God for the change, and rejoiced that he had done wisely in removing, and thus securing competence to his children, and at the same time removing them from the temptations so incident to Eastern life at that time. But alas! the hours of trial had not been completed.

The hated foe, it is true, had retired, but not forever. The eagle had sought its eyry, and the lion its covert; but it was only to beguile into repose their unsuspecting victims. Again and again, at widened intervals, did the blow of the tomahawk and scalping knife fall; but the hand that dealt it was not seen. The arrow was swifter than the eagle's swoop, and the tomahawk than the lion's bound.

Of that contented family, there was one whose seat was always by her father's side; she claimed it as her right, though she had none to envy her. She was now an only daughter; and her brothers loved her, I had almost said, with a father's love. But the strength of a father's love! who can know it, save a father's heart; and that too, only when the object of its affection is torn away! But they loved her absorbingly; and well they might, when she was their only sister: two others, who had removed with them to the West, had fallen; and she alone was left; and could she but become the idol of her parents, the pride of her brothers? But little did that father think, as the mild blue eyes of his daughter looked up into his own, and he, in turn, looked down into their quiet depth, that those eyes were to start with terror, and that that fair face was soon to be blanched with the hue of death—that the idol of his house was to become the captive of the savage.

Agnes, at this time, was just seventeen years of age. Her stature was rather below the ordinary size, but moulded into one of the richest forms of beauty. The winds of heaven had not visited her face so roughly as to destroy its clearness, or hide the purple veins that went eddying through her marble temples, but they had put upon her cheek the blushing rose of health. Her hair was light, and fell in golden tresses over her snowy shoulders. Her hands were small and of the most delicate proportions, so much so indeed that the hale yeoman as he gave it the hearty shake, (a custom, by-the-by, never omitted by our Southern and Wes- tern settler,) wondered for what it could be made. But these were external charms; there were far greater ones to make her loved. But pardon this descant. "I tell the tale as 'twas told to me." The Indians marked her surpassing loveliness; and from these she first received the appellation of "The White Fawn," for the exceeding fairness of her complexion, and the airy lightness of her step. Agnes Weldon was also the pride of the settlers; and their descendants have linked her name with the most beautiful legend of their history.

Can any one suppose that a lovely creature at the age of seventeen could live, and yet not be the object of tender thought on the part of many of the stronger sex? There were many of the sons of the settlers who often sought the society of our heroine, and more than one felt anxious to bow before the magic of her beauty. But there was only one who dared to claim this heart as his own.

Agnes never could boast, as some modern belles say they can, that she had twenty offers, and yet rejected them all. She never had but one; and it was not until this period that she even dreamed she loved.

George Benton was four years older than Agnes. With his father's family he had come out to the West at the same time with the Weldons. From childhood he and Agnes had been playmates. Growing up in each other's society, they loved before they knew how to describe what love was. To George Benton, from his very boyhood, Agnes had ever seemed the most beautiful and lovely girl of all his acquaintances; and never did he recollect an hour to have passed tediously by, if she were at his side, or the companion of his sports. To Agnes, in turn, he had ever been the beau ideal of every thing that was excellent. No other boy possessed nobler sentiments; no other one was half so manly; none knew how to handle a rifle better, or to take better aim;—to manage his horse more gracefully—to tell a tale or a joke with better effect than he—no one had a more generous soul or intellectual mind—in short, to do any thing as George Benton did it, was, or begun to be about this period, perfection.

But was this love? They did not think so. To be sure they had a sort of indefinite feeling, that some how or other they could not tell precisely how, their hearts seemed to be growing together. But neither the one nor the other had yet found a name for it. What was it then? It was but destiny, weaving about them the "web inseparate," which was to prove in time how indissolubly their being was united. Their affections were already so wedded, that their souls were e'en "one spirit within two frames—one passion in twin hearts."

How beautiful is love when it thus groweth! Like the vine that slowly and almost imperceptibly putteth forth tendril after tendril, grasping the object of its support, until it so winds itself around, that neither storm nor whirlwind can tear it away ! So in first and early love, the offspring of youthful intimacy, heart unconsciously clingeth to heart, tendril knitteth to tendril, until time nor change nor chance, nor the keenest adversity, hath power to part them. Truly hath it been said that such love is the romance of the most romantic and happiest period of life. "Early loves, like the first run of the uncrushed grape, are the sweetest and strongest gushings of the heart."

'Tis true, that as the strength of manhood began to dignify the soul and manners of George, and as Agnes came blushing to the verge of womanhood, both had, at times, felt strangely. This was so, either when present or absent. George, as was natural, was the first to suspect that all was not the bare and simple friendship of youthful minds : he felt that there was a deeper, holier feeling, and his manners towards his early playmate had of late begun to change. Whilst there was, at times, more of tenderness, there was also a singular embarrassment in her presence. Ever and anon

"his blood would ebb and flow,

And his cheek change tempestuously, his heart
Scarce knowing of its cause of agony."

But he had begun to feel that all happiness, to him, was lost, unless she was the companion of his life ; and in the analysis of this feeling, he found what men call Love. She, more simple, whilst she felt as deeply as he did, and was conscious that her being was wrapt up in his, had not yet dared to look so deeply into the unfathomable depths of the heart. She knew that a thrill went through her when they met ; but here, woman-like, she faltered,—she dared not the analysis ; she was content with that vague feeling ; or rather, she trusted not herself to ascertain its elements.

After an interval of uninterrupted quiet, the peace of the settlement was disturbed by the incursions of Indians. After destroying a number of cattle, and firing several dwellings and barns, the depredators had quietly decamped. The inhabitants, who but a little while before were congratulating themselves on the thought that they were entirely rid of the foe, were aroused by this fresh and unlooked-for inroad, and they determined to revenge the attack in such a signal manner as to prevent the possibility of its recurrence ; in short, they resolved to scour the whole country, and if possible destroy every Indian. Every man that could draw trigger was called out to carry on this war of extermination,—the triumph was to be complete—the last drop of the blood of the already dwindling race of red men was to be poured out.

For a week the country around had been searched ; several skirmishes had taken place ; the Indians were every where routed, and many an old and sly veteran and several chiefs fell before the hate of their insatiable foes.

Whilst these things were going on, there was one of this hunted people who suspected that extermination was the watchword. But the soul of Vantappa did not quake with fear ! Secure in his chosen retreat, he saw that the storm had been stirred up, and that it could not be allayed until his race was swept away in the fury of the blast. Life was no longer desirable, and he resolved to die ; and again and again did he chant subduedly the death-song in the deep cave, where, like a beast, he had made his lair. He had resolved to die, but he had determined that his last should be a signal blow, a deed of terror and consternation—an evidence that, long lingering in the memory of the pale-faced ones, should tell of the vengeance of the untamed, un pitying, but wronged and persecuted sons of the forest. This one act consummated, and he would meet his foes, and die like his fathers, scorning their tortures, and glorying in beholding the effects of his revenge, and at the same time presenting an heroic instance of the strength and grandeur of Indian character under violent suffering.

He had often caught a glimpse of Agnes, and he had often felt a little jealous that his enemies should boast a beauty more captivating than the girls of his tribe—he saw that she was the pride of the settlers,—in very truth, the White Fawn of the Valley !

Like lightning he darted from his cave ; his hatchet gleamed in the moonbeams, and his terrifying yell pealed, now in protracted and now in deep and broken gutturals, along the sides of the enclosing hills. A moment or two, and all was again hushed ; the inveterate foe was on the trail for blood. His step was silent, but swift as the hound's. On, on he went, o'er hill and dale, through tangled brake and sedgy marsh ; nor did a muscle flag until he stood before the enclosure of Weldon. A moment's reconnoitre, and he knew that the men were away. No guard to female helplessness ; no, not even the faithful watch-dog to bay an alarm, or to tell of danger ; no gleam of light, to tell that the bolt was falling. The flash and the stroke were simultaneous ; the startling whoop and the crash of the yielding door told them that the un pitying savage was before them. He had pounced upon them so instantaneously, that presence of mind was lost, flight or hiding unthought of. The moment of their first startling, and the wild glare of a fiendish eye was upon them, and the coarse, smothered laugh of the malicious intruder terrified them into unresisting astonishment. One shriek was all. Each heart ceased its pulsing, the blood in every vein curdled, and each face grew ashy with fear. The Indian, for a moment, drew up his stalwart form, and grinned with the smile of a demon, rioting upon the sufferings he himself had created—the sufferings of unprotected females and children ; and then there was a fiendish laugh, and the loud cry, Koiveekah! Koiveekah! the White Fawn! the White Fawn! and, darting upon Agnes, he bore off the fainting girl in his arms.

Mrs. Weldon and her children, for some moments after, could not speak. They gazed upon each other utterly confounded, scarcely knowing whether the occurrence was a horrid dream or a dreadful fact; but a moment more, and the awful conviction that it was too true burst upon them. She rushed from the door, and filled the air with loud wailings and ineffectual cries for her idolized, her only daughter, and, at last, overpowered by the intensity of her feelings, sank insensible on the ground.

The foe heard not, or hearing, heeded not her wailings. Hurrying his victim on, sometimes dragging her, and then, to hasten his flight, throwing her upon his shoulder, he kept on until he reached his retreat, where he threw his burden upon the damp floor of his cave.

The moon threw her soft light in narrow streaks through a few chinks in the ceiling; they fell upon the countenance of the pale sufferer. She gave no signs of life, but she lay in the same position he had thrown her; her lips parted, her eyelids half closed, and the fair, beautiful face, which but an hour before was blooming with health, and lighted up with the merry smile, was soiled with dirt and blood. The imp, squatting by her side, sat silently, gazing at the indistinct form which lay before him, gloating with malicious joy over the agonies of weakness and innocence, and revolving in his mind how he should next proceed to torture his victim, and most signalize his revenge, in the view of her friends, his implacable foes. He scarcely knew whether she was living or dead. The coolness and dampness of the cavern, however, after some time recalled ebbing life to the beautiful sufferer. She slowly opened her eyes—she saw the dark figure at her side, but scarcely knew her situation until the glaring eyes and the gruff Indian grunt restored consciousness.

When the morning dawned, she was sufficiently recovered to know too truly the horrors of her situation. As may be supposed, as soon as the intelligence of her abduction could be made known to the men who were abroad, their every energy was aroused to pursue the depredator. Two or three hours by sun, and the pursuit commenced.

When reason and consciousness had, with the light of day, returned to Agnes, she looked around her. The monster was sitting in a remote corner of the cave. He did not notice her gaze; his chin was resting upon his hands, his eyes were fixed upon the ground, and deep and bitter thought seemed to chain him in portentous silence. It was the quiet of the soul, such as holds possession of it, while resolving on desperate and malicious projects—the calm which often precedes the angry surging of the human passions. She made a movement as if to rise; he started wildly from his reverie, and threw a glance at her which would have made a stouter heart quail; but his look relaxed its sternness, and approaching her, said, “does the White Fawn hope for pity! Once Vantappa knew what it was to pity; once, Vantappa was kind to all, and grew fierce only when his tribe went to battle; but the white man has torn all softness from his heart, and now he cannot pity even the White Fawn! Once, Vantappa would have slain his own men, had they raised the hatchet against a woman; but now he relents not, for the white man has made him a rock. Vantappa once had children; they sported at his side; his boys went with him to the chase and his girls welcomed his return; they spread his skins for him when he lay down at night, and prepared his corn for him when he arose—joy was about his steps and gladness sounded in his wigwam. But the white man came—he came, and took them all; yes, he took them all, and now Vantappa stands alone! The tree has lost its branches; it is old and withered! No, there is not one branch!” Here he paused, while the memory of other days seemed to bring sadness with its vision, and then he proceeded in tones of increased bitterness—“Yes, Vantappa stands alone—there is not a drop of his blood in the veins of any living being—alone—alone!” Here again he paused, and threw a glance at Agnes, which seemed to mean unutterable things of bitterness, regret, revenge; and then continued: “Yes, Vantappa too had a daughter, the last of his children, and beautiful as the White Fawn, but your men took her too. Twice twelve moons have gone since she dropped at my feet under the bullet of the white man’s rifle, and twice twelve times has the spirit of Vena returned to say, that Vantappa must spill the blood of the white man’s daughter. Yes, yes;” and he rose up, clenching his hatchet, “aye, and the blood of the White Fawn shall this day smoke upon the grave of Vena. Let not the soul of Vantappa shrink, let not his heart pity or his arm tremble, the blood of the White Fawn shall smoke upon the grave of Vena.”

The hour had come; his captive saw that all shadow of mercy was gone, and yielded to her fate—the agony of death however was past; for, overcome by the terrific aspect of her savage murderer, she again became unconscious. He seized her rudely by the arm, and dragging her from the cave, and hurrying with rapid strides up the rising knoll almost within sight of his dwelling, he stood by the grave of his child. His right hand held his knife, whilst with his left, twisted in the tangled hair of Agnes, he raised her head, and gazed for some seconds upon the pale face of what already seemed a corpse.

At that moment he thought he heard a distant noise, and pausing, stood with listening ear as if to know whether his surmise were true—that the foe was upon his trail. He either heard it not, or else it seemed too distant to move his fears. There he stood upon that hill—a priest about to offer human blood to the manes of the departed. There he stood for a moment to listen; and then, “hah! hah! the spirit of Vantappa does not fear; the White Fawn dies; let the spirit of Vena laugh, for the White Fawn dies; let her scalp swing long in the wind, let her body lie long unburied, let the white man know that Vantappa did not pity, that his hate was as deep as his love!” and as he spoke, he prepared to verify his purpose; but the cracking of a rifle arrested it—Vantappa gave a convulsive spring, tottered, and fell.

A youth sprang forward and caught up the senseless form of Agnes; he seemed horror-stricken, for her hand was cold, and the hue of death was on her brow and cheek. He put his cheek to hers, to see if it had the icyness, as well as the ghastliness of death. A glance of light shot over his face as if there might be hope. He raised her in his arms and bore her off to a little stream at the foot of the hill, and there bathed her forehead and hands.

Two or three men had by this time come up to the Indian. He was not dead, though his wound was mortal. His face had the same look of scorn, his eye the same defiance in it, even though death was drawing its film over it; and as he gnashed his teeth and spit in rage, they seemed to shoot the same darting fire as when he mingled in the death-fray; proving his unrelenting hate, and showing in his expiring moments that Vantappa did not relent, and could not quail, under the tortures of his enemies. The blood that was fast flowing, was his life's blood, and the wild vacancy that came over his countenance showed that the spirit was almost freed; a few moments more, and his whole frame shuddered with a spasmodic tremor; the soul took its flight. Thus died Vantappa, if not the last, one of the noblest of his tribe; cruel it is true, but driven to cruelty and desperation by the unrighteous dealings of a civilized and christianized! people.

The reader need hardly be told that the foremost man in that chase, for the stolen girl, was George Benton; that it was his rifle, whose aim had laid low the Indian chieftain; and that he it was who now bent over her death-like features, bathing her temples with the cool waters of that mountain rill, and by his tender and touching calls sought to win back the almost vanished spirit of her whom he most adored. That vanished spirit was won back, and as sense returned, and her mild blue eye slowly opened, how different was the vision which now floated before it to that which a little while before had terrified her palpitating heart. It was too changed to be believed, too like a holy dream!

Could it be that her eyes had closed under the withering glare of the savage, to open under the anxious, tender look of him whom she most loved on earth! It was indeed true; but too much to be believed. Her lips moved as if to breathe his name—it was enough! the lover heard it, though there was no sound of words. It told that life was there; nay, more, it told of consciousness, of reason, of an unwandering mind. “Agnes!” and his lips met the lips of the reviving girl!

The party had now all gathered. It presented a group of merry, gladdened faces, and the woods rang with the irrepressible shout of joy. A rough litter was soon constructed of saplings, covered with the hunting shirts of the men; and upon this Agnes was laid, and the homeward line of march was taken up; the swiftest-footed having been considerably sent as an express to inform Mrs. Weldon of the safety of her child. That night was a night of joy. The grateful father insisted on the company's remaining with him until a late hour, in order to partake of the most generous table he could spread. The young marksman was of course the hero of the company, “the toast universal,” and many a slap on the shoulder did he receive as they happened to move round and give their simple congratulations:—“I say George, that was a noble shot; younker you made the red skin bite dirt, just about the right way.” “George you did that particularly fine, but you didn't do it a minute too soon,” whilst one with rather a quizzing look whispered in his ear, “I reckon now you'll hardly know which to call your sweetheart now, that illegant rifle of yours, or Miss Agnes;” and another, who might justly be considered as “le long carabine” of the settlement, whispered knowingly, “I hope you aint forgetting, George, who took you out to hunt, and larned you to pull trigger when you wer'nt much higher than his knee; Dick Purnell knew you had some of the real grit in you.”

George retorted kindly their witticisms, though he would rather have been sitting near the side of one, who, on this day, had been rendered dearer to him than ever, and in whose recovery he felt the most intense interest. The party separated in high spirits. Agnes recovered slowly from the shock she had received; she was confined to her room by a severe indisposition for several weeks, but was again restored to her usual health, her beauty unimpaired by the harsh treatment of her captor, and as may well be supposed none the less interesting on account of her danger and her rescue. Three months after the memorable event, the same company, with other friends, again assembled at the house of Mr. Weldon; it was to celebrate the nuptials of his daughter. George Benton, that evening, married the White Fawn of Fenloe Vale.

THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.*

Another poem from the prolific pen of Brooks. One too, the subject of which, together with the style, will recommend it to the perusal of those who prefer a healthy literature to the morbid mawkishness which distinguishes two-thirds of the poetry (falsely so called) of the present day.

Mr. Brooks has labored, for some years, to create a better order of things in the literary world, but whether his success has been commensurate with his efforts, we are doubtful. "Men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil;" hence he who labors to effect a moral reformation among mankind, must expect to meet with that opposition which the animosity of the carnal mind will ever throw in his way.

With a fine classical style, Mr. Brooks blends that hallowed spirit of piety, which, imparting its holy influences to the mind of the reader, bids him look up from the groveling pursuits of the earth-bound soul, to a contemplation of the excellencies of its God.

His "South Sea Islander," a prize poem, published some few years since in the "Southern Churchman." His "Address" delivered before the Philomathean Society, on the Importance of Classical Studies, and "The History of the Church" now before us—all of these, apart from their intrinsic excellence as literary compositions (and we venture the assertion, that his Address before the Philomathean Society has never been surpassed, either in splendor of composition, or erudite knowledge of mythological arrangement or of biblical harmony) breathe that pure and wholesome spirit that speaks the hallowed mind of the Christian.

Our limits will preclude anything more than a passing notice—but we are unwilling that merit of so high an order as that of N. C. Brooks', should remain unnoticed in our journal. Mr. Brooks has won enviable popularity in time past, as a contributor to the most polished and popular Magazines of the country; but with a spirit we admire, he seems to turn from the wreaths that fame has twined for his brow, and with the ambition of a Heaven-aspiring immortal, is seeking to pluck fruit

"From life's fair tree fast by the throne of God."

The following is the argument of the poem:

"The World after Creation—Paradise—Worship in Eden, consisting of prayer, praise, and observance of the Sabbath—Fall—Its physical and moral effects—Sacrifice, a shadow of Christ's Atonement—Adam constituted priest—the Cherubim set up at the gate of Eden, with the Seraphim resting between them, a type of the Jewish tabernacle, and subsequently of the temple—Cain and Abel, figures of the Mosaic and Christian dispensations—Contest for the priesthood—Corruption of morals—Noah, a type of John, and the flood a type of his baptism—the sons of Noah, figures of the Adamic, Mosaic, and Christian dispensations—Babel and the dispersion, an antithetic type of the gift of tongues—Idolatry—Call of Abraham—his sons, figures of law and gospel—Sacrifice of Isaac on Moriah, an allegorical representation of God the Father offering up the Son on the same mount—Jacob and Esau, figures of the two covenants—Joseph and his brethren—Bondage in Egypt, allegorical of the slavery of the Law—Moses in character and history, a type of Christ—Plagues of Egypt—Passover—Exodus—Passage of the Red Sea, illustrative of Baptism—Descent at Sinai—Law and Ceremonies, typical and figurative—Tabernacle, set up—Wanderings in the desert of Sinai—Joshua—Conquest and possession of Canaan, allegorical—Prophets—Temple reared—Fall of Temple and the Captivity, prefiguring the overthrow of the Jewish religion—Idolatry—Corruption of the Jewish worship—Advent, life, passion, and resurrection of the Saviour; Christian rites commemorative—Gift of tongues—Spread of the Gospel—Fall of Jerusalem—Martyrdom—Constantine—Corruption of Christianity—Rise of Mohammedanism—Spread of Science and Religion—Fall of Superstition—Triumph of the Church—Millennium—The end of the world."

With a few extracts made at random, we close our notice of the production, trusting that its perusal may do the reader much good, create a corresponding spirit with that of the author, and that Mr. Brooks may be long spared to the literary world; and that his efforts towards the promotion of a healthy literature, may be crowned with great success.

The Poem opens with a description of sinless Eden.

"When first upon the gate of youthful time
Creation rose in all its virgin prime,
When every element, with beauty rife,
With health was teeming and instinct with life;
While every air was balm, and gale perfume,
With skies all brightness, and the earth all bloom,
In Eden's flowery arlors, God displayed
All beauties of the sunlight and the shade;
As if to blend all charms his hand on earth had made.

"There, vine-clad vale and incense-bearing moor,
And bowers Elysian shed their fragrance round;
Lawns bask in light,—in gloom uprise the woods,
And mossy grottoes echo crystal floods
That murmur over sands of gold, and run
Now brown with shades, now glittering in the sun:
Ambrosial trees their buds and fruits unfold
In silver flowers and vegetable gold,
Perennial plants their pulpy treasures spread,
Like rubies gleaming 'mid the leaves o'er head,
And odorous shrubs shed down their balmy tears,
Where'er the listening grove the sighing night-wind hears."

"Amid these haunts disport the bestial train
Beneath the trees, or on the bright champagne,
Birds warble 'mid the foliage, and illumine
The dark green shades with purple tuft and plume;
While spangled insects their light wings display,
And glance and glitter in the noontide ray.
And Lord of all,—the image of his God,
With brow erect, man, these fair regions trod—
In power and happiness supremely blest—
Angels his ministers, and God his guest;
And prayer and praise like breath of incense rose
At morning's call and dewy evening's close;
And transports hallowed each returning sun,
Of that blest day which saw Creation's work was done."

"Thus naked innocence and guiltless love
Were the pure tenants of the hallowed grove,
Earth's carpet trod by day embossed with flowers,
Or pressed the star-lit couch of roseate bowers;
While white wings waved above them as they slept,
And cherub sentinels their vigils kept.

"Here, might have glided on their blissful lot,
Where God's own hand had garnished every spot;
And here, they might have soul and sense refined
For nearer converse with th' Eternal Mind;
And, all the pains of age and death unknown,
Translated from their earthly spheres, have shone
Bright stars of glory 'round Jehovah's burning throne,
But soon the Tempter came, and brooding doom
Now cast its shadowy pall o'er Eden's bloom;

* A Poem, by N C Brooks, A. M.—Read before the Diognothian Society of Marshall College—on the Anniversary, July 5, 1841. Published by the Society. Baltimore: Woods and Crane—1841.

The earth received sin's wound with sudden groan,
And conscious Nature shuddered on her throne;
Astonish'd seraphs shrunk aghast with fears,
Their faces veiled, and shed immortal tears."

His description of Moses' pleading before Pharaoh to let Israel go, is thrilling—we quote it entire.

"The monarch sat upon his throne
Of gold and flashing gem;
And fierce his eye of terror shone
Beneath his diadem;
And hosts stood by, in deeds of death
To do the bidding of his breath.

"Each soldier seized his ataghan,
As through the marbled hall
And palace, of an aged man
Sounded the loud footfall,
With solemn brow, and beard of snow
Upon his bosom sweeping low.

"Like waves before a gallant prow,
Before the man of God,
Parted that host with pallid brow,
As with uplifted rod,
He stood erect—with unbowed knee—
'Fear God, oh king! set Israel free.'

"Then every stream and river-flood
That hurried by its shore,
Rolled on, in heaving waves of blood,
The purple tide of gore;
And fount and standing pool were red,
The sepulchre of putrid dead.

"In rain and hail, while lightnings blazed,
The tempest stooped from heaven;
Then upward as his staff he raised,
The storm was backward driven;
Stern was the monarch as before,
Then burst the clouds with deafening roar.

"O'er earth, with desolating sway,
The wild tornado went;
While palaces in ruins lay—
With dome and battlement;
And navies from the storm-tossed tide,
Lay stranded by the river side.

"Still onward swept the maddening gale—
O'er vale and mountain's crown;
And still the rain and driving hail
Poared their artillery down;
And fruit and trees and prostrate grain,
Like slaughtered heroes, strewed the plain.

"Yet harder waxed the monarch's heart
Against the King of kings;
Then through the land in every part
Was heard the hum of wings—
The locust swarm were gathered there,
Darkening the earth and summer air.

"On every shrub and flow'ret seize,
The ministers of wrath;
And fruit and leaf that gem the trees,
Vanish before their path,
Till not a stalk or blade of green
Through all the wasted land is seen.

"Up to the sky was raised that rod
Which called its judgments down—
Heaven shuddered at an angry God,
And blackened at his frown;

And darkness o'er the regions fell,
Rayless, and thick, and palpable.

"The earth and sky, that awful dun
Enwrapped in funeral fold,
Spread sackcloth o'er the radiant sun,
And moonbeams' paly gold;
And veiled from the affrighted sight
The many twinkling eyes of night.

"The plagues of God o'er every flood
Had passed, and every shore;
And every valley, mount and wood,
Their awful record bore:
But sign and judgment were in vain—
Still Israel wore the bondman's chain.

"Then burst on man's devoted head
The vengeance of his ire;
And o'er the bier of first-born dead,
Bent each Egyptian sire;
And on the solemn midnight gale
Was borne the mother's plaintive wail.

"Through all the land the corpses lie,
In palace and in cell;
And groans rose like the night-wind's sigh,
The tears like night-dews fell;
And Pharaoh groaned, in agony,
'Let Israel go! The captive free.'"

The passage of the Red Sea by the Children of Israel, and their pursuit by Pharaoh and his hosts, are also given as a specimen of the author's powers of description.

"'Tis midnight. With girt loins and sandalled feet,
The unleavened bread and Paschal lamb they eat,
Of sin's deliverance an illustrious sign,
In after ages, by the Lamb divine;
And while the angel missioned by the Lord,
Through all the borders bore the fiery sword,
And smote the first-born of Egypt's host,
He spared the lintel and the blood-besprinkled post.

"Night rent her veil o'er Egypt, and the dawn,
With rosy cheek and kindling blush, came on;
The sun in splendor up the orient rolled,
And lit each cloud with crimson and with gold;
First on the pyramids, the sunbeams played,
Then burst on obelisk, dome, and colonnade
And plain, till Egypt and the dusky Nile
Were blushing 'neath his bright, benignant smile.

"Oh fairest that e'er dawned amid their foes
That sun of Freedom to the bondmen rose;
Hark! pouring forth from city, vale and wood,
The mingled murmurs of the multitude!
Lo! bright-eyed youth, and dim-eyed age is there—
Men, maids, and mothers with their infant care—
With girded loins and sandalled feet, to go
Far from th' oppressor's scourge, and bondman's woe;
And far and wide, the immeasurable train
Of men and herds sweeps o'er the darkened plain,
Onward, still onward, as the man of God
Sways o'er the hosts his consecrated rod;
Till resting far 'twixt Migdol and the shore,
Their weary van the cloudy pillar hovers o'er.

"The sun is sinking in the purple west;
Upon the strand the weary travellers rest,
Lulled by the music of the waters' swell,
And dreamy tinkling of the camel's bell;
When far upon the horizon's distant verge,
In sandy billows heaves the desert surge;
And richer than the golden sunset's dye,

Broad banners float along the evening sky ;
And flash the bossy buckler, and the lance,
Where the firm ranks of Pharaoh's foot advance ;
And on each wing the fiery gleam succeeds
Of belmed chivalry on champing steeds ;
While as their broad scythes glisten, comes the roar
Of brazen chariots thundering to the shore.

"Where now their aid ? Before them rolls the flood ;
Behind are circling hosts that thirst for blood ;
But lo ! as hope and prayer seem all in vain,
The cloudy pillar moves across the main ;
Before their leader's wand, e'en like a scroll,
On either side the parted waters roll ;
And to the eye the secret caves disclose,
Where jewels glisten, and where coral grows ;
And Israel's hosts on ocean's pavement tread
With faltering steps, while surges topple o'er their head.

"The cloudy pillar, reddening into light,
Blazed in their van through that eventful night,
As on they pressed till midway o'er the flood,
Betwixt the hosts that fearful portent stood—
O'er Israel's pathway cast a rosy smile,
And clouds and darkness o'er their foes, the while.
That gloom was rayless, till a sudden light
From that dread image, burst upon their sight ;
And with the lurid lightning-fires of heaven
Their brazen chariots were asunder riven ;
Then as the fear-struck myriads sought the shore,
The fearful wand was stretched the waters o'er ;
Again with maddening sweep the waters close
Above the heads of Israel's vengeful foes—
Peals one heaven-rending wail—the ocean wave
Rolls its broad surge above a nation's grave ;
And sounding timbrel, and uplifted voice,
Bid freedom's anthem swell, till sea and plain rejoice."

Again, in describing the advent of our blessed Redeemer, hear him :

"Idolatry had spread, and reared a fane
On every mountain, and in every plain ;
In Mithra's honor rolled the incense cloud,
To every star in heaven the knee was bowed ;
And grovelling tribes, with souls degraded, prayed
To beasts, and birds, and idols which they made ;
And horrid sacrifice smoked in the sun,
Where human blood was poured the altars on.
In Greece where Genius had upreared her shrine ;
And Science shed o'er all things grace divine ;
Though Jove shook heaven, where the red bolt was hurled—
Neptune the sea—and Phoebus lit the world ;
Although a naiad held each silver flood ;
A faun, each field ; a dryad, every wood ;
Among her myriad gods, the God alone
Who formed earth, sea, and heaven, was all unknown.
E'en where the Omnipotent had set his name,
And dwelt between the cherubim in flame ;
Where once his truth had been displayed abroad,
Tradition had displaced the word of God ;
Until in all the ceremonial train,
The rites were idle, and the worship vain.

"Amid the gloom of earth-enshrouding night,
Behold the burst of the long-promised light !
As o'er Judea's hills the shepherds keep
Their guardian watch above the slumbering sheep,
Celestial splendors, from the throne divine,
Flood the blue vault, and o'er the green vales shine ;
The heavenly host their starry plumes unfold,
And from rich voices, and from harps of gold
Heaven's tidings come, which Earth repeats again,

'Glory to God ! peace and good will to men !'
And as each starry orb grows pale and dim,
Which brightened, as pealed out that angel hymn,
O'er Bethlehem's manger shines salvation's star,
While kings and princes follow from afar,
Shower at his royal feet their garnered store
Of gold and incense, and the infant God adore.

"In Bethlehem's babe, the promised one behold,
By typic shades, and holy seers foretold !
Loved of the Father, full of truth and grace,
With Godhead's rays divergent from his face,
He comes, the second Adam, to unbind
The yoke, the First imposed upon mankind ;
And by a perfect righteousness restore
The ruined law, in Eden broke before.
Saw ye, where foiled, the serpent Tempter spread
His ebon wings upon the air, and fled,
When Jesus broke the subtle toils of hell,
Spread for that sin by which earth's Father fell ?"

The sufferings and the resurrection and death of the Son of God, are thus described :

"Heard ye the plaintive prayer—the melting tones—
The rending sighs—the agonizing groans—
As in Gethsemane, the Saviour bore
The sin of Eden in each bleeding pore ?
While every limb was bathed in bloody sweat,
And o'er him fell the dewy tears of Olivet.
See, in 'mid air the bleeding victim hangs
While nail and spear waken their quivering pangs,
With men around unpitying and unawed,
While shuddering Nature owns her dying God :
Veiled is the sun, the solid mountains quake,
The tombs are riven, the sheeted dead awake,
The temple's veil is rent, as in the sacrifice
The all-atoning God and Saviour dies.

"Now resting in mid Heaven the harvest moon
Pours on Judea's hills night's silver noon ;
And golden sheaves shall in to-morrow's sun,
Wave as the first-fruits of the harvest done ;
But ere these votive offerings are paid,
From out the tomb in which the Saviour laid,
Where heavenly light from angel plumes is shed,
Behold the first-fruits of the risen dead !
Messiah lives—who lived ere time began—
The resurrection and the life of man.
Bursting the cerements of death, he rose
In majesty triumphant o'er his foes,
Despoiled Hell's powers—dispelled the clouds of fear
That wrapped the grave, and broke Death's iron spear ;
And, in the glories of his rising hour,
An earnest gave of that eternal power
Which shall re-animate all human mould,
When Heaven's great bell has o'er creation tolled ;
And from their sleep in dust, the earth shall pour
Her thousands ; and the sea, her dead restore.

"The risen God breathed on his followers round,
To bear his name to earth's remotest bound,
Then parted from them, to his throne he sped
Until he come to judge the quick and dead ;
And Heaven's eternal gates of massive gold
The King of Glory in their valves infold."

The spread of the Gospel, and triumph of the Church of Christ ; albeit the Crescent for a time alone above the Cross, is thus beautifully introduced :

"When in the Church was quenched the lamp of light,
Medina's prophet shed disastrous night ;
From all her wastes the fiery desert poured
The hosts that bore the Koran and the sword.

The crescent rose where waved the scimeter,
And sunk the cross amid the storm of war ;
And where the tapering Christian spire was set,
Gleams pale and cold the Moslem minaret,
And where the pealing bell once shook the walls,
The Muezzin now ' Allah il Allah ! ' calls.

" The sword no more extends the Koran's reign !
The Turkish moon is hastening to its wane ;
And soon shall minaret and swelling dome,
Fall like the fanes of Egypt, Greece, and Rome.
No more with harp and sistrum music calls
To wanton rites within Astarte's halls ;
Serapis now is gone—Anubis fled—
And Neitha's unraised veil shrouds Isis' prostrate head.

" No more the Augur stands in snowy shroud,
To watch each flitting wing and rolling cloud ;
Nor Superstition in dim twilight weaves
Her wizard song among Dodona's leaves ;
Phœbus is dumb ; and votaries crowd no more
The Delphian mountain, and the Delian shore ;
And lone and still the Lybian Ammon stands,
His utterance stifled by the desert sands ;
And shattered shrine and altar lie o'erthrown,
Inscriptionless, save where Oblivion lone
Has dimly traced his name upon the mouldering stone.

" O'er other lands has dawned immortal day,
And Superstition's clouds have rolled away ;
O'er Gallia's mounts, and on Iona's shore,
The Runic altars roll their smoke no more ;
Fled is the Druid from the ancient oak—
His harp is mute—his magic circle broke ;
And Desolation mopes in Odin's cells,
Where spirit-voices called to join the feast of shells.

" O'er Indian plains and ocean-girdled isles,
With brow of beauty, Truth serenely smiles,
The nations bow as light is shed abroad,
And break their idols for the living God ;
Quenched are the pyres as shines salvation's star,
Grim Juggernaut is trembling on his car,
And cries less frequent come from Ganges' waves,
As infant forms sink in untimely graves.
Where heathen bondmen kneel by the cocoa-tree,
And supplicate the Christians' Deity ;
And chant in living aisles, the vesper hymn,
Where giant god-trees rear their temples dim.

" Still speed thy truth ! still wave thy spirit sword !
Till every land acknowledge thee, the Lord ;
And the broad banner of the cross, unfurled,
In triumph wave above a subject world,
And here, Oh God ! where feuds thy church divide—
The Sectary's rancor, and the bigot's pride—
Melt every heart—till all our breasts enshrine
One faith, one hope, one love, one ~~and~~ divine ;
And with one voice, adoring nations call Upon the Father and the God of all."

The last great drama, the winding up of the vast machinery of time, the dissolution of our Globe—" Our God in grandeur and our world on fire,"—are thus thrillingly brought in, and appropriately close the work.

" Lo ! now descending, where the heavens are bowed ;
A mighty angel, girdled with a cloud !
A rainbow gleams, his circled brows upon,
His feet are flame—his face a fiery sun ;
And as the seven-fold thunders cease to roll,
With threatening hand, he lifts to heaven his scroll,
His footsteps planted on the sea and shore,
And swears with awful voice, that time is now no more.

" Through nature peals the sound. Stunned by the blow,
The dizzy Earth is staggering to and fro ;
The ocean heaves—eternal mountains rock,
And shuddering isle and valley feel the shock ;
From riven Earth and from the ocean caves,
The shrouded dead are startled from their graves,
And shrink as o'er their heads, with threatening glare,
The sphere-flung stars rush blazing through the air ;
The rocks are melting—withered is the flood,
The sun is sackcloth and the moon is blood ;
Earth fails apace, and like a shrivelling scroll,
The scorched and blackened heavens, together roll.

" Lo ! 'mid this darkness of chaotic night,
The sudden burst of Heaven's all-glorious light !
Hark 'mid the din throughout creation's bounds,
The sudden burst of Heaven's melodious sounds !
Behold ! where trump and wreathed horn are blown,
The winged seraphs bear the great white throne ;
And where the eternal gonfalon unrolled,
Sheds golden lustre from each waving fold,
The guardian cherubim, in glittering line,
With fiery swords and blazing helmets shine ;
And far and wide the myriad angel train
Wave their white plumes o'er the celestial plain.

" The Judge is seated. Hill and mountain flew
Before the presence of the Deity ;
Uphorne by winged winds, in robes of snow,
The saints appear, who formed the church below,
To serve him in that temple, where no night
Obscures the day, but God himself is light ;
Where ruby pave, and walls of sapphire, burn,
And gates of pearl on golden hinges turn ;
Adoring hosts in concord sweep the string
Of heavenly harps, and alleluias sing ;
Then soar above, while Earth's last flames are curled,

We have not attempted to write a critical review of the work, but merely to call attention to the style and spirit of the performance. Perhaps the critic may find here and there a few errors, such as a syllable or two more in one line than in its corresponding one—but these are the errors of a mind, it can be perceived, so intent upon the loftiness of its theme, as to lose sight for a moment of metrical harmony. Our space forbids us saying anything more on the subject.

SPARKS THAT MAY KINDLE.

THE SCHOLAR'S INHERITANCE.

Not gold and gems ;—not meadows and pastures,
fat flocks and waving grain ;—not deeds, bonds, mortgages, and stocks—such things seldom fall to the scholar's lot. If he have a thatched cottage, a shady elm, a musical brook, a maple dish with his books and a clear mind, he may well be content, and deem himself rich withal. Often is he poorer than this ; but weighs not a scanty wardrobe and the uncertain meal, in comparison with sure knowledge.
Yet is the scholar heir to a worthier inheritance, measured out by no metes and bounds, weighed in no earthly balances, and of a value assignable by no ordinary calculus. It embraces every pebble, every spire of grass, every flashing wave, the depths of the sea, the caverns of the earth. It compasses the circuit of the stars, and he weighs and measures them as his rightful possessions. Wherever aught may be known, there is his realm. Every thought, feeling, act of man, in the long reach of his history, past and to come, is his. The spirits of earth and air are his; the soul of the flower, and the demon of the mine, the invisible agencies of the wind, and the melodies of the spheres. With reverent awe he passes into the society of celestial hierarchies, not as a stranger, but as one of them. Lowly and humble in his temper, the shining laws and orders of the universe are his, as he is duly subject to them. The unseen messengers that pass to and fro between heaven and earth visit him too, in his meekness and integrity.

To this inheritance he is always welcome. In the regions of thought no one will hinder his entrance. There, are no barring clauses, no writs of ejectment. Nature receives her child heartily, and with good cheer. The heart of the world is open to him who carries a true heart within him. Science throws open all her stores to him who would enjoy them; his own rudeness only, and want of skill detain him from the complete fruition.

This inheritance is everlasting. His title to it lies in no bond nor lease, but deep in his own immortal being. No earthly law can divest it, no ordinance of princes abate its worth, nothing but his own recreancy and baseness. He who made the eye for light, made also the soul for truth; and the sight of the soul which fails not through age, is evidence that the perception shall hereafter grow clearer forever.

THE STEAMER.*

A FISH STORY.

BY PARK BENJAMIN.

What said the mighty monsters of the deep—
When whizzing, puffing, spluttering it came,
And woke up all the whales that were asleep,
And other fishes, we won't stop to name?
"What said they!" Faith! they couldn't speak for wonder,
But held a silent meeting, like the quakers;
And some concluded that it must be thunder
That turned the waves from tumblers into shakers.

The biggest spouters were dumb-founded quite,
As orators are apt upon emergency;
And on their shallow brains there beamed no light—
How t' account for such a strange divergency
From the calm, quiet, usual course of packets;
Which make a monthly voyage from shore to shore,
And never kick up such prodigious rackets,
Or fight the billows with so loud a roar.

* Written after the first arrival at New-York of "The Great Western."

Before a fish had risen to remark—

One speaker in this Congress of huge whales;
There came an Amos Kendall of a shark—
An awful fellow to despatch the males—
And he suggested, in his flippant manner,
That they should turn the STEAMER into sport,
And if they couldn't strike Old England's banner,
"Deny the jurisdiction of the court."

"Oho!" bawled out some six-and-thirty spouters—
"A steamer, is it? such as go on rivers;"—
"Then we are done for!" groaned three dozen shouters;
And their broad tails betrayed their mental shivers!
"If steamers thus can make a transit over
From Bristol to New-York, with speed terrific
As they now go from Calais unto Dover,
They soon will splash into the wide Pacific!"

And we shall be harpooned; and oil will flow
In streams from Carolina even to Japan;
And white men's faces will shine out, you know,
Like the black favorites of A—— T——."
He ceased—the whale that spoke; and then the shark
Rose on his tail to order, and replied—
That, not to keep them longer in the dark,
Or hide a fact that couldn't be denied;

He'd heard one passenger say to another,
That "Captain Hosken had assured the owner
He'd soon cross over in less time and pother
Than the accommodation-whale, that carried Jonah;
And that was three days and three nights,—half week!"
On hearing this the monsters were so frightened,
That each off-darted, like a lightning streak,
And left the billows beautifully brightened!

The shark—he was a wag, likewise sarcastic;
He gave a grin and scudded towards the steamer,
And oped and shut his ponderous jaws so plastic.
In hopes that he should catch some blown-up schemer—
Toppling down headlong, like a Roman hero,
Into the ambush of the greedy spoiler;
But not a toe fell to the ocean Nero,
For the GREAT WESTERN didn't burst her boiler!

THE GRAVE YARD.

"There all are equal, side by side,
The poor man, and the son of pride,
Lie calm and still."

Voices of the night,
How peacefully they rest; the young, the old,
The grave, and gay, here sleep alike in silence.
Time, which destroys all things, has smoothed
The roughness of their sepulchres. The first flowers of spring
Shed their fragrance; the songs of sweet birds resound
Through the groves in notes of sweetest harmony.
Sunshine and storm; the falling leaves of Autumn,
And the moaning of the wintry winds, have held
Their reign successive o'er the sleeper's heads.
The moon has walked her nightly course, and thrown
Her beams, silvering the head-stones of the sleeper's 'round.
The stars peep out and shine and twinkle in their spheres,
Glistening in the dew drop, on the tender grass,
Like tears on cheek of beauty. Yet they know not;
Heed not; Dull sleep rests heavy on their eyelids,
And nature's gentle influences are lost
Upon the lifeless clod which once was called a man.
Death has sealed the eye of hope forever; palsied
The strong arm, and shut the active senses
Into deep forgetfulness.

Mark how silent is he
Who once the homage of his fellows claimed.
The sculptured monument may mark his place of rest,
And tell to man, his virtues and his greatness ;
His noble deeds, his riches, and his charity ; but how little
Does it now avail the mortal perishing beneath ;
The dull ear drinks not in the melody of sweetest music ;
And flattery's witching voice no longer charms the soul.
Even the words of the wayfarer, who reads his epitaph,
Falls to the ground unnoticed. The bard who sung
"Earth's highest honors" end in, "here he lies ;"
And "dust to dust" concludes his noblest song ; he had seen
The vanity of earthly things ; and from the follies
Of his fellow men had lessons read of wisdom.

Here also rests the child of poverty. No more
The wants and cares of life disturb his aching heart ;
Sickness, and toil, the icy chains which bound to earth
His strongest aspirations, are now forgotten. Calm
And quiet, in his home he sleeps, as the wearied child
Upon the parent's bosom. No more, the iron of unkindness Enters, directed by a brother's hand, into his soul.
The rags of poverty for robes immortal, are exchanged ;
And through the endless ages of his rest,
The wonders of redeeming love are hymned.

Near him, the new made grave,
With the clods still damp, tells of one, who but yesterday,
Looked abroad, and rejoiced in heart at nature's loveliness.
But the destroyer came ; and while the fond mortal
Years of future bliss anticipated, he felt the chills of death,
And all the schemes which cheered the visions of past hours,
Like tender fruit nipped by unkindly frosts, were spoiled.

Still further on, and almost by the high grass hid,
Which waves o'er his tiny form, is laid an infant,
Like the tender flower which opens its leaves, and soon
Is closed by the rude hand of the careless, so this sweet boy
But looked upon a world of sorrow,
And turning, sought for rest, in realms of endless bliss.

Here, O man, receive instruction. The dead, the dead,
The silent dead, do speak in tones of thrilling eloquence.
And he who listens with attentive heart,
May from these relics of mortality perishing,
Lessons of wisdom learn, which gild the pathway to the tomb ;
Support the trembling footstep on death's troubled waters,
And strengthen the fading vision to behold, undimmed,
The lights, and shadows of eternity.

MEDITATIONS AMONG THE TOMBS.

CONGRESSIONAL BURYING-GROUND.

To T. W. WHITE, ESQ.

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

DEAR SIR,—For the want of something better to do, and in that frame of mind which grows weary with the monotony of the events of every-day life, I sat out, an hour or two since, to make a visit to the principal Burying-Ground of Washington City. Returning to my domicil, I find myself alone, musing while the fire burns, and so far lost in the reflection of what I have read and seen, the hour gone by, that I have thought you and your readers, perhaps, might be interested, as I have been, in a brief remembrance and record of some of the dead whose remains lie entombed in one of the myriad of those dwelling-places, scattered throughout the world, and known as "the houses appointed for all the living." My evening meditations may be of less value to you than the space they will occupy in your Messenger ; and if they are, you can take the liberty of a friend, without offence, and quietly change their resting-place, by mingling them with the dust and ashes, of which all of us, and all around us, the living soul alone excepted, must soon become a part.

Your's truly, E. B.

TO BE BORN, TO BE MARRIED, AND TO DIE ! Thus briefly we write the history of all mankind, from the moment they make their entrance upon the stage of life, to the moment that they make their exit from it, and to be launched forth upon a new and untried being. The majority die in infancy. They spring forth like the buds of the promised flowers in summer, as fair as they are pure, and as lovely in the eyes of a fond parent as they are innocent in the presence of all mankind. The rose is not sweeter, nor the lily purer, than this bright cherub, when just ushered into the world. Behold the newborn infant ! A child is born : but yesterday all was doubt, fear and alarm ; and to-day, in that quick transition from fear to hope, all is joy and gladness. As the blossom of the fruit tree, so beautiful to the eye and so full of promise, unfolds itself, so this flower of the fruit of the tree of life is opening its petals, with the promise, not of a transitory existence, but of a blessed immortality, before it. It breathes the breath of life ; the scales fall from its little eyes,—and gradually, as soon as its weak power of vision can bear the light of heaven, its eyes are opened to all the world around it. The power of limb and muscle is already felt ; and ere the gift of sight is fairly felt and known, you behold the power of speech developed. And then, yes then, when the heart beats high with hope ; when the past and present are forgotten in the future ; and events for the time to come, have been parcelled out like playthings for each successive year, from infancy to childhood, and from childhood to youth, Death steps in, uncalled for ; unwished for ; as dreadful to look upon as it is painful to feel, in the hours of approaching dissolution. Its message is, "Death ;" and its journey "to the grave." The spirit of infancy and purity has already winged its way to the God who gave it, and the tabernacle of flesh, which held the hallowed treasure, lies low beneath the clods of the valley. There is a consolation for those who are left, it is true ; but the heart which clung to its offspring, as the ivy clings to the oak, will not be consoled. The good angel whispers,—"OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN ;" but to look on vacancy, where a moment before, we looked on life, and that life a part of ourselves, "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh," is a picture so dark, and so interwoven with our affections; and so human too, that we see, soaring aloft and around and at all points, only that Destroying Angel, who, if he has not robbed us of all we loved, is nevertheless hovering over us, and, like the relentless grave itself, crying "Give," "Give," "GIVE," for all that remains behind. And yet, with such a translation of the spirit of man from its temporary abiding place on earth, to its immortal home in the skies, what a death would that be, even of infant innocence, to a doting parent, if there were no hope, no heaven,—no "bourne from whence the travellers return."

And what is infancy, but a leaf in the chapter of human existence? Helplessness and dependence give place to strength and vigor. The body grows—the mind expands—and, alas, that it should be so, the unalloyed innocence of an infant mind,—powerless it is true to do wrong,—is changed into "a heart deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." We grow in years to the stature of perfect manhood. The image of the Godhead is stamped upon us, and within that frame of his, is placed every constituent element which makes man, next to the Deity, the master mind of creation. Behold that herculean form,—erect, perfect, gigantic, as it is. In itself,—the mere flesh and blood and bones of his being,—is written legibly to all, that "we are fearfully and wonderfully made." But look within this trunk, which, like the tree, holds but the branches of life, and you see there the true man. Those eyes are but windows of the soul, and the ears which hear only drink in that feast of reason which builds up his monument of immortality. The organ of that voice, which in some men is as the music of the celestial choir, is but a part of the machinery of the power of speech,—and so of every sense we have and use. And yet all these organs, of mind and body, sense and flesh, all that we have and are, perish, wither, and pass away forever. That monument of mind, reared by the Almighty, and by the skill and time and labor of man, "so noble in reason, so infinite in faculty, in action like an angel, and in apprehension like a god," has changed its estate on earth, and passed from a frail tenement of clay to a world of spirits. The nice machinery of being, which made man to the eyes of man, "in form and moving so express and admirable, the beauty of the world and the paragon of animals," has crumbled into the dust of its mother earth,—the grave his body, and the world unknown, his spirit, holds. The epitaph upon every man's tombstone is—Birth, Life, Death! We breathe and live, speak and see, hear and feel; and then we die. Well may it be said "to what base uses we may return."

I looked upon the graves around me, as I left them just now, and what a spectacle did they present! Rank, and perhaps dishonor, youth and age, rich and poor, the exalted in life and the humbled in life, all laid down together, and upon that common ground, which levels all distinctions.—The dust of generations past, lies mingled with the man who but yesterday "shuffled off his mortal coil," and put on immortality. Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Senators, Legislators and Judges were all laid here, and buried in all the pomp and circumstance due to the elevated positions to which they had been raised by patriotism, learning and distinguished public service. What was, has been written by a grateful country, or a devoted friend, upon the cenotaph or tombstone, which tells you that here were, or here are, the remains of one who passed from the council chamber or the battle-field, or from a green old age, to his grave. The inscriptions we read, and the remembrances we have, are all that is told and known of those who are gone. The good men do live after them,—and that divine principle of man—perhaps the only divinity within him—teaches him, while he drops the tear of gratitude over the grave of the sage and the hero, how to appreciate what is really good and great in each and all of the human family. In an humbler sphere, that other grave, simple and unadorned, but beside those of rank and fortune, is visited and remembered by private friends, who can often much better estimate the value of private worth, than a country can, the blessings of public virtue. All here have their common level; as all hereafter, of equal merit, will have their common elevation. Imagination can trace both, from the bosom of their mother earth, to Abraham's bosom, in the world of spirits.

But the body rests where it is; and what a picture it is for the imagination of man to work upon. Who will answer for it, the question put for all to answer, in reference to the greatest General at arms the world ever saw. "Why," it is asked, and oddly we may think, "may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander, till it find it stopping a bung-hole? As thus—Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander returneth to dust; the dust is earth; of earth we make loam; and why of that loam, whereto he was converted, might they not stop a beer-barrel?" And so of all the Alexanders, from Cyrus to Napoleon.

"Imperious Cæsar, dead and turn'd to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the wind away;
O, that the earth, which kept the world in awe,
Should patch a wall to expel the winter's flaw!"

Such are the uses to which we come at last. The machinery which kept soul and body together in such nice harmony, has stopped. Its revolutions have been checked,—it may be, by that Providence which watches all our movements, and notes even the falling of the sparrow to the ground; or it may be, that those tender and delicate cords of life have been cut asunder, by disease and crime. The folly of man has been a greater suicide than man's misfortunes; and could the grave speak, it would say that the seeds of dissolution were oftener sown by man himself, than by any of the ministers or avengers of the Deity.

But, inscrutable and past finding out are the ways of Providence, as we see its power displayed in the narrow cells and fretted vaults of a graveyard. I have pictured to you, hastily and most imperfectly I grant, the change of being, from that moral dignity and sublimity of perfect manhood, which you see when you behold the creature man as made by the Creator, to that last change which sinks man helplessly to the earth. You see him to-day, alone, and conspicuous among all created things, the majesty of the skill and power of Omnipotence,—and from the throne of his dominion, he falls, powerless as infancy itself, to mingle with the dust and ashes of his mother earth. Look on that picture, and now on this. Here is the work of God, in his own image, and in whom was breathed, by Him who can never die, the breath of life. Dust refined was the material of that erect and manly form. But there was a refinement beyond all this. A new and living soul was yet to be formed, purer, fairer, brighter and better. “It is not good for man to be alone.”

“The world was sad, the garden was a wild,
And man a hermit lived, till woman smiled.”

Behold this picture, and scorn not even for the beautiful, that inner temple of the soul, which belongs to the spirit-land. The beauty of womanhood, as it meets the eye of man, and as it was formed by the great architect of the skies, is now before you; and let no man mar the picture we draw, by polluted touch or unhallowed thoughts. There she is,—and it is no ideal fancy we sketch,—a mother it may be, or a wife, or a sister, or one to whom vows have been made, and faith plighted. Her's are the natural graces which extinguish art, and therefore lack I the power to write the thoughts I fain would express. But I may say, as the poet hath said, that the sunny locks of such a woman “hang on her temple like golden fleece.” Her eyes, clothed in their fringed curtains, either sparkle like the Promethean fires, or they are of that soft and bewitching sweetness which wins the heart of man, and makes his judgment captive to the woman's will. Her skin is as white as the fair sheet on which I write, and as “smooth as monumental alabaster.” I might say on, and speak of lily lands, and rosy cheeks, and coral lips, and stature so “wand-like straight,” and of syren voice, and so on if I could, till I had drawn the beauty and fair proportions of the mother of all men, as she appeared, full grown, in the first garden, and created of God the companion of the father of all mankind. But what availeth all this, sacred, loved, beautiful as the picture is, and so interwoven in our very nature, that the object can no more be separated from our affections, than the soul can be sundered from the body, and maintain 'neath its power and spirituality of being. Alas—what availeth it all! There is a worm in the bud; and though fair as Diana, or as graceful as Juno,—yes it may be the very “nonpareil of beauty,”—it fadeth, perisheth, dieth, passeth away, and goeth, like the spirit, to some scene, we know not where. The spirit is not ours to control; nor even the frail and worthless tenement which holds it;

“Nothing can we call our own but death;
And that small model of the barren earth,
Which serves as paste and cover to our bones.”

But I have almost done, and ask pardon for so long wearying you with my meditations, when many books and very many sermonizers would have said and done what I but just now had the heart to do, with so much more truth and fidelity.

The spirit moved me, and I obeyed its call. What follows may be of more interest, as it gives, in the brief terms of an epitaph, the history of many of our well-remembered public men.

Every grave-yard has its peculiar interest, and will have as long as men die and the world lasts. If more have been born than are buried in the bowels of the earth, many more lie under the feet of the multitude “in cold obstruction,” than are now dwelling upon the face of the earth. I visit every grave-yard, more regardless of the living than the dead, and with a feeling akin to awe, for those who are to rest here till the last day. There is nothing like loneliness here; and they who speak of the solitude of the grave, repeat what is rather an axiom of belief, than a tried and well-established truth. In the great Babels of the world, our crowded cities, where men move around us like bees around their hive,—where we are jostled and hustled from pillar to post by almost every passer by,—where all indeed may hear the din and bustle of business and excitement,—it is here, where the stranger's eye will grow weary with gazing upon the unknown and unknowing throng, and where his heart will faint within him at the extent of the pervading loneliness. It is here, there is solitude. And no traveller need be told the reason. There is most solitude where there is least sympathy, and we can sympathise with the dead every where, with a truer feeling than with the living. Visit Westminster Abbey, and the thoughts which rush upon you, oppress you with that deep weight of silence, which, it is no paradox to say, speaks a language that words could never convey. Time will pass away here like the sleeping hours of the night. And is this solitude? Rather say it is the holy communion of the living with the dead,—of the present with the past,—of the spirit of man with the spirit of his brother man, but a few steps in advance of him on the journey of life. There are, all around him, the last earthly remains of Kings and Queens, Princes and Lords, Poets and Statesmen, Philosophers and Divines—a long line of illustrious people, from the time of the first Christian King of Britain to the days of the reigning Queen. The monument of Shakspeare is here; and, as you read his name, a thousand recollections spring up to bring back the past. Milton, Gray, Chaucer, Butler, Dryden, Goldsmith, are around you, a constellation of themselves; but each reflecting, in the great hemisphere of genius, but the glory of the "Star of Poets." And all these are but as the seven stars; which have there clustered together. Turn where you will, and you shall find some solemn temple reared, to mark the deeds or virtues of him or her, whose names are here perpetuated, and destined to remain, until "these cloudcapt towers and gorgeous palaces," with the "great globe itself," "shall dissolve," and

"Leave not a wreck behind."

The Washington burying ground, with Mount Vernon, near by, except in the hearts of our countrymen, is the only Abbey we have, where the American traveller may make his pilgrimage of devotion. Funeral marches have passed here, and the heart of the soldier has beat in unison with the muffled drum that led the procession to the grave. What a spectacle was that of April last, as seen in this city, all along from the Mansion of the living to the mansion of the dead, at one extreme of the Avenue, to the mansion of the dead, almost upon the bosom of the Potomac! The coffin, in the morning of the day, is strewn with flowers of every hue, by hands of lily whiteness, and hearts of virgin purity. They mourn, as did the elders of the daughter of Zion, and as the virgins of Jerusalem, who hung down their heads to the ground. It is woman alone who can smooth the pillow of the dying man, and minister, in the consolations of religion and heaven, to friends who are left, that medicine which can heal the mind diseased, pluck from the memory its rooted sorrow, and make the path to the grave easy and gentle. Such was the morning here, of what seemed to be, the day of a nation's sacrifice. Its noon, too, was that of the April day, on which he was buried, and the very skies seemed to mourn a country's loss, while the history of the good man was read in a nation's eyes. And the evening which followed saw a scene of solemn magnificence; the pomp and pageantry of power in low humility mingling the sincere tears of sorrow with the tones of the funeral knell, the muffled drum and the solemn march. That day a nation made its sacrifice. "One little month" of service, and he who had ascended the highest point of greatness, with a unanimity never before known, where there was a contest for position, descended to that great family sepulchre appointed for all the living. Like another Samuel, the good man died and was buried. "And all the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him, and buried him in his house at Ramah."

Others in their humbler sphere, have been buried here, with all those manifestations of respect which either kindness could feel or a nation bestow. I pass on to the record of some of these, for whom I have been enough interested in what I have seen to note down, in part or in whole, the epitaph which tells of their birth, life and death.

The first monument which attracted my attention was that to GEORGE CLINTON of New-York. Upon the top of the marble the flame of fire ascends, and upon the sides are numerous emblems, bearing record, by sign or word, of the civil and military services of the distinguished man here interred.

The record is—

"To the Memory of GEORGE CLINTON.

He was born in the State of New-York the 26th of July 1739, and died at the City of Washington on the 20th of April, 1811, in the 73d year of his age.

He was a Soldier and Statesman of the Revolution, Eminent in council, distinguished in war, he filled, with Unexampled usefulness, purity and ability, among many Other high offices, those of Governor of his native State, And of Vice-President of the United States.

While he lived, his virtue, candor and valor were the pride, The ornament and security of his countrymen, and when He died, he left an illustrious example of a well-spent life, Worthy of all imitation.

This monument is affectionately dedicated by his children."

The next Monument which I observed was that of another Vice-President. Its inscription is—

"The Tomb of ELBRIDGE GERRY, Vice-President of the United States; who died suddenly in this City, on his way to the Capitol, as President of the Senate, November 23, 1814; aged 70.

Thus fulfilling

His own memorable injunction;

'It is the duty of every citizen, though he may have but one day to live, to devote that day to the good of his country.'

Upon the opposite side is written—

"Erected by order of Congress, 1823."

The next inscription bears record to the services of a distinguished son of South Carolina. It reads—

"Beneath this marble, rest the remains of HUGH GEORGE CAMPBELL, late a Captain in the Navy of the United States. He was a native of the State of South Carolina. In the year 1775, he entered as a volunteer on board the first vessel-of-war commissioned by the Council of his native State. He served his country upwards of 22 years as a Commander, and died in this City the 14th of Nov. 1820; aged 67."

A Monument, erected to a brave and worthy chief, next met my eyes. You will read it with all the interest due to the memory of one whose race is passing away from the face of the earth, and who now, as ever, is the victim of the white man's cupidity and cruelty.

The Monument is simple, but appropriate. On one side is written—

"PUSH-MA-TA-HA,

A Choctaw Chief, lies here.

This monument to his memory is erected by his brother Chiefs, who were associated with him in a Delegation from their nation, in the year 1824, to the General Government of the United States."

On the south side of the Monument the following appears :

"PUSH-MA-TA-HA was a warrior of great distinction. He was wise in Council, eloquent in an extraordinary degree, and, on all occasions and under all circumstances, the white man's friend."

On the east side we are told that,

"He died in Washington on the 24th of December, 1824, in the 64th year of his age."

Among his last words were the following :

"When I am gone let the big guns be fired over me!"

The following are of a miscellaneous character, and but sketches of the inscriptions :

"The Chevalier FREDERICK GREUHUM, Resident Minister of Prussia, died December, 1823.

The monument erected by Frederick III, King of Prussia."

"To TOBIAS LEAR, Private Secretary of Washington, &c. Died October, 1816."

"Commodore DANIEL P. PATTERSON of the U. S. Navy, Born 1785, died 1839."

"Major General JAMES JACKSON of Georgia, Who deserved and enjoyed the confidence of the country. A soldier of the Revolution."

"General JAMES BROWN of the U. S. Army.

He was at Niagara and Chippewa."

"PHILIP PENDLETON BARBOUR of Virginia, Associate Justice of the U. S. Court, Died February 24th, 1841."

"GEORGE GRAHAM, Secretary of War, and Commissioner of the Land Office. Died August 3d, 1830."

Anson Brown, of New-York ; died June 14, 1840.

This finishes the list of all the members of Congress who were buried within, or who have monuments, at the Congressional Burying-yard. Some have died in the recess of Congress, whose deaths have not been brought to the attention of Congress, and for whom, therefore, no monument of remembrance has been erected. Scores have died after leaving Congress ; but the time of their death precluded the possibility of either public eulogy or the erection of a tomb, to tell who or what they were.

But, enough of my subject. From such a record no moral need be drawn. "All must die," is a familiar, daily lesson of childhood, manhood, and old age. Happy they who, fearing not death, encounter "darkness as a bride, and hug it in their arms." The picture of one man, as he looks on death, is that

"All things that we ordained festival
Turn from their office to black funeral ;
Our instruments to melancholy bells ;
Our wedding cheer to a sad burial feast ;

Our solemn hymns to sullen dirges, change;
Our bridal flowers serve for a burial corse."

This for the body,—for time and sense. The soul looks beyond, and its language is,—

"Mount, mount, my soul! thy seat is up on high; Whilst my gross flesh sinks downward here to die."
E. BROOKS.

EDITORIAL REMARKS.

We take great pleasure in presenting the first two parts of this beautiful poem to our readers. It is from the pen of Mrs. SEBA SMITH, of New-York, a lady of great literary merits. Some of the touches in the "Sinless Child," are exquisite; and such as any bard of any land might be proud to give. We hope soon to have the satisfaction of announcing that the services of Mrs. SMITH have been procured as a regular contributor to our pages. The remaining parts—five—of the Sinless Child, will appear in our next. It is an exquisite little gem indeed.

THE SINLESS CHILD. A POEM, IN SEVEN PARTS.

BY MRS. SEBA SMITH.

INSCRIPTION.

Sweet Eva! shall I send thee forth,
To other hearts to speak?
With all thy timidness and love,
Companionship to seek?
Will any love thy abstract ways?
Thy too unearthly tone?
Oh! heed it not, but come to me,
For thou art all mine own.

Thou art my spirit's cherished dream,
Its pure ideal birth;
And thou hast nestled in my heart,
With love that's not of earth.

Alas! for I have failed, methinks,
To paint thee as thou art;
That wild, enchanting grace of thine,
That lingers round thy heart.

With thee I've wandered, cherished one,
At twilight's dreamy hour,
To learn the language of the bird,
The mystery of the flower—
And gloomy must that sorrow be,
That thou could'st not dispel,
As thoughtfully we loitered on
By stream or sheltered dell.

Yet go! I may not say farewell,
For thou wilt not forsake—
Thou'lt linger, Eva, wilt thou not,
All hallowed thoughts to wake?
Then go; and speak to kindred hearts
In purity and truth;
And win the spirit back again,
To Love, and Peace, and Youth.

INTRODUCTION TO PART I.

Eva, a simple cottage maiden, given to the world in the widowhood of one parent, and the angelic existence of the other, like a bud developed amid the sad sweet sunshine of autumn, when its sister-flowers are all sleeping, is found from her birth to be as meek and gentle as are those pale flowers that look imploringly upon us, blooming as they do apart from the season destined for their existence, and when those that should hold tender companionship with them have ceased to be. She is gifted with the power of interpreting much of the beautiful mysteries of our earth. The delicate pencilling found upon the petals of the flowers, she finds full of gentle wisdom, as well as beauty. The song of the bird is not merely the gushing forth of a nature too full of blessedness to be silent, but she finds it responsive to the great harp of the universe, whose every tone is wisdom and goodness. The humblest plant, the simplest insect, is each alive with truth. More than this, she beholds a divine agency in all things, carrying on the great purposes of love and wisdom by the aid of innumerable happy spirits, each delighting in the part assigned it. She sees the world not merely with mortal eyes, but looks within to the pure internal life, of which the outward is but a type. Her mother, endowed with ordinary perceptions, fails to understand the pure spiritual character of her daughter, but feels daily the truthfulness and purity of her life. The neighbors too feel that Eva is unlike her sex only in greater truth and elevation.

PART I.

Whilom ago, in lowly life,
Young Eva lived and smiled,
A fair-haired girl, of wondrous truth,
And blameless from a child.
Gentle she was, and full of love,
With voice exceeding sweet,
And eyes of dove-like tenderness,
Where smiles and sadness meet.

No Father's lip her brow had kissed,
Or breathed for her a prayer;
The widowed breast on which she slept
Was full of doubt and care:
And oft was Eva's little head
Heaved by her mother's sigh—
And oft the widow shrunk in fear
From her sweet baby's eye;

For she would leave the flowing milk
To look within her face,
With something of reproachfulness,
As well as infant grace—
A trembling lip, an earnest eye,
Half smiling, half in tears—
As she would seek to comprehend
The secret of her fears.

Her ways were gentle while a babe—
With calm and tranquil eye,
That turned instinctively to seek
The blueness of the sky.
A holy smile was on her lip
Whenever sleep was there—
She slept, as sleeps the blossom, hushed
Amid the silent air.

And ere she left with tottling steps
The low-roofed cottage door,
The beetle and the cricket loved
The young child on the floor—
And every insect dwelt secure
Where little Eva played;
And piped for her its blithest song
When she in greenwood strayed;

With wing of gauze and mailed coat
 They gathered round her feet,
 Rejoiced as are all gladsome things
 A truthful soul to greet.
 They taught her infant lips to sing
 With them a hymn of praise—
 The song that in the woods is heard
 Through the long summer days.

And every where the child was heard
 With snatches of wild songs,
 That marked her feet along the vale
 Or hill-side, fleet and strong.
 She knew the haunts of every bird—
 Where bloomed the sheltered flower;
 So sheltered that the searching frost
 Might scarcely find its bower.

No loneliness did Eva know,
 Though playmates she had none;
 Such sweet companionship was hers,
 She could not be alone;
 For everything in earth or sky
 Caressed the little child,
 The joyous bird upon the wing—
 The blossom in the wild:

Much dwelt she on the green hill-side,
 And under forest tree;
 Beside the running, bab'ling brook,
 Where lithe were trouts in glee—
 She saw them dart, like stringed gems,
 With many a curve and leap—
 And learned that peace and love alone
 A gladsome heart may keep.

The opening bud, that lightly swung
 Upon the dewy air,
 Moved in its very gladsomeness
 Beneath angelic care;
 For pearly fingers gently oped
 Each curved and painted leaf,
 And where the canker-worm had been Looked on with angel-grief.

She loved all simple flowers that sprung
 In grove or sun-lit dell,
 And of each streak and varied hue,
 A meaning deep would tell—
 For her a language was impressed
 On every leaf that grew,
 And lines revealing brighter worlds
 That angel fingers drew.

Each tiny leaf became a scroll
 Inscribed with holy truth—
 A lesson that around the heart
 Should keep the dew of youth;
 Bright missals from angelic throngs
 In every by-way left—
 How were the earth of glory shorn,
 Were it of flowers bereft!

They tremble on the Alpine height;
 The fissured rock they press;
 The desert wild, with heat and sand,
 Shares too their blessedness—
 And wheresoe'er the weary heart
 Turns in its dim despair,
 The meek-eyed blossom upward looks
 Inviting it to prayer.

The widow's Cot was rude and low—
 The sloping roof, moss-grown;

And it would seem its quietude
 To every bird were known—
 The winding vine its tendrils wove
 Round roof and oaken door,
 And by the flickering light, the leaves
 Were painted on the floor.

No noxious reptiles ever came Within this lowly Cot—
 The good and beautiful alone
 Delighted in the spot.
 The very winds were hushed to peace
 Within the quiet dell,
 Or murmured through the glancing leaves
 Like breathings of a shell.

The gay bird sang from sheltering tree,
 Bright blossoms clustered round—
 And one small brook came dancing by
 With its sweet tinkling sound—
 It stained the far-off meadow green—
 It leaped a rocky dell—
 Then resting by the cottage door,
 In liquid music fell.

Upon its breast white lilies slept,
 Of pure and wax-like hue,
 And brilliant flowers upon its marge
 Luxuriantly grew.
 They were of rare and changeless birth,
 Nor needed toil nor care;
 And many marvelled earth could yield
 Aught so exceeding fair.

Young Eva said, all noisome weeds
 Would pass from earth away,
 When virtue in the human heart
 Held its predestined sway—
 Exalted thoughts were ever hers—
 Some deemed them strange and wild;
 And hence in all the hamlets round,
 Her name of SINLESS CHILD.

Her mother said that Eva's lips
 Had never falsehood known;
 No angry word had ever marred
 The music of their tone.
 And truth spake out in every line
 Of her pure tranquil face,
 Where Love and Peace, twin-dwelling pair,
 Had found a resting place.

She felt the freedom and the light
 The pure in heart may know—
 Whose blessed privilege it is
 To walk with God below;
 To understand the hidden things
 That others may not see—
 To feel a life within the heart,
 And love and mystery.

INTRODUCTION TO PART II.

The widow, accustomed to forms, and content with the faith in which she has been reared, a faith which is habitual rather than earnest and soul-requiring, leaves Eva to learn the wants and tendencies of the soul, by observing the harmony and beauty of the external world. Even from infancy she seems to have penetrated the spiritual through the material; to have beheld the heavenly, not through a glass darkly, but face to face, by means of that singleness and truth, that look within the veil. To the pure in heart alone is the promise, "They shall see God."

PART II.

Untiring all the weary day
 The widow toiled with care,
 And scarcely cleared her furrowed brow
 When came the hour of prayer—
 The voices, that on every side
 The prisoned soul call forth,
 And bid it in its freedom walk,
 Rejoicing in the earth;

Fall idly on a deafened ear,
 A heart untaught to thrill
 When music gusheth from the bird
 Or from the crystal rill—
 That moves unheeding by the flower
 With its ministry of love,
 That weeps not in the moonlight pale
 Nor silent stars above.

Alas! that round the human soul
 The cords of earth should bind,
 That they should bind in darkness down
 The light discerning mind—
 That all its freshness, freedom, gone,
 Its destiny, forgot,
 It should in gloomy discontent
 Bewail its bitter lot.

But Eva while she turned the wheel,
 Or toiled in homely guise,
 With buoyant heart was all abroad,
 Beneath the pleasant skies;
 And sang all day from joy of heart,
 For joy that in her dwelt,
 That unconfined the soul went forth—
 Such blessedness she felt.

All lowly and familiar things
 In earth, or air, or sky,
 A lesson brought to Eva's mind
 Of import deep and high:
 She learned, from blossom in the wild,
 From bird upon the wing,
 From silence and the midnight stars,
 Truth dwelt in every thing.

The careless winds that round her played
 Brought voices to her ear,
 But Eva, pure in thought and soul,
 Dreamed never once of fear—
 The whispered words of angel lips
 She heard in forest wild,
 And many a holy spell they wrought,
 About the Sinless Child.

And much she loved the forest walk,
 Where round the shadows fell,
 The solitude of mountain height,
 Or green and lovely dell—
 The brook dispensing verdure round,
 And singing on its way;
 Now coyly hid in fringe of green,
 Now sparkling in its play.

She early marked the butterfly,
 That gay mysterious thing,
 That, bursting from its prison-house
 Appeared on golden wing—
 It had no voice to speak delight,
 Yet on the flowret's breast,
 She saw it mute and motionless,
 In long, long rapture rest.

She said, that while the little shroud
 Beneath the casement hung,
 A kindly spirit lingered near,
 As lightly there it swung;
 That music sweet and low was heard
 To hail its perfect life—
 And Eva felt that insect strange
 With wondrous truth was rife.

It crawled no more a sluggish thing
 Upon the noisome earth;
 A brief, brief sleep, and then she saw
 A new and radiant birth—
 And thus she learned without a doubt,
 That man from death would rise
 As did the butterfly on wings,
 To claim its native skies.

The rainbow, bending o'er the storm,
 A beauteous language told;
 For angels, twined with loving arms,
 She plainly might behold—
 And in their glorious robes they bent
 To earth in wondrous love,
 As they would lure the human soul
 To brighter things above.

The bird would leave the rocking branch
 Upon her hand to sing,
 And upward turn its fearless eye
 And plume its glossy wing—
 And Eva listened to its song,
 Till all the sense concealed
 In that deep gushing forth of joy,
 Became to her revealed.

And when the bird would build its nest,
 A spirit from above
 Directed all the pretty work,
 And filled its heart with love.
 And she within the nest would peep
 Its colored eggs to see,
 But never touch the pretty thing,
 For a thoughtful child was she.

Much Eva loved the twilight hour,
 When shadows gather round,
 And softer sings the little bird,
 And insect from the ground—
 She felt that this within the heart
 Must be the hour of prayer,
 For earth in its deep quietude
 Did own its Maker there.

The still moon in the saffron sky
 Hung out her silver thread,
 And the bannered clouds in gorgeous fold
 A mantle round her spread.
 The gentle stars came smiling out
 Upon the brilliant sky,
 That looked a meet and glorious dome,
 For worship pure and high;

And Eva lingered, though the gloom
 Had deepened into shade;
 And many thought that spirits came
 To teach the Sinless Maid;
 For oft her mother sought the child
 Amid the forest glade,
 And marvelled that in darksome glen,
 So tranquilly she stayed.

For every jagged limb to her
 A shadowy semblance hath,

Of spectres and distorted shapes,
 That frown upon her path
 And mock her with their hideous eyes.
 For when the soul is blind
 To freedom, truth, and inward light,
 Vague fears debase the mind.

But Eva, like a dreamer waked,
 Looked off upon the hill,
 And murmured words of strange, sweet sound,
 As if there lingered still Ethereal forms with whom she talked,
 Unseen by all beside;
 And she, with earnest looks, besought
 The vision to abide.

Oh Mother! Mother! do not speak,
 Or all will pass away—
 The spirits leave the green-hill side,
 Where light the breezes play—
 They sport no more by ringing brook,
 With flowrets dreaming by;
 Nor float upon the fleecy cloud
 That steals along the sky.

It grieves me much they never will
 A human look abide,
 But veil themselves in silver mist
 By vale or mountain side.
 I feel their presence round me still,
 Though none to sight appear;
 I feel the motion of their wings,
 Their whispered language hear.

With silvery robe, and wings outspread,
 They passed me even now;
 And gems and starry diadems,
 Decked every radiant brow.
 Intent were each on some kind work
 Of pity or of love,
 Dispensing from their healing wings
 The blessings from above;

For angels fold their wings of love
 Round hearts surcharged with woe,
 And fan with balmy wing the eye
 Whence tears of sorrow flow:
 And bear, in golden censers up,
 That sacred thing, a tear;
 By which is registered the griefs,
 Hearts may have suffered here.

All holy things they upward bear,
 Of bleeding hearts the sigh,
 The groan wrung out by penitence,
 Bowed down with burning eye.
 That proof of thought when first the babe
 Smiles to the lip that smiled;
 And the first warm prayer that upward steals
 From the heart of the little child.

I would, dear Mother, thou could'st see
 Within this darksome veil,
 That hides the spirit-land from thee,
 And makes our sunlight pale—
 The toil of earth, its doubt and care,
 Would trifles seem to thee:
 Repose would rest upon thy soul,
 And holy mystery.

Thou would'st behold protecting care
 To shield thee on thy way—
 And ministers to guard thy feet,
 Lest erring, they should stray.
 And order, sympathy and love,
 Would open to thine eye,

From simplest creatures of the earth
 To seraphs throned on high.

E'en now I marked a radiant throng,
 On pinions sailing by,
 To soothe with hope the trembling heart,
 And cheer the dying eye;
 They smiling passed the lesser sprites,
 Each on his work intent;
 And love, and holy joy, I saw
 In every face were blent.

The meek-eyed violets smiling bowed—
 For angels sported by—
 Rolling in balls the fragrant dew
 To scent the evening sky.
 They kissed the rose in love and mirth,
 And its petals fairer grew—
 A shower of pearly dust they brought,
 And over the lily threw.

A host flew over the mowing field,
 And they were showering down
 The little drops on the tender grass,
 Like diamonds o'er it thrown;
 They gem'd each leaf and quivering spear
 With pearls of liquid dew,
 And bathed the stately forest tree,
 Till its robe was fresh and new.

I saw a meek-eyed angel curve
 The tulip's painted cup,
 And bless with one soft kiss the urn:
 Then fold its petals up.
 Another rocked the young bird's nest
 As high on a branch it hung.
 And the tinkling dew-drops rattled down
 Where the old dry leaf was flung.

Each and all, as its task is done,
 Soars up with a joyous eye,
 Bearing aloft some treasured gift—
 An offering to God on high.
 They bear the breath of the odorous flower,
 The sound of the pearly shell;
 And thus they add to the holy joys
 Of the home where spirits dwell.

OUR NAVY.

JUDGE ABEL P. UPSHUR AND HIS REPORT.*

There has never been a time, since the war, when public attention was more steadfastly fixed, than it now is, upon the Navy. Indeed, the maritime relations of the country were never more commanding than they are at present. Every one who has reflected at all upon the subject, now admits, that the Navy is the rightful protector of these relations in peace, their best defender in war, and the main bulwark of this nation both in peace and in war.

The inflated bubble of credit and speculation, which was blown to bursting in 1837, has been pricked; and with it, has disappeared that wild spirit of extravagance, which rioted in Bank Parlours,

* Report of the Secretary of the Navy. Dec. 4, 1841. Second Session, 27th Congress. House of Representatives, Doc. No. 2.

State Houses, and Legislative Halls; and which led Government, States and People, into those excesses, that have well nigh left the whole country prostrate. As a nation, we are now in a condition, profitably to reflect upon our situation; and to draw for the future, lessons of wisdom from our experience in past follies.

The extravagant schemes of '35-7, for protecting our seaboard with a line of forts and castles, reaching from the St. John's to the Sabine—and the grave demands of Congress upon the Executive, to know how much money could be expended for this purpose, are now considered as wonders of those distempered times. The country has awoke from its dreams, as from a delusion; and sober reasoning has now convinced it, that it must trust to its Navy to defend its coasts from foreign aggression—to fortifications and to ships, to protect its harbors and strong holds from blockade and pillage. This conviction has been expressed in a manner that must be heeded.

The country has demanded from its rulers, in language not to be misunderstood, reform for the Navy—renewed energies and increased strength for this arm of safety. And we congratulate the country, that an officer has at last been found to preside over the Navy, who can rightly interpret this language, and who has the understanding to perceive our Naval defects, and the energy to apply the remedies.

In this, his first Report, Judge Upshur has given his countrymen an earnest of what they may expect from him as a Navy Secretary. Though yet green in office, he has put forth, not only the most able and business-like document, but the most valuable exposition of the condition and wants of the Navy, that has ever proceeded from that Department. His is much the most able state paper that accompanied the President's Message.

The Secretary promises reform; and in a manly spirit calls on Congress and the Executive for the necessary aid. He has already satisfied himself that the Navy-Board is an irresponsible power, which should give place to a system of proper responsibility. He has discovered that the Navy Rules and Regulations, which have been in force for more than the quarter of a century, were palmed off upon the service by that Board, as law and gospel; and that, though practically enforced at this day, they never had even the shadow of any lawful authority, nor binding sanction. The Commissioners were authorised to prepare and lay before Congress a set of Rules and Regulations for the government of the Navy-Board and its agents. Instead of doing this, they prepared a general code of laws for the Navy; and these were declared to be the lex suprema, without ever having been submitted to Congress at all! What can more strikingly illustrate the negligence, which has hitherto obtained in the management of the Navy, than the fact, that such a discovery should now be made for the first time! This subject calls loudly for reform, and the Secretary presses it with great earnestness upon the consideration of Congress. We hope it will receive the attention which its importance deserves.

Not only an amended code, but a uniform system of outfits and allowances is much required: two vessels of the same class and size fit out from the same port and for like service—the stores of one may cost $6,000—of the other, $30,000.* Surely there is great room for reform here; for, as is shown by other Navies, a surprising degree of uniformity is attainable in the cost, as well as in the materials, of outfits and stores of vessels. We recollect a case in point of an English Captain. After having reached his station abroad, he conceived it would add to the neat appearance of his rigging, to worm† a certain rope called a stay. To his surprise, the next arrival brought him a communication from the Admiralty, informing him if that worming were not taken off, it should be charged to him. Now an officer in our service might worm, parcel, marl and serve, every rope in his ship, and no one at home would be the wiser for it.

The cost of the Englishman's worming might perhaps be 10 cents. We do not advocate the 'penny wise and pound foolish' system; but if we would take care of the pounds, we must keep an eye to the pence also. And we see no reason why we may not have as rigid a system of accountability in our service, as the English have in theirs.

We can assure the friends of the Navy, that Judge Upshur has undertaken its management, with the noble purpose of serving his country—of restoring economy and efficiency to this much abused service—and of erecting, in the gratitude of his countrymen, a monument of praise for his well-timed and patriotic efforts. As far as he is concerned, every thing will be done for the Navy that the public weal requires. He has already recommended a Naval School; the creation of Admirals; an extension of the forces afloat; an increase of the Marine Corps;—and, though last, not least, an amelioration of the Sailor's condition—measures, all of them, highly important, and much required by the public necessities. All, except the last, have been fully discussed in our columns; and therefore it is unnecessary to go again into any lengthened argument to shew how the interests of the public at large are to be advanced by them.

The sailor's ration is now what it was nearly fifty years ago. In the midst of all the improvements of every kind which has been going on around him, no change—and there has been great room for change—has been made in Jack's diet. We should be glad to see the whiskey, which now forms a part of his ration, commuted for sugar and tea or chocolate, which are now as much necessities as pork and molasses.

For many valuable suggestions, as to improving the condition of the sailor, and thereby promoting the public interest, see an excellent article by Lieutenant Davis of the Navy, in the October No. of the American Quarterly. We have nothing to add to the judicious remarks of that officer on this subject.

Upon the same principle, and for the same reasons, that armies, in all countries, are commanded by Generals, Navies are commanded by Admirals. Custom and universal experience are as much in favor of the one as of the other; and the non-existence of this, or of a corresponding grade in our Navy, is daily felt as an evil; and, on some occasions has proved truly humiliating to the officers themselves.

In a Navy as large as ours now is, a high state of discipline can never be maintained without the assistance of higher grades. At present, there are too many heads: for all Captains are equal.

None of the insignia of rank, which deck an Admiral's ship, are allowed to be worn by the American Commander. Even his title of Commodore is a matter of courtesy, tolerated as a convenience, in spite of a positive order from the Navy Department. Once an Admiral, always an Admiral. Not so with our Commodores; to-day, one of them contends with the foreign Admiral, and claims to be received and acknowledged by him, as an equal in rank—to-morrow, he may be met by this same Admiral, as the mere Captain of a single ship, with no higher pretensions than to be placed on a footing of equality with one of the 20 Captains that command single ships in the Admiral's fleet.

Many, who are opposed to the creation of Admirals in our service, maintain with more plausibility than sound reasoning, that the American Captain, in command of a squadron, is, and of right ought to be, equal, in the eyes of the world, to an English, French, or any other Admiral in command of a fleet. And some of our officers with more zeal than discretion, have undertaken to maintain these grounds: for, in their contentions with foreign officers on this subject, they have generally had the worst of the argument.

A difficulty of this kind between an American Commodore and a French Admiral, is of recent occurrence. The friendly relations between the two squadrons were interrupted by it. For the sake of presenting this subject in its practical bearings, let us suppose the conversation which occurred between those officers on that occasion.

"Here," might have said the Frenchman, "is an Admiral's commission which I hold from my King. Here too is an official register of the French Navy; on it, I am borne as an Admiral. And, in token of this rank, I wear at my mast-head, a square flag—the badge, which the usages of the sea have established, and which all the nations of the earth recognize and acknowledge, as the outward and visible insignium of my high office. These are my credentials, which have been received and admitted from time immemorial, and about which there can be no dispute. Pardon me; but may I now ask for yours, Monsieur Capitaine! for I perceive that your name is borne on your official register as that of a Captain only—and the regulations of your service forbid that you should be styled Commodore."

"All that is very true, sir; but my credentials are to be seen in that broad pennant which you see flying at my main."

"Well, sir, since you have no regular papers, I'll admit your hunting for all that the usages and customs of the sea will allow it. It is triangular—mine is square. From remote time, and by all maritime nations, the triangular pennant, such as you wear, has been considered as the outward badge of a grade of officers called Commodores, and subordinate to Admirals. There are several such commanding divisions of my fleet: they are my inferiors; and by your rule, you can claim equality of rank only with them—and, were you to fall in with one of them, you would readily admit him as an equal."

"To be candid, such is our custom I admit: but," continues the American officer, "I am the Commander-in-Chief of the United States Naval Forces in these seas—you are only the same of the French—my command is quite as respectable, and in all respects, as important, as yours; therefore I claim to be equal in rank to yourself."

"These are the grounds," replies the other, "which I expected you to take in the first instance; and there might seem to be some degree of plausibility in them; for you have under you, some fine ships, I admit. But as I reminded you before, I find that at home, you are nothing but a Captain; and that your present command is a mere temporary trust: pull down that piece of hunting at your mast-head, and you are again the mere Captain—subject, as I find by your laws, to be ordered to the command of any single ship over 20 guns. Such an inferior post, as this, it is impossible for an Admiral in the French Navy ever to fill. Suppose that I and all my commissioned officers, should be killed by some accident, possible, but not probable. My Boatswain would then be the commanding officer of this fleet. He might then use the same argument with you, which you now use with me. But would you admit him as an officer equal in rank to yourself, knowing, that in France, he is recognized as nothing but a mere Boatswain, in a temporary command; as I know that you, in your country, are recognized by your laws, only as a Captain?"

"Moreover, I am just from a foreign court: where his Majesty, the King of the French, was represented by a Minister:—your government, though with interests more important, was represented by a Chargé d'Affaires. But his Majesty's Minister, in all cases, took precedence of your Charge. Now, suppose your Republic had been as niggardly of rank in its diplomatic corps, as it has been of rank in the Navy—and that, Chargé d'Affaires had been the highest rank in that corps, as Captain is in your Navy. All Europe knows as well what a Chargé d'Affaires is, as every maritime nation knows what a Navy Captain is—could it be expected, that other courts would have returned you Ministers for your Chargés?—or, that these would have been received on the same footing, or recognized at the courts to which they might be accredited, as of the same rank and importance, with the Ministers of other nations!

"You say that yours, though a Captain's, is the highest rank known in your service, as Admiral is in mine;—that you command a detachment of the American Navy, as I do of the French; that your force is equal to mine; and that therefore, you are entitled to be placed upon a footing with me, or any Admiral in any service. And so, in the case supposed, your Chargé might say:—He would be the highest diplomatic functionary known to your government; he would represent a nation as respectable as any in the world;—and might be charged with interests as important, nay more so, than any of the Ministers around him. But would he, for this reason, be put upon a footing with them? Your Government saw at once the necessity of conforming with the general usage of other nations, by making the rank of your Army officers, and diplomatic agents, to correspond with those of other nations. This necessity did not at first exist with your Navy, because, until your last war, you may be said to have had no Navy. But now, your country, after having been fought into a Naval power by Great Britain, is possessed of a Navy not to be despised. And if your Republic desire that the Commanders of her Naval forces should be treated with the comity of Admirals, a decent respect for the opinion of the world, for the customs of other nations, and for the usages of the sea, requires that she should first show that she herself holds her own officers in proper estimation; by investing them with rank, honors and titles, to correspond with like officers in other services. In failing to have Admirals, the United States has departed from the custom of nations. Those customs are well known, and well established; and it is better that your Government should conform to them, than that all the world else beside, should depart therefrom to humor a mere fancy."

We respect the opinions of others, however erroneous they may be, when honestly entertained. Many, in their opposition to the grade of Admirals, take the ground—and it is a popular one—that Captain is the highest grade known in the American Navy, and therefore an American Captain is equal to the highest grade of any other Navy, whatever be the title—for that it is immaterial by what name we call him, whether Captain or Midshipman.

Granted—let him be called Sachem or Sea Serpent; only make his duties such as become the importance of the highest station in the Navy. In every military service, the officer who is required to do duties that properly pertain to a grade inferior to the one occupied by him, considers himself degraded. What would Captains in the Army think, were they required to do Corporal's duty? or Generals, if they were compelled to serve as Captains?

Certainly if a General in our Army, were required to do those duties, which, in other armies, universal custom has assigned to Captains, no one would maintain that an American General was an officer equal in rank to the foreign General. His title would be considered as a misnomer, calculated to deceive. The Captain in our Navy is required to perform those duties, which, in other Navies, are considered beneath the dignity of Admiral, and are assigned to officers of an inferior grade. And as the true standard of an officer's rank, are the trusts reposed, the honors conferred, and the duties required of him, all that the friends of increased rank in the Navy desire, is, that the duties, honors, and trusts, which are conferred upon, and required of, Admirals in other Navies, should be conferred upon, and required of a certain number of officers in our Navy—by what name these officers shall be designated as a class is immaterial—only we should object to the style and title of 'Sea Kings;' Sachem or Dux would do; though we should prefer to follow in the wake of those who most use the sea.

In the language of the Report, "The rank of Admiral is known in all the Navies of the world—it has existed through a long course of ages, and has been fully tested in the experience of all nations. It still exists; and is still approved. That which has been found valuable in the Naval service of other countries, we have good reason to believe will be equally valuable in our own."

The Navy Department can now boast of a man of industry and of energy. It has fallen into the hands of one who can appreciate the importance of the situation; whose pride it is, to reform the abuses of the service, to correct its faults, and to make it in all respects, the worthy bulwark of a great nation. Times were never more propitious for the Navy, than they now are. It has a friend in its present head, who will give tone to its enfeebled state, and who is determined to let its wants be known; notwithstanding its abuses, it still is the pride of the nation; and public sentiment is strongly in its favor. The work of reform has been commenced; and Congress is prepared to do for it whatever the national weal requires. And this is all we crave, and all we have contended for.

The interests of the service clearly require a multiplication of subordinate grades;—and, the new Secretary, lays it down with the force of a mathematical truth, that it would be both wise and politic to establish them. So think we.

From the lowest to the highest grade, now in the Navy, there are but three steps in the line of promotion. Merely to create grades, that degrees in the scale of official rank may be multiplied, we think neither politic nor wise. But when experience has taught us the want of more grades; when the necessities of the service have actually created them, and the public convenience has approved them, surely caution itself and the most stolid dread of innovation will admit it to be not only wise and politic, but in all respects prudent and desirable, that the law should give them palpable existence.

We have seen, that, in spite of regulation and the law, the necessities and daily convenience of the service have introduced into the Navy, a higher grade than that of Captain—for some distinction between an officer who commands many ships, and one who commands but a single ship, is both necessary and convenient. For like reasons, and by the same sage counsellor, the intermediate grade of Lieutenant Commandant has been introduced; custom has established it; and there are many good and sufficient reasons, why the law should confirm it. Of these, we can urge, briefly, none better, nor more sufficient, than the simple fact, that the necessities of the service have, of themselves, introduced it; that many years of actual trial have approved it; and that daily practice and experience show it to be both necessary and convenient.

There are many separate commands in the Navy, small in themselves, but highly useful and necessary, which are properly considered beneath the dignity of Captains and Commanders: such, for instance, are the Commands of brigs and schooners, with other inferior stations. To such, it is the custom of the service to assign Lieutenants with the complimentary title of Lieutenant Commandant.

Officers thus situated enjoy the title, privileges and emoluments of a distinct and separate grade; as they have the substance, we would make a virtue of necessity, and give them the shadow too; and the more especially, as in the shadow, is contained a public good.

This grade is intermediate between Lieutenant and Commander; and though convenient and useful in itself, it has been made, as it now exists, the source of much heart-burning among officers, and of great injury to the service. Would the law establish it, and draw above and below it, the line by which its duties should be limited, the field of favoritism in the Navy, would be both shortened and narrowed; by these means, many of those considerations, which now induce officers to forget their self-respect, and to become hangers-on at Washington for nice births, would be removed.

We would confine, by law, the duties of Lieutenant Commandant, to the first Lieutenancy of Navy-Yards, to the first Lieutenancy of all vessels larger, and to the Captaincy of all vessels smaller, than sloops-of-war. Their pay, when on duty, should be what it now is—$1800 a year; and when off, that of a Lieutenant at sea.

Among the number required to fill these stations, would be found officers well qualified to perform every duty not only of this, but of any other grade in their line of the service. Hence, the Department would not have the power, should it ever again possess the inclination, to go down, as it has done, to its favorites among the Passed Midshipmen and other junior officers, to obtain commanders for our men-of-war schooners.

There are, at this time, several Passed Midshipmen in command of schooners, which it would be no reflection upon them to say, many Lieutenants, in every respect more deserving and capable, have sought in vain.

We never did subscribe to the monstrous absurdity, that date of commission, instead of qualifications, should be consulted in the selection of officers for any particular service. But qualifications and all things else being equal, except date of commission, we should then, in all cases, let date of commission take precedence where there was competition; and it is hoped and believed, there always will be competition among officers for posts of honor. We admit the propriety of allowing the Department, in the selection of officers, all the latitude necessary for procuring the most suitable talents and qualifications for the services required. But when that grade to which these services properly pertain, affords officers in all respects capable and fit, the law certainly should forbid the Secretary to look among his favorites in the subordinate grades, for some one to fill the post of honor supposed.

We profess to be well acquainted with the Navy; and we assert with the confidence of knowledge, that in each grade of officers, are to be found individuals highly capable of performing with credit to themselves, and with honor to their country, any kind of service or duty which belongs to their grade. There are Captains in the Navy, who would discharge with ability, any duty, however important or difficult, which it is lawful or proper to require at the hands of a Captain; so of Commanders; and so of Lieutenants. And so too would it be of Lieutenants Commandant.

This being the case—which no one will dispute—the duties of each grade should be confined by law, to the officers of that grade; and a statute, which should require this much of the Department, would be hailed not only as wise and judicious in itself, but as highly beneficial to the service at large. It is not only an unjust reflection upon the officers of any grade, but it is ruinous to the service, to look below that grade for other officers to do its duties—it interrupts harmony, breaks down discipline, and damps the esprit de corps of officers. This has been done in the Exploring Expedition; this has been done in the Florida Expedition; and this has been done in numerous other instances of late years.

Much attentive observation on the subject, has brought our mind to the conviction, that it is essential to the harmony, discipline and well being of the service, to confine, whenever it can be done, the duties of each grade, strictly to the officers of that grade, and to none other.

Should it ever so happen, that an officer of the necessary qualifications for any particular duty could not be found in the proper grade, we would go down the list, until we should find one who was qualified; and when we had found him, we would, were he the youngest Midshipman on the Register, first promote him over the heads of the others, and then assign him to the duty required. In no instance, unless in one of emergency, can the duties of a high, be performed by an officer of a lower grade, without interrupting the discipline of the service in which it is done.

The establishing of the grade of Lieutenant Commandant would call for the immediate promotion of not less than 50 or 60 Lieutenants; for nearly as many as these are now actually employed in connexion with the duties proposed. If, among this number, the Department could not find suitable officers for all the duties required of this, or of any other grade, then we should think it high time reform were commenced among the officers too, as well as with the Navy.

We urge this intermediate grade upon the Honorable Secretary, as an important subject in the work of reorganization. Other Navies have tried it, and found it to answer well. The division of duties calls for it in ours; practice has introduced it; it is sanctioned by custom; and the experience of years has proved it to be convenient and necessary. Is it not, then, both prudent and wise to profit by the lessons taught in such a school?

The establishment of a good school for Midshipmen, is admitted on all hands to be highly essential to the future well being of the Navy. This subject is commanding a larger share of the public attention, now, than we have ever before known it to do. It augurs well for the service that the new Secretary has taken it up so promptly, and with so much zeal. Within the last eighteen months, it has been fully discussed in this journal; and we have nothing new to add in relation to it. Like most others, we have a preference as to the location of this institution. But individual preferences and sectional prejudices, should no longer be suffered to stand in its way, as they have done. A Naval Academy is much needed; nay, the public interest, the honor and the welfare of the service, absolutely require it. In the East, or the West; ashore, or afloat; on an island in the sea, or on a peak of the Rocky mountains—be its location where it may—we advocate its immediate establishment; and we hope that Congress will, at the present session, give the subject that attention which it deserves.

Should it, however, be placed on the seaboard, we would suggest that the Depot of nautical instruments and charts be connected with it; and that the appropriation of $50,000 now asked by the Secretary for building a Depot, should be made with this view. By uniting the two, a two-fold advantage would be gained: without incurring the double expense of two separate establishments, the nautical professor, with his pupils and an assistant, could take charge of this department. The Midshipmen would thus have all the facilities of making astronomical observations, and of rating chronometers for the practical purposes of navigation; and thus, while learning practically an important branch of the navigator's art, they would be rendering the public an actual and valuable service.

With his limited experience in office, we could not expect Judge Upshur to occupy the whole field of Naval Reform in this Report. He has taken the first steps towards it with great judgment. The plans already proposed, will, in due time, be followed by others no less important and necessary. Among these may be included the transfer of the Revenue Service over to the Navy—as to the propriety of which, Congress has already adopted resolutions of inquiry. Such an arrangement would effect a vast saving to the public. This Service is supported from the revenue; and there is no annual appropriation made for it, nor indeed is there any specific appropriation for it at all; as far as limits are concerned, the receipts of the custom-house are the only limits imposed by law upon the expenditures for this Service. In spite of the specific character of appropriations and the restraints of the law, we have seen how abuse and corruption in other departments of the Government, have rioted with the public funds; what fantastic tricks they have played here, no one knows, for there were no restraints upon them, except such as peculating collectors, for their own greedy purposes, chose to impose.

Next to correcting Navy-Yard abuses, we consider the transfer of the Revenue Service over to the Navy, as one of the most economical measures in the whole system of Naval Reform. Nor is mere economy the greatest recommendation in favor of the transfer.

The number of shipwrecks that annually take place on our coast, average more than one for every day in the year. In some seasons they have amounted to one for every eight hours. Many of these vessels are first embayed and then lost, and might be saved by timely assistance. Were Naval discipline introduced into this Service, and small steamers to carry two chase shell-guns of heavy calibre, substituted for the present cutters, they would perform many times as much service as the cutters can; and by requiring fewer hands, they would be less expensive. By taking to the sea, whenever they could in all rough weather, and directly after every gale, they would rescue many lives and much property, that, but for them, would be lost.

After a fair trial, Captain Perry and his officers ascertained and reported in 1838, that the current expenses of running the steamer Fulton, were $3.05 for twelve hours, and that her whole annual expense would be less than that of a sail vessel of the same size.* The steam cutters here proposed would not be half as large as the Fulton, and therefore their current expenses would be lessened nearly in the same ratio. This difference of expense between men-of-war, and in favor of steamers, arises from the circumstance, that though fuel costs more than canvass, yet the steam vessels do not require nearly as many hands as the sail vessels. The same would obtain between sail cutters and steam cutters. Those of the former that we now have, carry not less than thirty or forty foremast hands; those that we propose, would not require more than fifteen or twenty—if as many. This item alone, exclusive of the wear and tear of sails, spars and rigging, amounts in pay and rations to not less than $300 a month, which, allowing the steamer to steam on an average twenty days of every month, would well nigh supply her, if it would not entirely suffice for fuel.

Such a force, incorporated with the Navy, would form a most valuable nursery for a steam marine, making our officers familiar with their own coast, and with all its shoals and places of shelter. It would protect the revenue in peace, and at all times furnish steam sentinels-of-war, to guard our coast, and to check the advanced forces of an enemy while coming, with evil intent upon our shores, from beyond the 'black waters,' as the people of the East, with mysterious horror, call the sea.

But to return to the other measures of reform, which, under the energetic hand of the Virginia Secretary, we hope to see accomplished: the next is the fixing by law the ratio of numbers which shall be preserved between the officers of the lower, and those of the high grades. The files of the Department afford statistics, which will enable the Secretary—if he have time to collate them—to establish this ratio with such nicety, that the supply of Midshipmen would just equal, and no more, the demand for Lieutenants; and so on, up. There is now no limit to this appointing power, and it has been much abused. The appointments of Midshipmen for the last year alone, amount, we are told, to upwards of 250. If we continue on at this rate, until these are admitted to their examination, we shall have the service overrun with a gang of Midshipmen 1500 strong—when, with a Navy twice the present size of ours, 400 would be more than ample. We are glad to perceive that Congress is disposed to assist the Secretary in his herculean labor, for a committee has been instructed to inquire into this subject likewise.

Some regulation ought also to be adopted for securing to each State, a fair quota of appointments in the Navy. There are ten officers from Massachusetts and Virginia, where there is one from Ohio, or Tennessee. To make it appear that some attention is paid to the claims of the West, many of those who are borne on the Register as citizens of that region, are in fact citizens of the East, falsely registered and nominally appointed from the West, to the exclusion of some more legitimate and rightful claimant. By such appointments, frauds are often practised upon those 'far off' States. The West has been sorely dealt with in the way of Navy patronage; and it is high time her eyes were opened to her just rights in this matter.

Other measures no less important than those already mentioned, and which will be brought forward in due time, are the establishment of a National Boat-Yard on the Mississippi, and of Naval Depots at the South; the opening of rendezvous in the West for the shipment of steamboat men, landsmen, marines, and apprentices; the introduction of economy in the building and repairing of ships; the correcting of Navy-Yard abuses; and the arranging of a retired list, or the devising of some means by which an honorable retirement may be afforded to the superannuated officers in the higher grades; and by which the service may be relieved of 'Uncle Sam's hard bargains' in the lower.

The fact that all of these subjects are not embraced in the Report, argues nothing against the system of thorough reform which is promised at the hands of Judge Upshur. We can assure our readers and the friends of the Navy, that he has taken up the subject of Naval reform in good earnest, and means to go through with it. It cannot be reasonably expected, that, at this early day, he could enter into all the necessary details. He has not yet had time to possess himself of half the information requisite for maturing his plans, and bringing forward his measures. In fact, there is so much to be done, that our surprise is, not that he has not done more, but that he has been able to accomplish as much as he has in so short a time.

Excellent and satisfactory as this Report is, it does not embrace any thing like the thorough system of reform, which is now contemplated for the Navy. None of the abuses exposed in this journal, have escaped the attention of the present Secretary. That his work may be lasting, he designs to lay the foundations of it broad and deep. In order to do this, he has first to clear away much rubbish. And he has, accordingly, set inquiries on foot, concerning Navy-Yard, and other abuses: so soon as he has satisfied himself of the proper remedies for these, he will proceed to have them applied.

We conceive it to be almost as important to know how the Navy has got wrong, as it is to know how to set it right. In taking charge of it, in its present condition, Judge Upshur is in the situation of a Captain, who is sent to a ship which incompetent navigators have plunged into difficulties, and left surrounded by breakers. The first thing that this new commander does, is to send out a party of officers to sound, survey and ascertain the exact extent, character and position of the shoals and quicksands, with which the vessel is surrounded. He then lays them down on a chart, as well that others may know how to avoid them in future, as that he may clearly see the best way of getting clear of them himself.

With all due deference, this, in our opinion, is the course which Judge Upshur should take with regard to the Navy-Yards, and to other subjects of Naval economy. Officers should at once be commissioned to examine into the condition of the entire system of Naval economy. We do not wish merely to find out that common laborers have been employed to drive oxen, to dig, and to do other jobs about Navy-Yards,—that, by some ingenious figment, such labor has been called repairing ship—and that, the unlawful wages have been accordingly charged to any ship that happened, at the time, to be undergoing this costly operation. All this we already know. We desire information, which shall be more practical, even than this. We desire to know what it is that causes our ships to rot, and makes such frequent and heavy repairs necessary, that we may adopt preventive measures if practicable.

The corn-law, and other commissions of inquiry in England, have elicited information of the most valuable kind, bearing, not only upon the particular subject of investigation, but upon the whole science of political economy.

From such a commission as we propose, properly conducted, we should expect information equally valuable, not only to the Navy, but to the whole science of Naval Architecture, and therefore to the whole country. For instance: it is well known that our men-of-war, though built of better materials, are much more frequently and thoroughly repaired, than merchantmen. One or two of them, built of live oak, have been actually broken up as rotten and utterly useless, at an age, when the majority of white oak merchant vessels are perfectly sound and good. And, whatever be the cause, it is also evident that our men-of-war, though built of the same materials of which they were thirty years ago, are repaired now much more frequently than they were then.

Can this be owing to the policy of creating employment for the mechanics at our Navy-Yards? Or is it owing to the manner of seasoning timber for the Navy? Or is it owing to the use of iron tanks in our men-of-war, that the public ships do decay so much more rapidly than they used to do—and so much more rapidly than less substantial merchantmen, now do?

Whenever a merchantman discharges her cargo, her hold is swept, cleaned and aired. But, owing to the inconvenience of breaking out the tanks of a man-of-war on foreign stations, the hold of the latter is seldom cleaned from the beginning to the end of a three years' cruise; formerly this was not so. Consequently, unless the tanks fit tightly, which is not always the case, there is apt to be a vast accumulation of dirt and filth in a man-of-war's hold, which is not found in that of a merchantman.

The inquiry of which we speak, would not only discover how far these agents and causes tend to promote decay, and how they may be neutralized or destroyed; but, it would elicit a vast amount of information on many other subjects connected with the economy of ships and the Navy, that would prove of great value and practical importance to the country at large. And, we do not well perceive, how any system of permanent reform, as to the economy of the Navy can be devised, unless some such investigation shall first be made. We neither advocate nor propose any thing inquisitorial. We do not care to find out who have been the abusers; but, what the abuses are; for, the part of wisdom now is, not to punish past offenders, but to prevent future offences.

Since the arch enemy of Marines, and the master spirit of the Navy-Board, that, for so many years, has sat an incubus upon the Navy, 'has quit his country for his country's good,' times have become propitious also for this gallant and much neglected corps of sea soldiers.

An increase of the Marine Corps is recommended in the Report, and seems to be required by the public necessities. Whatever the honor, or the interests of this nation require, the people can afford—and, like the Honorable Secretary, where these are concerned, we are for no niggardly policy.

Therefore we would abandon the system hitherto pursued with regard to the Marine Corps, and place it on that footing which the necessities of the service require it should occupy.

In the English as well as the American Navy, the Marines have always been found true to their country in the hour of danger. Without them, the police of a ship cannot be effective in peace, nor secure in war. They are a faithful corps; they have ever proved themselves so; and we should be pleased to see the complement of Marines in our men-of-war largely increased.

Marines were first known to the English Navy in 1702. At the taking of Gibraltar, they "alone, of all her Majesty's land forces, were the only corps who successfully stormed the fortress." In commemoration of their services on that occasion, the word GIBRALTAR is to this day inscribed on their colors. His grateful remembrance of the important services rendered by them at the battle of St. Vincent, induced the Admiral to obtain for them in 1802, the title of ROYAL Marines. And in 1827, when the Duke of Clarence wished to present them with a stand of colors having suitable emblems and a device, he caused a summary of their principal engagements to be drawn up, since the taking of Gibraltar. There were more than a hundred of these, in which his Majesty's 'faithful Marines' had won glory for their King and laurels for themselves in every sea and land. In the difficulty of selecting from such a constellation of gallant deeds, some exploit more brilliant than the rest, the Duke resolved to inscribe on the colors 'the great globe itself,' having the word Gibraltar above, and per Mare, per Terram below.*

By land and by water, wherever and whenever the American Marines have had an opportunity of distinction, they have shown themselves altogether worthy of such a prototype. They are brave, patriotic, loyal and true; and it gives us pleasure to add our testimony, however humble, to their usefulness and worth in the Navy.

We have thrown these opinions and suggestions hastily together. We offer them for what they are worth, and hasten to conclude an article that is longer than we ever intended it to be, and which, if we had time, we would make shorter.

THE FOOLS' PENCE.

In the year 183—, in a handsomely furnished parlor which opened out of that noted London gin-shop called "The Punch-bowl," sat its mistress, the gaudily dressed Mrs. Crowder, conversing with an obsequious neighbor.

"Why, Mrs. Crowder, I really must say you have things in the first style! What elegant papering! what noble chairs! what a pair of fire-screens! all so bright and fresh!—Then, the elegant stone-copings to your windows, and those beautiful French window frames! And you have been sending your daughters to the genteel boarding-school: your shop is the best furnished, and your cellars are the best filled, in all this part of Lunnun. Where can you find the needful for all these grand things? Dear Mrs. Crowder, how do you manage?"

Mrs. Crowder simpered, and cast a look of smiling contempt through the half open door, into the shop, filled with drouthy customers. "The fools' pence!—'tis THE FOOLS' PENCE that does it for us," she said. And her voice rose, more shrill and loud than usual, with the triumph she felt.

Her words reached the ears of one customer,—George Manly, the carpenter, who stood near the counter. Turning his eyes upon those around him, he saw pale, sunken cheeks, inflamed eyes, and ragged garments. He then turned them upon the stately apartment: he looked through the door into the parlor, and saw looking-glasses, and pictures, and gilding, and fine furniture, and a rich carpet, and Miss Lucy in a silk gown, at her piano: and he thought to himself, how strange it is! how curious, that all this wretchedness on my left hand should be made to turn into all this rich finery on my right!

"Well sir,—and what's for you?"—said the shrill voice which had made THE FOOLS' PENCE ring in his ears.

"A glass of gin, ma'am, is what I was waiting for; but I think I've paid the last fools' pence that I shall put down on this counter for many a long day."

Manly hastened home. His wife and his two little girls were seated at work. They were thin and pale, really for want of food. The room looked very cheerless, and their fire was so small as hardly to be felt: yet the dullest observer would have been struck by the neatness that reigned.

It was a joyful surprise to them, his returning so early that night, and returning sober, and in good humor.

"Your eyes are weak to-night, wife," said George, "or else you have been crying. I'm afraid you work too much, by candle light."

His wife smiled and said, "working does not hurt my eyes;" and she beckoned to her little boy, who was standing apart, in a corner—evidently as a culprit.

"Why, John, what's this I see?" said his father. "Come, and tell me what you have been doing."

John was a plain spoken boy, and had a straightforward way. He came up to his father, and looked full in his face, and said, "The baker came for his money to-night, and would not leave the loaves without it; but though he was cross and rough, he said mother was not to blame, and that he was sure you had been drinking away all the money; and when he was gone, mother cried over her work, but she did not say any thing. I did not know she was crying, till I saw her tears dropping on her hands; and then I said bad words; and mother sent me to stand in the corner."

"Tell me what your bad words were, John," said his father; "not swearing, I hope?"

"No," said John, coloring: "I said, you were a bad man! I said, bad father!"

"And they were bad words, I am sure," said

* Miles' Royal Naval Service, p. 122.

his mother : " but you are forgiven ; so now bring me some coal from the box."

George looked at the face of his wife ; and as he met the tender gaze of her mild eyes now turned to him, he felt the tears rise in his own. He rose up ; and putting money into her hands, he said, " There are my week's wages. Come, come, hold out both hands, for you have not got all yet. Lay it out for the best, as you always do. I hope this will be a beginning of better doings on my part, and happier days on yours."

George told his wife, after the children were gone to bed, that when he saw what the pence of the poor could do towards keeping up a fine house, and dressing out the landlord's wife and daughters, and when he thought of his own hard-working, uncomplaining Susan, and his children in want, and almost in rags, while he was sitting drinking, night after night, destroying his health and strength ; he was so struck with sorrow and shame, that he seemed to come to himself at last. He determined, from that hour, never again to put the intoxicating glass to his lips.

More than a year afterwards, one Sunday afternoon, as Mrs. Crowder, of the Punch-bowl, was walking with her daughters to the tea-gardens, they were overtaken by a violent shower of rain ; and had become at least half drenched, when they entered a comfortable house, distinguished by its comforts and tidiness from all others near it. Its good-natured mistress and her two girls did all they could to dry and wipe away the rain-drops and mud-splashes from the ladies' fine silk gowns, all draggled and soiled, and to repair, as far as possible, every mischief done to their dresses and persons.

When all had been done that could be done, and, as Miss Lucy said, they " began to look themselves again," Mrs. Crowder, who was jolling in a large arm-chair, and amusing herself by a stare at every one and every thing in the room, suddenly started forward, and addressing herself to the master of the house, whose Bible and whose face had just caught her eye,—“ Why, my good man, we are old friends ! I know your face, I'm certain : still there is some change in you, though I can't exactly say what it is."

" I used to be in ragged clothes and out of health," said George Manly, smiling : " now, thank God, I am comfortably clad, and in excellent health."

" But how is it," said Mrs. Crowder, " that we never catch a sight of you now ?"

" Madam," said he, " I'm sure I wish you well : nay, I have reason to thank you ; for words of yours first opened my eyes to my own foolish and wicked course. My wife and children were half-naked and half-starved, only this time last year. Look at them, if you please, now : for sweet, contented looks, and decent clothes, I'll match them with any man's wife and children. And now, madam, I tell you, as you told a friend of yours one day last year,—''tis the FOOLS' PENCE that have done all this for us. The Fools' pence !—I ought rather to say, the pence earned by honest industry ; and spent so that we can ask the blessing of God upon the pence."

Mrs. Crowder never recovered the customer she had lost.

BISHOPS.

To T. W. WHITE, Esq.

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

DEAR SIR,—I recommend the following extract from a medical journal to the especial and attentive perusal of your fair readers. The subject of which it treats has for some time awakened the anxious curiosity of all who feel an interest in the health, and—what a woman is said to relinquish with the greatest reluctance—in the personal beauty of our females. If the hints and suggestions of this medical writer should prevail on these delicate creatures to adopt some means for the removal of the unseemly incumbrance to which he refers, I shall be amply repaid for the labor of transcription.

From the Medical Repository, published in the City of

A singular malady, which has recently made its appearance among the ladies, has excited much speculation in the medical world. As the victims of this complaint obstinately reject all advice, and delicacy forbids a close and accurate examination of the parts affected, we have been compelled to resort to conjecture, and to adopt such conclusions as external appearances would seem to indicate.

Judging by this imperfect mode of observation, we suppose that an enormous tumor, of the wart or wen species, has been produced by the operation of some unknown cause over the lower region of the spine. That it is a callous excrescence, may be inferred from the absence of all pain and inflammation, which could scarcely exist to any great extent without affecting seriously the general health ; and it is a remarkable feature in this disease, that the fair sufferers seem to be utterly insensible to the danger of their situation, and indulge, without restraint, in their usual amusements. We have had no means of ascertaining the exact superficial extent of this tumor ; but its apparent magnitude varies in different persons, and frequently fluctuates in the same individual. Neither have we been able to determine its consistency, or whether the cyst, which contains it, is connected with the body by a narrow neck ; or whether it adheres to the surface through the whole extent of its apparent elongation. In shape, it resembles a cylinder stretching horizontally across the back, with its truncated extremities protruding somewhat on each side beyond the circumference of the waist.

This uncommon affection, like the goitre, is confined to the softer sex; and as, upon its first advent in this country, it raged principally in the cities, its origin was hastily ascribed to some floating miasm in the local atmosphere, or to the habits of diet and exercise peculiar to a crowded population. But before the truth of this hypothesis could be tested by experiment and observation, the hypothesis itself was completely exploded by the fact, that the malady had spread with unexampled rapidity into the most secluded districts of the country. Indeed, some of the most gigantic specimens of this portentous excrescence which we have ever encountered, were found in very retired situations; yet as the disease in the same vicinities was by no means universally diffused, the cases in question were probably sporadic.

Various conjectures have been hazarded as to the efficient cause of this phenomenon; but none have been sustained by a sufficient induction of physiological facts to command the assent of the faculty. It is scarcely necessary to notice the supposition, that it is an unnatural enlargement of the spleen, since it is evidently a superficial formation, and can have no connexion with the vital cavity. Some have imagined, that the muscles of the body, driven from their natural position by the excessive pressure of the corset, have swelled out immediately below the line of that stricture into unusual magnitude, and thus gave rise to this protuberance; but if this were so, the enlargement would be commensurate with the cause, and therefore would encircle the whole body. Others maintain, that the unnatural action of the dorsal muscles in the effort to produce that curvature of the spine, miscalled the Grecian bend, might have occasioned a partial dislocation of that main pillar of the human system, and that the morbid action, thus generated, terminated in the formation of this enormous fungus; but it were more rational to conclude, that this fashionable bead is an effect rather than a cause, and is assumed as a counterpoise to the preponderating weight of this unseemly hump, which would otherwise throw the line of gravity without the base, and thus destroy the equilibrium of the body. The most plausible hypothesis yet proposed as a solution of the difficulty is, that the tumor in question is analogous to the elephantiasis of the West-Indias, and is the work of some venomous insect burrowing beneath the cuticle in the region of the loins. If this be so, the cure may be both delicate and difficult; but the image of the soft and tender skin of a beautiful woman perforated, like some moth-eaten parchment, is so distasteful to our imaginations, that we must be permitted to suspend our opinion on the subject, till some stronger proofs be adduced. And, indeed, to suppose that these amiable and innocent creatures could, from any cause, be so cruelly backbitten, we must regard, mangre all the conclusions of science, as a most violent presumption.

The medical world has been much divided, as usual, on the question, whether this novel disease be epidemic or contagious. A vast amount of learning and ingenuity has been expended in the controversy, without throwing much light on the subject of debate; it has left the respective disputants more wedded than ever to their own opinions. The arguments are so equally balanced, that both parties may probably lay claim to some share of the truth. If this tumor be insectiferous, as some have conjectured, no reason can be assigned why it may not be propagated in the same way with many cutaneous diseases, which are believed to originate in similar causes.

On the other hand, the portentous rapidity with which this malady is disseminated, unparalleled in the annals of human calamity, except by the fearful progress of the cholera, must be produced by some cause of more general operation than mere contagion. But it is not our province tantas componere lites, and we shall pass on to more practical inquiries—to the peculiar symptoms and probable means of relieving a disease, which, from its application to the back, may emphatically be called a scourge.

The progress of this peculiar malady, like that of its great prototype, the Asiatic cholera, is altogether astonishing, and militates against every conclusion of analogy and experience. It has been known in a few hours to reach its utmost degree of tumefaction; and young ladies, whose sylph-like tenuity of form was the ornament and admiration of the evening entertainment, have emerged from their chambers in the morning accoutred with a pack of such prodigious dimensions, that, with little effort of imagination, they might be mistaken for gypsies on a march, bending beneath the weight of all their household goods. The morbid action indicated by this preternatural growth, would seem to demand the exhibition of the most speedy and decisive remedies. Leeching, cupping, and other topical applications might palliate, but could scarcely arrest the progress of this extraordinary swelling. The canter and the knife could alone be relied on for its effectual extirpation. The operation, however, would be hazardous; for the vitality indicated by its rapid development, betrays its connexion with the arterial system. The excision of so large a mass from the body, would, under any circumstances, be attended with a sense of exhaustion, and might seriously affect the nervous system, particularly when the unfortunate patient, from a delusive conception of the disease, is averse to the necessary measures of relief.

It is to be feared that our females will resist all efforts to disburthen them of this ungainly protuberance, since, from a strange hallucination, they suppose it to be ornamental, and to improve the natural symmetry of their figures. In Switzerland, goitre keeps goitre in countenance; and the belles of the Vallais, reconciled to this unavoidable calamity by its universal prevalence, are easily persuaded that it is a beauty rather than a defect. On the same principle our American ladies cherish, as their most graceful appendage, a hideous incumbrance, resembling for all the world a beggar's wallet in shape and appearance; for it cannot be doubted, that, if it were confined to a few individuals, it would be an object of derision or disgust. Such, indeed, is the perversity of taste produced by that tyrant custom, that they have actually dignified this deformity with the venerable name of bishop, from its imaginary resemblance, we presume, to the hump frequently superinduced on the incumbents of the episcopal office by age, infirmity and incessant toil. It was from a like depravity of perception that the courtiers of Alexander, because that celebrated conqueror was wry-necked, conceived that unnatural distortion to be the perfection of grace and elegance, and submitted to the painful effort of affecting a similar dislocation.

It is supposed, from the prevalence of goitres and idiocy in the same districts of Switzerland, that there is some inexplicable connexion between that excrescence and the brain. We are not prepared to deny the truth of this conjecture; and by parity of reasoning we think it much more probable, that the bishop, resting as it does on the spinal column, and thus communicating directly with the seat of perception, should exercise a still greater influence on the powers of the understanding. Is it altogether impossible, that the medullary substance, occupying the chambers of the cranium, should, from the power of gravitation, or an irregular circulation of the fluids, have abandoned, in a great measure, the cavity of the skull, and accumulated on the lower region of the spine, so as to form this extraordinary enlargement? We throw out this idea as a mere hypothesis, to be tested by future investigation. Certain it is, that the subjects of this strange disease are characterised by a levity and volatility, which increase in a ratio with the growth of the dorsal tumefaction. If this bump had made its appearance on the cranium, phrenology would have furnished a ready explanation of the phenomenon; but unluckily the disciples of that useful science have not extended their inquiries to the mental qualities indicated by the irregularities of the spine.

The ramifications of this swelling seem to be spreading horizontally, and it is apprehended, that it may ultimately encircle the slender waists of the ladies with a continuous ridge, which no illusion of the imagination can transform into the cestus of Venus, or the girdle of Florimel. Not to speak of the unpleasant surmises to which such an unseemly protuberance must give rise, the most serious physical derangement may be anticipated from this enormous pressure on the diaphragm.

The unwillingness of the fair sufferers to submit to medical examination, renders it impossible to ascertain with precision all the symptoms of this disease; but so far as we have observed, the most prominent are, slight febrile action, nervous excitability, giddiness of the head, restlessness, excessive flightiness, and an inordinate proclivity to the intoxicating pleasures of fashionable life. These symptoms may vary in degree according to the character and constitution of the patient, but they are believed to be the usual concomitants of this singular affection. They proclaim that the nervous system is deeply implicated, and that every indulgence of an exciting nature must be pernicious. It is evident, therefore, that retirement, solitude and quiet, are essential to recovery. We should advise, as a preliminary to any course of treatment, a residence in some secluded mountain-valley, where pure air, rural occupations, romantic scenery, and an absence of the temptations and frivolities of the gay world, might gradually renovate the tone of the nervous system, and prepare the way for a radical expulsion of this hideous excrescence.

We have entered with the greater minuteness into the discussion of this subject, because the interest which we feel in the welfare of our fair countrywomen, no less than the sentiments of humanity, demand from the medical faculty the exertion of their utmost skill in the extirpation of such an alarming evil, and more especially in ridding the form of youthful beauty of so loathsome a deformity.

CAN I FORGET?

BY L. J. CIST.

"I have treasured every look,
I have garnered every tone,
Till my heart is like a book
Filled with memories alone:
And I wonder oft if thou,
In thy far and happy home,
Ever think'st of him, who now
To thy presence may not come!"

W. D. Gallagher.

Can I forget?—

The bright, the blest, the golden-winged hours,
When, hand in hand, we roved the sunny bowers
Of childhood's home; or up the mountain's side,
Or by the streamlet's gently murmuring tide,
Gathered young Spring's first flowers—the fair wild-rose
And the blue violet, sweetest flower that grows!
Nurturing the while, through each delightful hour,
Love's bud to bloom—itself a fairer flower!

Ah me! not yet
Those days can I forget!

Can I forget?—
 blissful rapture of that hour, when first ripened bud to beauteous blossom burst; in the deep feeling of my spirit moved burning lips to tell thee that I loved!
 I forget the rapture of that kiss,— seal of mutual love and happiness?
 her dear image ever leave this heart,
 as quicker throbbings, thoughts of her thus start?
 Ah, no!—not yet,
 Sweet love, can I forget!

"LE MEME VASE."

young Sciote, who had returned to his native Isle, for first time after the Turkish invasion, entered his father's way, and found the dwelling of his childhood a deso-ruin. He wandered to the garden and strayed through orange and lemon groves in silence, until passing a large one, in which a beautiful plant was wildly growing, he mur-ed indistinctly, "le même vase."

Vide Stephens' Travels in Greece, &c.

The same white vase—the same rich plant
 I tended with such care,
 That I might gather from it buds
 To twine my sister's hair;
 How oft, with flowery coronal,
 I've decked her sunny brow!
 Alas! alas! she needeth not
 A fragrant chaplet now.

The same white vase!—the favorite spot
 She loved to call her own;
 Here in the moonlight she would sit,
 And list the billow's moan;
 And mingle in the symphony
 Her lute's most gentle strain,
 With sweet, aerial warblings—such
 I will not hear again.

The same, round which our evening hours
 Were passed in mirth and glee,
 In dancing to the soft guitar,
 Beneath this olive tree—
 Or, weaving from the dew-bright flowers
 A wreath for one fair head,
 Whose music-laughter now is hushed—
 Who dwells among the dead!

The same, round which my brother play'd,
 A guileless-hearted boy,
 And dreamed away his brief, bright hours
 Of happiness and joy.
 I thank thee, Heaven! that thou didst take
 That gentle spirit back,
 Ere sorrow's cloud had cast its shade
 Across his sunbeam track!

The same old vase my father loved—
 Where oft he lingered nigh,
 To hear the Egean humming low
 The sun-set's lullaby:
 Now, tangled rose and jasmine flower
 The marble seat o'erspread,
 And ivy vines creep wildly up,
 And bow the citron's head.

Among the lime-tree's 'silvery green'
 Entwines the cypress bough,
 And myrtle leaves are waving here,
 In strange confusion now—

Untasted hangs the clustering fruit
 From many an orange tree;
 And flowers stray wild, without a hand
 To check their luxury.

Oh! what a link in memory's chain
 Is this vine-cover'd vase;—
 It brings before me all I lov'd
 In brighter, earlier days—
 And then the anguish'd thought, that they,
 My cherish'd ones, have fled,
 And thou, my vase! the dearest link
 To bind me to the dead!

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

FAMILY LIBRARY, Nos. 136 and 137. Scandinavia, ancient and modern; being a history of Denmark, Sweden and Norway, with illustrations of their natural history. By Andrew Crichton, L.L.D., author of the History of Arabia, etc.; and Henry Wheaton, L.L.D., author of the History of the Northmen, etc., and lately American Charge d'Affaires at Copenhagen. With a map and twelve engravings. In two volumes. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1841.

The object of the Family Library is the formation of a cheap and useful library. The Messrs. Harpers have been, and still are, pushing on the scheme with great enterprise and astonishing success. In the 'warrior ages,' the Scandinavians figured more largely than any other people of the North;—they extended their excursions over sea and land—ravaged, and then seized the Island of Great Britain—and obtained for their Sovereigns the patronymic of 'Sea Kings' of the North. They were a race of daring freebooters, who carried their conquests from the icy shores of Lapland to the sunny clime of Africa. To such a people are to be traced our remote ancestry, and the germ of many of our political institutions; and the Messrs. Harpers have judiciously incorporated their history into the Family Library. Messrs. Crichton and Wheaton are well known to the reading public as ripe and accomplished scholars. They have dipped freely into Runic literature and antiquities. Their well-earned reputation is fully sustained in the present volumes.

FAMILY LIBRARY, No. 138. Democracy. By George Sydney Camp. New-York: Harpers & Brothers; 1841.

In these days of 'cat-o'-nine' and other long tail and painful flourishes on the backs of books and sailors, it is refreshing to behold the democratic simplicity with which Mr. Camp ushers forth his little volume—DEMOCRACY. Verily it is a pattern for brevity, by which windy authors may improve their long-tailed title pages. Mr. Camp's undertaking is a sublime one, being an attempt to demonstrate the fitness of a republican government for man every where in political being with his fellow-man. The author writes well, and has produced an agreeable and an entertaining little volume. He soars above party, and treats of the democracy of all parties,—of democracy in its widest sense. He aims at a true exposition of popular rights, and at reducing the principles upon which they are founded to a philosophical system, with the view of founding a true theory on which democracy may rest. Unfortunately for him, his science itself rests too much upon opinion; and however great his learning, and profound his arguments, he has not the basis of an exact science upon which to raise his superstructure. Two and two make four, is a mathematical truth which all will admit; but by what means the greatest good may be produced to the greatest number, and whether this or that political dogma be consistent with democratic doctrines, are matters of opinion, and therefore of dispute. In this free-thinking age, there is no one who may speak ex cathedra in political science; nevertheless Mr. Camp has given the public a book which may be read with pleasure and profit.

THE FAMILY LIBRARY, No. 139. History of Michigan from its earliest colonization to the present. By James H. Lanman. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1841.

Another work from this prolific press! This is an abridgement of a history by the same author, prepared under a law of the State. And as pleasantly as Mr. Lanman writes, we could have wished his volume for the Family Library had been still more abridged. A commercial acquaintance once wrote six or eight pages of fool's-cap, advising with his partner in Liverpool as to the shipment of a cargo of salt. "Salt won't do," was the laconic reply. And we would recommend to the Messrs. Harpers to impress upon their writers of State Histories the importance of some little attention to the salty style of the Liverpool merchant. We have less fault though to find with Mr. Lanman's History of Michigan, or Mitchi-sawgyegan as its Indian name runs, than we have, or than we expressed in a former No., against Dwight's History of Connecticut. The Catholic church planted her missionary stations in Michigan upwards of two centuries ago. There are many interesting incidents connected with the early history of this new State, and her historian makes the most of them. It is a well written and an agreeable little volume.

THE AMERICAN ALMANAC AND REPOSITORY OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE for the year 1842. Boston: published by David H. Williams.

This is one of the most valuable publications any where to be found. It comprises upwards of 300 pages 12mo. of the most important statistical information, concerning the General and State Governments—exports and imports—agriculture and manufactures—civil and military establishments, etc. As a book of reference it is useful at all times, and to men of every pursuit in life. The present volume is particularly valuable on account of the statistics relating to the 'sixth census' of the United States; by which a greater amount of useful information has been collected than by any other. The work is to be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. Randolph & Co.

A Tribute to the Memory of the Rev. George G. Cookman. A Poem, delivered at the Alexandria Lyceum, by Daniel Bryan: 1841.

This is a neat pamphlet of sixteen pages, published for the benefit of Mrs. Cookman, whose husband was among the passengers of the ill-fated President. The sale, we are happy to learn, has been very large; and the poem especially, as every thing from the pen of Mr. Bryan does, has met with great favor. It possesses decided merit.

The Maryland Medical and Surgical Journal and Official Organ of the Medical Department of the Army and Navy of the United States. Baltimore: John Murphy; 1841.

The second No. of the second volume of this journal lies on our table. It contains a list of chemical tests and agents, that is worth to the practical man many times the price of subscription. The present No. is a capital one. It contains several valuable papers: Among them we would notice especially the Memoir of Sir Astley Cooper, and the conclusion of a prize essay on 'Cutaneous and Mucous Exhalation.' No physician can keep pace with the improvements and discoveries that are daily being made in his art, without the assistance of medico-periodical literature. The most valuable discoveries in medicine are first announced to the world, usually in the medical journals. And any physician may, with profit, add the one now before us, to his list of periodicals. The price is $2 50, in advance.

POPULAR LECTURES ON ETHICS OR MORAL OBLIGATIONS, for the use of Schools. By Margaret Mercer. Petersburg: Edmund & Julian C. Ruffin.

The schoolmaster is indeed abroad in the land; the spirit of intellectual improvement is rife; and the cause of popular education is advancing. Some of the first talents of the country are enlisted under its banners. Miss Mercer is among them. She has performed well her part; and she performed a good work, when she addressed her little volume to the affections of the young, and cast it in the common school treasury. It is particularly suitable for young ladies and girls, though it may be perused with profit by the youth of either sex. The lectures of which it is comprised abound in practical good sense, and sound doctrines and instructions, both moral and religious. Miss Mercer is a devout Christian; and she has 'let her light so shine,' in the tone of earnest affection which she has imparted to these admirable essays. In setting forth so much that is good and excellent, it is to be regretted that our authoress did not pay as much attention to manner as to matter; for it is a pity that grammatical errors should be suffered to creep in, and mar, as they not unfrequently do, the beauty of her discourse. We have opened the book at random, and stumbled upon such blunders as these: "Economy is such a just restraint of one's inclinations, and such a regulation of their expenditures, as will turn their means to the best account:" p. 179. "Often the sight or the hearing perish:" p. 58.

This book is written for the instruction of the young, and for the use of schools; therefore we would hold the writer rigidly within the rules of grammar. The frequent use which she makes of as, as a pronoun, grates upon the ear; to say the least of it, it is an inelegance of style which should not be tolerated, more especially in such books as this. The 'as will' in the first quotation is a case in point—and like cases abound. Such sentences ought to be recast. Expressed thus, the one above would have been faultless: "Economy is that just restraint of one's inclinations, and that regulation of one's expenditures, which will turn one's means," etc. But notwithstanding such faults, the book is sensibly written. It may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. Randolph & Co.

THE POEMS OF JOHN G. C. BRAINARD. A new and authentic collection, with an original memoir of his life—Hartford: Edward Hopkins; 1842.

Brainard may justly be considered one of the most interesting of American poets. His personal popularity, the mingled playfulness and melancholy of his effusions, the patriotic tone, and the early death of the promising minstrel,—all tend to hallow and endear his memory. It is several years since the volume of his pieces, issued in his life-time, has been out of print. The edition published with Mr. Whittier's memoir, after the poet's decease, was very limited, and a large portion of it was destroyed by fire. It was also quite incorrect, and was shabbily executed. There was then, it seems, ample reason for the appearance of the present volume. We have examined it with care—and can assure our readers that the casket is, in every respect, worthy of the jewels it enshrines. For this beautiful volume, the public are indebted to the ardent interest with which the publisher cherishes the memory of Brainard. He has long wished to see something like justice done to the poet; and to this end, has labored to bring together a perfectly authentic and correct edition of his writings. This he has at length succeeded in doing; and the lovers of American poetry have now another handsome and charm-

g volume, to place beside those of Bryant and Percival, Longfellow and Drake. We have refreshed our memories with Brainard's verses; and we experienced no little gratification in so doing. There is a simplicity, a tenderness and a truth about his poetry, which explain the warm attachment he ever inspired. Many of his descriptions are remarkably American; his themes are generally national, and founded on personal experience. Sometimes he is quaint and playful; sometimes, graphic and earnest; and at infrequently, touching and pathetic. His muse is genuine, not tricked out for parade, but fresh with the hues of his own soul. Now and then there is a touch which indicates to what a height time and larger experience might have led him. For instance, in his lines on the Connecticut river, he says

The promontories love thee—and for this
Turn their rough cheeks and stay thee for a kiss.

When the fresh morning wakes him from his dream,
And daylight smiles on rock and slope and stream,
Are not glossy curls and sunny eyes,
As brightly lit and bluer than thy skies;
Voices as gentle as the echoed call,
And sweeter than the softened waterfall
That smiles and dimples in its whispering spray,
Leaping in sportive innocence away:—
And lovely forms as graceful and as gay
As wild-brier budding in an April day;
How like the leaves—the fragrant leaves it bears,
Their sinless purposes and simple cares.

Stream of my sleeping Fathers! when the sound
Of coming war echoed thy hills around,
How did thy sons start forth from every glade,
Snatching the musket where they left the spade!
How did their mothers urge them to the fight,
Their sisters tell them to defend the right!
How bravely did they stand, how nobly fall,
The earth their coffin, and the turf their pall!

And again, in that sad but sweet lyric "To the Dead:"

How many now are dead to me
That live to others yet!
How many are alive to me
Who crumble in their graves, nor see
That sick'ning, sinking look which we Till dead can ne'er forget.

In speaking of that "silent, moonlight march to Bunker Hill," he says finely of that noble band—that they went forth with a

"Spartan step, without their flutes."

But we lack space to enumerate beauties. The poems entitled "The Fall of Niagara," "Epithalamium," "Maniac's Song," "The Sea Gull," "Indian Summer," "Eastern End of Long-Island" and many other gems, cannot but command the interest of the discerning reader, and awaken a feeling of sympathy and admiration for the memory of Brainard.

SPEECH FOR THE DEFENDANT, IN THE PROSECUTION OF
THE QUEEN v. MOXON, for the publication of Shelley's Works. Delivered in the Court of the Queen's Bench, June 23, 1841, and revised, by T. N. Talfourd, Sergeant-at-Law. London: Edward Moxon, Dover-Street; 1841.

We are surprised that some enterprising publisher, or the sagacious editors of the large weekly papers, have not reprinted this beautiful production of the author of "ION." We are induced to call the attention of our readers to the speech, partly from the intrinsic value of its arguments and the rhetorical elegance of its style, and partly because of the coincidence between the views advanced by Mr. Talfourd and those of one of our correspondents, published in a number of the Messenger a year before the delivery of this address. Our space will not allow us to present a synopsis of the reasoning contained in this able defence.

"The book presents the entire intellectual history—true and faithful, because traced in the series of those works which were its events, of one of the most extraordinary persons ever gifted and doomed to illustrate the nobleness, the grandeur, the imperfections, and the progress of human genius—whom it pleased God to take from this world while the process of harmonising his stupendous powers was yet incomplete, but not before it had indicated its beneficent workings."

"Not only are they" (Shelley's works) "incapable of awakening any chords of evil in the soul, but they are ineffectual even to present to it an intelligible heresy."

"Are they" (the objectionable passages) "more than a tome of chaotic thought not yet subsided into harmony,—over which the Spirit of Love has not yet brooded, so as to make them pregnant with life and beauty and joy?"

"When it is found that this poem, (Queen Mab,) thus containing the doctrine of immortality, is presented with the distinct statement that Shelley himself in maturer life departed from its offensive dogmas—when it is accompanied by his own letter, in which he expresses his wish for its suppression—when, therefore, it is not given even as containing his deliberate assertions, but only as a feature in the development of his intellectual character—surely all sting is taken out of the rash and uncertain passages. Is it not antidote enough for the poison of a pretended atheism, that the poet who is supposed to deny Deity, finds Deity in all things?"

"What, indeed, does the publisher of Shelley's works virtually say, when he thus presents to his readers this record of the poet's life and death? He says—Behold! Here is a spectacle which angels might admire and weep over. Here is a poet of fancy the most ethereal—feelings the most devout—charity the most Christian—enthralled by opinions the most cold, hollow and debasing. Here is a youth, endowed with that sensibility to the beautiful and the grand, which peoples his minutes with the perceptions of years—who, with a spirit of self-sacrifice which the eldest Christianity might exult in, if found in one of its martyrs, is ready to lay down that intellectual being, to be lost in loss itself—if by annihilation he could multiply the enjoyments and hasten the progress of his species; and yet, with strange wilfulness, rejecting that religion to which in essence he is imperishably allied. Trace the inspired yet erring youth, poem after poem, month after month, year after year—how shall you see the icy fetters which encircle his genius gradually dissolve; the wreaths of mist ascend from his path; and the distance spread out before him peopled with human affections, and skirted by angel's wings. And thus he proceeds, with light shining 'more and more, unto the perfect day,' which he was not permitted to realize in this world."

"Talk of proofs of Divine existence in the wonders of the material universe—there is nothing in any, nor in all, compared to the proof which this indicted volume contains."

"Shelley fancies himself irreligious, and every where falters or trembles into piety."

"THE NEW WORLD." This literary journal, of which we do not speak too highly when we call it the best in the United States, has been established but a little more than two years, and yet it has reached a circulation of which we cannot find a parallel in the history of periodical literature. Twenty-Four Thousand copies, weekly, is certainly a magnificent number. Supposing that two thousand are given away to contemporaries, or kept on file for new subscribers, and computing that each copy has five readers, (rather beneath than above the fact,) "The New World" can boast

One Hundred and Ten Thousand readers! What a vehicle for the dissemination of instruction, entertainment and information! How powerful an engine with which to direct public opinion! The criticisms of so widely-disseminated a journal would be extremely effective, even were they not characterized by talent, tact and discrimination. As they are thus characterized, it is not perhaps too much to say that it lies within the power of the Editor to make or mar the fortune of any new work. That Editor is our true friend and valued correspondent, PARK BENJAMIN. His name has been long a terror to evil-doers in literature; he has commented with a caustic, but, as we believe, a just severity, and it is to be regretted that there are not more critics like him in our country. Their strictures could not fail to be productive of real benefit. Mr. Benjamin, however, is, in spite of what his enemies say, much more inclined to leniency than to harshness. As has already been observed concerning him, "his attacks are directed against the powerful, never against the powerless." When a work possesses real merits, no one more freely or generously points them out. We believe him to be utterly destitute of envy, for he is most liberal in his praises of those, whose rank in authorship is similar to his own. Of his genius as a poet, it is not requisite for us to speak; since the readers of the Messenger have had ample opportunity to judge for themselves.

The New World, under Mr. Benjamin's guardianship, has acquired a wide and well-won reputation. Besides many able articles on literary and kindred topics, it has contained many elevated and able political dissertations, written in a lofty spirit of candor and truth. Its independence has been strictly preserved; and, although it has sometimes been accused of leaning alternately to Whigism and to Democracy, it is not amenable to any serious charge of partizanship.

To the general reader, fond of light, popular and elegant writing, The New World has undoubtedly presented its greatest attraction, in having published with wonderful celerity the newest productions of Dickens, Bulwer, Knowles, Moore, and other favorite British novelists, poets and dramatists. We do not marvel at this; for the great mass of reading presented in this single newspaper, for the sum of three dollars a year, could not be procured in its original shape, for three hundred.

We learn from a recently published prospectus, that the new volume of the Quarto Edition (by far the best) commences at this time. It is our sincere advice to our friends that they subscribe without delay. They will find the paper all that we have described—and more; for it now occurs to us to mention, that, to other reasons for taking The New World, may be added that of its having a singularly excellent corps of Foreign Correspondents. Three gentlemen, of distinction and ability, who are now abroad, are, we are told, permanently engaged to contribute to its ample pages. Our readers cannot fail to recollect Brantz Mayer, of Baltimore—an author of exquisite wit and fancy, whose talents have received the finest polish of cultivation. Mr. Mayer is at present living in the city of Mexico, as United States Secretary of Legation. He will send frequent letters to Mr. Benjamin, descriptive of events as they transpire, (now uncommonly interesting in consequence of the movements of Santa Anna,) as well as of the country—its monuments, and all other objects of curiosity. Drawings of the latter are to be made by Mr. Mayer, which will be engraved similarly, we presume, to those in Stephens's great work on Central America, and be published in "The New World."

The names of the other permanent correspondents are Donald MacLeod, Esq., a native Virginian, attached to the American Embassy in London, and Francis J. Grund, U. S. Consul at Bremen. By these eminent writers all that is interesting from Great Britain and continental Europe will be regularly transmitted.

Although this notice is somewhat extended, we could say many more things in favor of our favorite weekly periodical; but we surely have said enough to convey its just estimation to our readers.

MOTHERWELL'S POEMS. William D. Ticknor of Boston, has just published a very handsome edition of Motherwell's Poems. The volume corresponds in size and appearance with the "Rejected Addresses" and "Confessions of an Opium Eater," issued by the same house. Motherwell was a young Scotchman of great promise, who died at an early age, soon after giving to the world this memento of his mind and feelings. He was a student of Norse poetry—and in the volume before us, are several specimens of that wild, heroic song. One or two of his Scottish effusions are tinged with the pathetic melody that has so widely endeared the muse of Burns. There is a simplicity and truth of sentiment abounding in this little work, which cannot fail to win for it the favorable regard of all readers of poetic taste.

CHRISTOPHER NORTH. Cary & Hart, of Philadelphia, have just issued, in three neat duodecimo volumes, a selection from the fugitive writings of John Wilson. This admirable author is universally known as the able Editor of Blackwood's Magazine, which he has conducted with marvellous spirit, for many years, under the name of Christopher North. His fine critical taste, warm literary sympathy, and hearty freedom of style and feeling, have rendered him a great favorite in the republic of letters. The enterprising firm, to whom we are indebted for these volumes, could not have presented to the public a more desirable collection of Miscellanies. They embrace sketches of natural scenery, domestic incident, poetical criticism; every variety, in short, of intellectual entertainment and instruction.

SKETCHES FROM A STUDENT'S WINDOW. Such is the title of a splendid duodecimo volume published by W. D. Ticknor of Boston. It is a select compendium of the belle-lettres productions of S. G. Goodrich, Esq. In a recent number of the Messenger, we treated at length of this gentleman's claims as a writer for the young. His present work will convince the most fastidious that he understands not only how to "teach the young idea how to shoot," but also the process, both in verse and prose, to charm and cheer those of adult years and fastidious taste.

We have not had time to finish the perusal of this interesting production of one of our fair countrywomen,—but we hope to present something like an extended sketch of it in our next. In the mean time, we know enough to recommend it warmly to our readers. We understand the profits are to be applied to the excellent purpose of erecting a House of Divine Worship.

WILD WESTERN SCENES: A Narrative of Adventures in the Wilderness, Forty Years Ago. No. I. By J. B. Jones. N. York: S. Colman. Baltimore: N. Hickman.

This is a neat pamphlet of forty-four pages, containing some very graphic and amusing sketches of hunting adventures, conflicts with the savages, &c. Daniel Boone, the American pioneer, figures to advantage in this work, and if it be carried on with the spirit in which it is conceived, we doubt not it will be very successful. The author is favorably known as the recent Editor of the Baltimore Saturday Visiter, and the present Editor of the Madisonian.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—THOMAS W. WHITE, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. VIII.

RICHMOND, FEBRUARY, 1842.

NO. 2.

WE MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

We might have been ! how oft the thought
In hours of weakness, hovers o'er us :
We might have been ! words deeply fraught
With that which was, not is, before us.
It comes when care, or wo, or blight,
Has chased afar each ray of gladness,
The Borealis of our night,
Too cold to cheat us of our sadness.

We might have been ! ah, vainly we
Would lift the veil that doth surround us,
And read that other destiny,
Which might have been, not is, around us.
But oh, when Love and Truth are ours,
Unmixed with aught of Earth's cold leaven,
We ask not in these blissful hours,
What might have been !—what is, is Heaven.

POLITICAL AND INTELLECTUAL POWER.

I propose in the following pages, Mr. White, to submit a few reflections on the nature, importance and comparative Influence of Political and Intellectual Power, upon human destiny. Within the designation of Political Power, I include the ordinary functions of government, as well in a state of peace as of war—as well in relation to its own citizens or subjects as in reference to foreign nations. By Intellectual Power, I mean the influence which mind exercises upon society, through the medium of its uttered thoughts, unaided by the application of external force, and unconfirmed by the sanctions of legal authority.

The subject first in order, then, is Political Power. This power, though the most coveted by ambitious minds ; though its exercise, in some shape, is essential to the existence of society ; though its transactions, in all ages, have formed the staple of the world's history, is not, perhaps, entitled to the rank which it holds in the estimation of mankind. It is true, that the questions with which it has to deal are of great magnitude and importance ; that they relate to Peace and War ; that they momentously affect the welfare and prosperity of nations ; that they connect themselves with legislation, with the administration of justice, with the execution of the laws, and with the entire relations of a state, both foreign and domestic.

Still, notwithstanding these claims to consideration, it must be conceded that its benefits are more properly negative than positive—its agencies rather conservative than creative. It neither adds to the fertility of the soil, nor invents, nor furnishes the implements of its cultivation. Its proper function, rather, is to protect the laborer from molestation, and to secure to labor its appropriate avails—to fence around the rights of persons and of things, with punitive and prohibitory safeguards. It makes no discoveries in the arts and sciences ; not in those branches of them which are susceptible of application to practical purposes—to improvements in education, in agricultural pursuits, in the power and speed of mechanism however applied : not in those agencies, even, which are part and parcel of itself—which are exerted in the structure and navigation of ships, in the erection and demolition of fortresses, and in the destruction of human life. Fond, as it ever has been, of applying to these latter purposes the inventions of others, it has rarely, if ever, been entitled to the merit of their discovery. If it stimulate Industry and Enterprise, it is not so much by bounties and rewards, as by protecting them in their respective pursuits, and by securing to them the peaceful possession and enjoyment of their acquisitions. It may, indeed, approximate distant points, by removing physical obstructions, and by opening new channels of communication, or enlarging old ones ; but the means and objects of transportation must be furnished by individual or incorporated enterprise.

Its attempts, heretofore, to organize the labor of a country, have either terminated in abortion, or occasioned social inequalities, which produce, in the elevation and enrichment of the few, no adequate compensation for the depression and impoverishment of the many. It has ever been more ingenious in imposing and collecting its own arbitrary assessments upon property, than it has been felicitous in devising measures for its accumulation. Its authority has been more frequently exerted in extending its own privileges, enlarging its own prerogatives, multiplying the sources of its own enjoyments, than in guarding the rights, or redressing the wrongs, or augmenting the privileges of the people.

Government, indeed, has almost universally set itself in opposition to the reform of existing institutions. It is never in advance of the age ; most commonly behind it. It struggles against the spirit of improvement, represses it when it can, and yields to it only when it must. In its view, all change, save that which favors itself, is an innovation on its rights—an unsettling of the established order of things—an imputation on the wisdom of the Past—a mildew upon the prospects of the Future. It venerates "the hoary head of inveterate abuse," because it is hoary. Its ease, its indolent repose, its luxurious enjoyments, are too precious to be broken in upon by the senseless clamor of outraged millions. Its privilege to oppress, its exemption from restraint, its immunity from legal penalties, its independence of all extraneous control,—these are all too sacred to be yielded to the unreasonable demands of an insolent and encroaching rabble.

Political power, whether acquired by usurpation, founded on legitimacy, or, I had almost said, conferred by suffrage, never willingly surrenders any portion of its vested rights. If it ever innovate on precedent, or wander from the beaten paths of prescription, it is to gather to itself, not to scatter abroad among the people—it is to construct new defences against popular inroads, not to pull down those already erected. All the concessions to human rights, all the improvements in human institutions, have been reluctantly yielded by its fears, or forcibly wrung from its grasp, by the red hand of insurrection.

Such, and in so many important regards, being the inadequacy of government to the work of social advancement, and such its disposition not only to hold fast that which it already possesses, but to covet that which it does not possess, let us enquire if it derive any additional claims to respect from the nature and quality of the means which it employs in maintaining its authority.

Of these, the first in importance and usefulness is undoubtedly to be found in a well-regulated judiciary. Indeed, constituted as man is, without such an institution, society could not exist. Laws are so all-embracing in their range, come in contact with so many interests and passions, interweave themselves so inseparably with the very frame-work of society, that without some such tribunal of resort, no security for the rights of persons or of things could exist. This department acquires a peculiar claim to respect, from the circumstance that its power is chiefly moral; that its authority is founded on public opinion, on voluntary observance, on traditional respect, on an all-pervading sense of the beauty and utility of order and uniformity in the administration of the laws. The idea of Justice, calm, sedate, passionless, throned on her judgment-seat, deciding controversies, maintaining right, redressing wrong, denouncing punishment against guilt, encircling innocence in her protecting embrace; and all this without pomp, without parade, without arms or armies, but by the mere force of moral suasion, presents a spectacle to the imagination at once imposing and sublime. It is a faint type, a dim shadowing forth, of that other tribunal, inconceivably more imposing and more sublime, whose seat is in the Heavens. But even the robes of Justice have been soiled, her temples profaned, her altars desecrated, by the contaminating touch of Political Power. Her ministers have not always been proof against the seductive influences of authority—its tempting lures of advancement—its minatory denunciations against non-conformity to its arbitrary will. The scales of Justice are balanced, only in proportion as those who hold them, are independent of political power; it is only when the tenure of the judge to office is based on the stable foundations of constitutional law, that he vindicates his claim to the exalted rank which attaches to the wise, upright and impartial administrators of the law.

Of those other means employed by government in effecting its designs, the purse is not the least efficient. Money constitutes the sinews of Power, whether exerted in peace or in war. It defrays the expenses of the civil list; raises and supports armies; equips and mans navies. These being all legitimate objects of expenditure, at least when applied to the attainment of rightful ends, I do not propose to do more than merely advert to them. My object is rather to enlarge upon the application of money to the purposes of corruption.

Avarice, or the love of wealth for itself alone, for the pleasure which it imparts to the senses of sight and feeling, for the gratification which the mere consciousness of possession affords, ranks, by universal consent, among the most ignoble passions of our nature. Its predominance, to that degree which causes the slave of its influence to regard acquisition as the end, rather than the means of existence, is comparatively of rare occurrence. It exists, however, almost universally in that modified form in which money is coveted for the uses to which it is applicable; for the number and variety of other passions, importunate in their exactions, to which it is subsidiary. As the medium of exchange, as the representative of value, it is held in constant requisition by all classes of society; and, to the extent that the desire of its possession expends itself in overt acts of honest industry, and is restrained within the limits of moderation, so far from being obnoxious to censure, it is worthy of all commendation. It ministers but too frequently, however, to the vices of our nature, as well as to those qualities, negative in their character, which, from the extremes to which they are carried, become aggravated vices. It pampers pride; caters to appetent palates; endues vanity in peacock plumes; furnishes the means and appliances of luxury; gilds the livery and caparisons the steeds of ostentation; pushes liberality to the verge of profusion, and incites profusion to acts of fraud and of extortion, for the means of continuing its onward career.

Pandering to so many appetites and passions, and ministering, besides, to a great diversity of interests dear to the human heart, our wonder lessens, that men, like the Syracusan tyrant in another pursuit, should be desirous of discovering royal roads to wealth. It is this desire, which, in all ages, has prompted the impostures of the fortune-teller, and the marvellous absurdities of the mountebank; which has inspired the dreams of the alchemist in his search after the philosopher's stone; which has incited the astrologer to impose, on credulity and ambition, the pleasing, if not sublime fallacy, that human destiny is controlled and foreshadowed by the stars! It is the same inordinate passion, that packs the cards and loads the dice of the gambler. It is this hungry, greedy passion, that sharpens the ingenuity of the thief and the dagger of the assassin; that points the pistol of the more manly, if not less vicious, robber; that lights the torch of the midnight incendiary.

This love of money, either for itself or for its uses, is one of those weaknesses in human nature, of which government, in the prosecution of its designs, readily and dexterously avails itself. It opens a way into beleaguered fortresses, which have proved impervious to the most potent engines known to the science of attack. It subsidizes nations; cements and dissolves alliances; and binds discomfited ambition "in the shattered links of the world's broken chain." As a domestic appliance, it clothes patronage with all that is dangerous and alarming in its tendencies. It keeps the office-holder spell-bound in subjection to the removing power, while it heightens the devotion and deepens the subserviency of the office-seeker. The immense amount of money annually disbursed by government, in the number of agents which it employs, the demand for labor which it creates, and the increase in the circulating medium which it produces, operates as a sedative upon the virtue and patriotism of the people among whom it is expended. The very indebtedness of government to its own subjects, by rallying around it a formidable monetary power interested in its continued existence, strengthens and consolidates the institutions by which it is upheld. In short, the purse, or something kindred in its influences, is the agent most commonly resorted to by government when mere persuasion is ineffectual, and when an appeal to the sword is inexpedient or impracticable. In all times, it has been the vulgar instrument of tyranny, in winning to its support, or silencing, the voice of affected patriotism. Its approaches are not always made openly, in its own shape, with its cloven foot exposed to view. If conscience interpose scruples, and revolts at bribery, its opposition is oftentimes stifled in the serpent folds of a lucrative office. And here let me not be understood as imputing to mankind indiscriminate venality and corruption. There have been, it is admitted, many and bright and shining exceptions. There are, and have been, men, whose patriotism money could not purchase, nor patronage seduce, nor power intimidate: who stand out, in lustrous prominence, from the dark back-ground of human depravity. They serve as exemplars for the imitation, not of their own times only, but of all posterity.

THE SWORD is another and a favorite instrument of the sovereign power of a state. Its edge is applied readily, and with alacrity, to the severance of those gordian knots in political affairs, which policy is incompetent to unbind. Nor are its uses confined to legitimate purposes—to the suppression of rebellion against lawful authority at home, or to the repulsion of wrongful invasions from abroad. It is the chosen instrument of the tyrant, in rivetting despotism more firmly on his own subjects; of the conqueror, in the execution of his designs on foreign nations. Government has been, in all ages, inordinately desirous of extending the limits of its sway. It has ever been prone to engage in wars; wars not enforced by necessity, not provoked by aggression, not waged for the restitution of a right, nor in reparation of a wrong; but wars of caprice, of vanity, of ambition; wars prompted by the gaudia certaminis, and incited by the lust of conquest, or the vain aspirations of renown.

With the military chieftain, too often, butchery is heroism; conquest glory; encroachment on the territorial possessions of another, a lawful accession to his own. The ear-piercing fife; the spirit-stirring drum; the richly-caparisoned war-horse, his neck clothed with thunder, "beautiful disdain and might and majesty" flashing from his eye, and breathing from his nostril; the plumed troop, its serried ranks "marshalled in battle's magnificently stern array;"—these are the sights and sounds which fill his soul with rapture most intense. What matters it, that hecatombs are sacrificed to the infernal moloch of his ambition? That cities are sacked and pillaged? That kingdoms are ravaged and laid waste? That carnage welters in his front; and famine and pestilence banquet in his rear, on what of life, carnage, in its hot haste to enter upon fresher fields, may have left behind? Still onward he proceeds, stalking from victory to victory; adding conquest to conquest, till perchance the habitable world is subjected to his sway. On his return from fields, misnamed of glory, he is greeted, every where, with shouts of acclamation. His path is strewn with flowers. His brows are decked with garlands. Poetry, in matchless strains, recites his deeds, and history graves them, with her stylus, on the tablets of immortality!

One might suppose that, with a world for his footstool, the military chieftain has attained the summit of his wishes; that the measure of his ambition is full; that his happiness is placed on foundations that cannot be shaken; that his title to universal empire would be vindicated, if not by the mildness of his sway, at least by the superior wisdom of his institutions. Vain supposition! fond, but false illusion! Interrogate history—invoke the shade of the mighty Alexander! Were such his feelings—such the requiting benefactions which he conferred upon a hemisphere wantonly conquered and enslaved! Or, rather, when his last enemy was overcome, did he not feel, with foreboding sadness, that his occupation was gone! Did not the conviction knock dolefully at his heart, that, thenceforth, life had no claims for him—earth no sufficing object of pursuit—humanity no foe worthy of his steel! That to him, as well as to the victim of despair, hope had no future on this side the grave! That amidst the wilderness of human beings by which he was encompassed, he stood unrivalled and unequalled in isolated grandeur; a solitary monument of ambition, blasted by the very possession of all its coveted objects of dominion upon earth!

Hence his drunken revels; his midnight orgies; his frantic outbursts of passion; his homicidal thrusts at expostulating but devoted loyalty; his tearful lamentations that other worlds, beyond this visible diurnal sphere, were not accessible to his victorious arms: all evidences of a perverted nature—manifestations of a mind diseased, which “fevers into false creation.” Had it been otherwise; had his ambition taken a right direction, he might, in the duties of the legislator, in healing the wounds which he had inflicted, in educing order out of the chaos which he had created, in new-moulding the institutions which he had overthrown, and in consolidating the fruits of the victories which he had achieved, have found occupation which would have overtaken the faculties even of Alexander the Great. He would have discovered, that it was a higher and more difficult exertion of sovereign power to create than to destroy. Or, if his ardor for contest had been unappeasable, he need not have sighed for other worlds as the theatre of its indulgence. If he had examined himself, if he had looked into his own bosom, he would have found an enemy whose conquest would have redounded more to his true fame, more to his lasting happiness, than the entire subjugation of the outward universe.

I would not, knowingly, disparage the military character. The pursuit of arms certainly requires faculties and endowments of no common order. Energy and decision; a comprehensive coup-d’œil; a large development of the perceptive organs: great powers of mathematical combination; the faculty of infusing into masses of men, one’s own spirit and enthusiasm; sagacity to anticipate the designs of the enemy, and promptitude to prevent their execution; capacity to concentrate on a given point “a complicated machinery of means, energies and arrangements;” self-possession, which no peril can discompose, and omni-percipient, which no incident of the fight can escape;—these are all high qualities, and must largely combine in the composition of an able general. The close alliance of valor, with other qualities still higher and more ennobling in their nature, is attested by the thrill of admiration which deeds of daring, particularly of successful daring, instinctively and universally produce in the human mind. I say its alliance with other and more ennobling qualities; for, it is only as the ally of justice, it is only as the auxiliary of virtue, it is only as the champion of innocence, it is only as the exponent of a magnanimous spirit, devoting itself wholly and disinterestedly to the support and maintenance of a righteous cause, that it fairly challenges the respect and admiration of mankind. But still, as has been truly said, the military commander has chiefly to deal with physical obstacles; to remove physical obstructions; to perform forced marches; to pass deep and rapid rivers; to scale Alpine elevations; to storm fortified cities; to overpower opposing armies. Thus force, it seems, is a prime weapon of the warrior: Force, in which, individually, he is surpassed by the lordly lion, the half-reasoning elephant, and other animals of the brute creation: Force, in which, collectively, assisted by all the engines which human ingenuity has devised, he cannot approximate, even remotely, the uncalculating agencies of inanimate nature. The avalanche, the tornado, the earthquake carry more swift destruction in their course than an army with banners.

“The armaments, which thunder-strike the walls
Of rock-built cities, bidding nations quake,
And monarchs tremble in their capitals,” are dissipated by a breath of the storm-spirit, and melt, like flakes of snow, in ocean’s “yeast of waves.”

But the purse and the sword are not the only agents employed by government in effecting its purposes. In its manifold transactions diplomacy performs an important part. Diplomacy! in whose code of ethics, falsehood is not only admissible, but is inculcated and refined into the consistency of a system. Diplomacy! which exonerates itself, by a species of mental casuistry, from the eternal obligations of morality: which implies in practice, if it do not avow in theory, that the moral sense should not be consulted in the administration of public affairs; that all is fair in politics; that the end justifies the means. Hence result dissimulation, perfidy, the arts of fraud and circumvention, infractions of international law, disregard of treaty stipulations, resurrections in the hour of strength of concessions made in moments of weakness, violations of faith plighted to its own citizens or subjects. Seriously to combat these unfounded pretensions on the part of Power, would be, I am persuaded, a work of supererogation. Government is, or assumes to be, the impersonation of the state. The state is but the aggregate of the individuals of which it is composed. To assume, therefore, that its members are amenable to the moral code in their individual, but not in their collective capacity, involves an absurdity as great as that would be, were we to affirm of gravitation, that it is true in relation to atoms, but that its principles are not applicable to worlds.

But the doctrine is, if possible, more demoralizing in tendency, than defective or illogical in theory. Example is contagious, not only in proportion to eminence of station, but to publicity of action. And, in reference to notoriety, no comparison will hold between the public and private acts of a statesman. A knowledge of the latter, having relation, as they do, to but few individuals or interests, cannot be extensively diffused; while the former affect, often incalculably, the destinies of nations, extend their ramifications far into the present and the future, and are bruited abroad to the utmost limits of civilization. It is to the practical application of this obnoxious principle, that we are indebted for the prevalence of injustice and oppression—of war and bloodshed—of the innumerable evils attendant upon these, with which humanity, in all ages, has been afflicted. Under its pernicious influences, earth has been converted into one great slaughter house, and man debased at once into executioner and victim.

There is an intrinsic and an eternal beauty in moral rectitude. Its laws possess the same coherence and consistency, which exist in those that regulate the material universe of God. And yet, while discord is a prime agent in human affairs, the starry worlds revolve harmoniously in their orbits, chiming the praises and vindicating the wisdom of their Almighty Architect. It is true, that those glorious orbs are inanimate; that free agency, the precious attribute and chief distinction of man, is withheld from them; that they, from necessity, conform to the original laws of their creation. But we will suppose, for example, that they are suddenly endowed with consciousness, with volition; that, availing themselves of their novel privilege, they shoot from their spheres, and range at will through the illimitable realms of ether. What confusion would not presently ensue! What jostling of planet against planet! What impinging of sun upon sun; what running of system into system! What war of elements; what wreck of matter; and what crush of worlds! Chaos would, indeed, have come again, and the plastic hand of the Almighty be required to remould them into form, to place them in their original and appropriate positions, to re-attune the broken harmony, and to strike again the lost music of the spheres! Such is the order which exists among the heavenly bodies, and such the ruin which would be produced by a departure from the essential conditions of their existence. Striking examples, but alas! to be traced reversedly, of the actual and the possible relations which exist between the states and kingdoms of the earth.

Priestcraft is another of the agencies heretofore employed by government in strengthening and consolidating its power. The belief in a future state of rewards and punishments, and in the superintending providence over human concerns of a deity or deities, whose wrath might be provoked by contumacy, and whose favor conciliated by obedience, has been co-existent with time, and co-extensive with the limits of inhabited space. The mythological absurdities superinduced upon these truths by superstition and ignorance conjoined, have been availed of, in all time, by the crafty, unprincipled and ambitious. They have affected to hold communion with the world of spirits; to interpret mysteries and omens; to deliver the oracles of the gods; to extract from the entrails of victims, the decrees of destiny; "to foresee as in vision, and to foretell as in prophecy," the fate of men and nations. They have even arrogated to themselves the stupendous prerogative of distributing rewards and punishments in the life to come. They have thus been enabled to hold the present in subjection, by the control which they assumed, and were believed to possess, over the future. The power acquired by these means, like all power surreptitiously obtained, was wielded to effect the purposes of self-aggrandizement—to gain and to confirm dominion over men. The secular arm could inflict temporal punishments only. It could circumscribe the actions, it could manacle the limbs, it could torture the body, it could sever the chords of terrestrial existence. But its power was limited to the duration of human life. "The soul, secure in her existence, could smile at the drawn dagger, and defy its point."

It was a subtle refinement of policy, then, to call in the aid of the ecclesiastical arm; to fetter the mind as well as the body; to control the will no less than the conduct; to superadd to the dread of temporal, the inconceivably more awful terrors of eternal punishment. Hence the alliance between church and state—between kingcraft and priestcraft—an alliance which, in times past, has had so important an agency in riveting the chains of despotism on mankind. And here let me not be misunderstood. Far be from me the attempt, at once vain and impious, to throw discredit on true and genuine religion—to question or disparage the benign influences of Christianity clothed in her native grace and beauty, as she is, and as she was when fresh from the hands of her divine original; her port erect, her limbs unmanacled, her motions free and unconstrained, her drapery such only as the Gospel throws around her, with the purity of Heaven in her eye, and its holy inspiration on her lips. An apology for the multifarious perversions of government from the purposes for which it was instituted, has been sought for in the nature of its functions—in the strength and importunity of the temptations to which it is exposed. These are supposed to operate with peculiar force on the minds of those who are born to dominion; who have not been disciplined in the school of adversity ; whose passions, fed by flattery, and nurtured by indulgence, are suffered to grow in rank luxuriance ; and who, from their infancy, are taught to regard themselves as the chosen and irremovable vicegerents of God upon earth.

But their effects, likewise, are clearly perceptible in representative republics. A politician, to whom power is confided by his fellow-citizens, is but too apt to become unmindful of its nature and objects. He is but too prone to forget, that it is a trust to execute, and not a property to enjoy ; that government was instituted, not that the ambition of an individual might be gratified, but that the condition of the species might be improved. As he successively attains the eminences of power, his feelings too often partake of the coldness of the circumambient regions. At each step of his ascension, the chain of sympathy which connects him with his kind, becomes lengthened and attenuated, till finally it dissolves in its own weakness. He acquires a distaste for old companionships, because they remind him of the humility of his origin, or because his pride revolts at continuing them on their primal footing of equality. He soon learns to look upon men only in the light of tools and instruments. Subserviency to his designs, and efficiency in their prosecution, are the elements of character which he chiefly regards in the selection of subordinate agents. The voice of flattery,—the more potential that it is the echo of a still small voice within,—nourishes a pernicious habit of self-exaggeration, which, while it swells the idea of his own importance, lessens, in the same proportion, his estimate of the importance of others. Thus, by degrees, he is brought to regard himself as a necessity of state ; and government, in his view, becomes a cone, whose apex affords footing for himself alone. Such is the nature—so intensely egotising are the effects of ambition operating on the minds—of the vulgar-great, who become the depositories of power.

But there is another kind of power to which the statesman should ardently aspire. Power over himself. Power over his passions. Power, if not to repress and extinguish, at least to regulate and restrain, his own personal ambition. Power to merge the feelings of the man in the philanthropy of the patriot. Power to disregard his dearest interests, to resist his most cherished inclinations, when coming in contact with the public good. Power to carry with him into high stations that community of feeling, that sense of identity of interest, with his fellow-men, which glows in the bosom of the private citizen. Power, if necessary, to sacrifice himself and all that he possesses, on the altar of country. Power, in short, to resist the corrupting tendencies of power.

He should, moreover, cultivate those feelings of enlarged benevolence which regard the human race as one great family, held together by the ties of a common origin, a common nature, and a common destiny. He should never forget the spirit of the classical precept, that he himself is man, and that therefore he cannot but be interested in whatever affects humanity. And inasmuch as a state of peace is highly conducive to the bettering of man's condition, to the prosperity of agricultural pursuits, to the cultivation of the mechanic arts, to the encouragement and extension of commerce, to the interchange and advancement of discoveries and improvements in the various branches of human knowledge, as well ornamental as profound, he should carefully establish, and inviolably maintain, relations of amity and intercourse with foreign nations.

But, while he should avoid war with all the efforts of a strenuous will, and all the preventive expedients of a wise forecast, he should be "endued with a sense and faculty for storm and turbulence," that if it did come, as, reasoning from all the analogies of the past, come it must and will, he would be prepared to meet it ; to repel it ; to hurl back its thunders to the shores of the aggressor.

Such, and for the most part, so vile, despicable and tyrannous, are the means employed by government, in the acquisition, maintenance and enlargement of its authority. And when the philanthropist recalls the wrongs which humanity has endured at its hands ; when he conjures up, in spectral array, the hecatombs of human victims remorselessly sacrificed on its unhallowed altars ; and when he dwells upon the many thousand years that this state of things hath existed ; upon the slow progress, nay, the occasional retrogression, of the principles which conduce to human regeneration ; upon the stationary condition of much the largest portion of the globe—Asia and Africa for example—on whose population immobility seems to have been indelibly impressed, each generation being the exact copy, unimproved and apparently unimprovable, of the preceding ; when he contemplates the equivocal destinies of Europe even, of whose component states and kingdoms agitation and vicissitude appear to be the ruling elements, the diversified theatres on which knowledge and ignorance, liberty and despotism, coexist and contend for mastery,—now exhibiting the brightest manifestations of human character, and now shadowing forth its most gloomy features,—his heart cannot but sicken at the retrospect, and his spirits subside into an almost hopeless despondency.

But when he turns from this picture to the improvements which the Intellect has made, is making, and will continue to make, in science, in literature, in social life, in human institutions, a brighter prospect dawns upon his vision. The influence, past, present and prospective, of the intellect on human destiny opens, indeed, a boundless field for discussion. Its performance, in a suitable manner, would require a separate consideration, and faculties more vigorous and comprehensive, not to say learning more various and profound, than any to which I can lay claim. My task would be incomplete, however, without an attempt, at least, to explore the prospect which opens on the view.

And first, I would advert to the contrast which exists between the agents employed, and the nature of the results produced, by political and intellectual power. The institutions which force establishes, force only can maintain. The deceptions, which craft imposes on credulity, are dissipated by knowledge. But the victories of mind are all peaceful—its conquests all perennial. Its weapons are those of truth and reason only. It treats man not as a mere machine, composed of flesh and bone and muscle, but as a rational being; thereby conceding to him his proper rank in the scale of intelligences. It operates on his actions by enlightening his volition. It addresses itself to his conscience; to his understanding; to all that is immortal in his nature; to all that separates him from the earth below, and all that connects him, by ties indissoluble, with Heaven above. It strikes a chord which vibrates up to the throne of the Almighty himself.

It is to the intellect that we are indebted for those inventions and discoveries in industrial pursuits, in the arts and sciences, in the frame-work and structure of social institutions, which have ministered so largely to the necessities and enjoyments of man. To its creative power are we indebted for the rudiments of written language; those simple characters, by whose magical and almost infinite combinations, thought is communicated from mind to mind, through other channels than those of speech, and is enabled to address itself to other organs than those of hearing. The volatile conceptions of the brain, which previously evaporated in expression, became thereby arrested and condensed, and were made to assume a legible and permanent form. The art of printing, a kindred invention and of kindred origin, succeeded in process of time; and by the rapidity of its operations, superseded the labors of the amanuensis, and imparted to the productions of the mind a cheapness and multiplicity co-extensive with the demands of literature. These discoveries, at once the achievements and the instruments of the intellect, constitute the fulcrum to the lever of thought, which is fast lifting the world of mind to its destined elevation; which is accelerating its onward and upward march towards the utmost attainable limits of human perfection.

Not does the intellect content itself with fashioning the robes in which to array its thoughts. It makes celestial observations, not, as was done of yore, with the vain hope of reading, in the bright eyes of those astral intelligences that live along the sky, the fate of men and nations; but for the less selfish and more enlightened purpose of learning their history—of solving the mysteries of their being—of ascertaining the laws which govern, regulate and continue them in their manifold evolutions, through the boundless regions of space. The intellect, indeed, may point to the gems which it has plucked from the starry diadem, as among the brightest and most glorious trophies of its triumph over the material universe. Before the light of these celestial observations, the superstitions which accredited the vain lore of the astrologer—which believed in the casting of nativities, and in planetary influences on human destiny—which saw the wrath of the Almighty shadowed forth, in dim eclipse, on the darkened disk of sun and moon, have all faded into the nothingness from which they were evoked. But the stars, though they may not lift the veil which conceals futurity from human view; though they may not watch with protecting providence over the vagaries of human conduct, have, yet, through the favored votaries of astronomical science, made revelations of truths far more useful and important: truths, which applied to the practical purposes of life, have occasioned important meliorations in the social condition of man.

But the intellect not only pierces the blue depths of heaven, and unfolds the mysteries of the starry world,—it penetrates the bowels of the earth; not for the purpose, merely, of extracting its mineral and metallic wealth, but of examining its different stratifications and fossil remains; of reading, in the hieroglyphic characters thereon inscribed, a true history of the earth—of the various changes which its crust has undergone—of the order and gradations of animal life which it has maintained since chaos was first dethroned from his umpirage over its promiscuous elements. In its geological researches on the surface of the earth, the intellect has been equally successful; it has made discoveries, which, if not so stupendous in their nature, are more profitable in their results, than those which it deduced from the remains of extinct animals and vegetable petrifications imbedded in the depths of the antediluvian world. The knowledge of geology, by enlightening the husbandman, tends greatly to the lightening of his labors. It instructs him in the nature and properties of soils; and, trenching somewhat on the province of a kindred science, teaches him the processes by which fertility may be reclaimed from exhaustion, and even superinduced upon original barrenness. As the minutest bone, even of an antediluvian skeleton, enabled the philosophic Cuvier to discern the species of the animal to which it appertained, so the enlightened geologist can discover in the aspect of a pebble, not only the quality of the soil to which it is indigenous, but even the secret treasures which may lie hidden in its bosom. Recent as is the date of geology as a science, its discoveries have already been of incalculable benefit, and promise still greater usefulness to mankind.

The intellect has, likewise, in a great measure, subjected the elements to its sway. It has not only exorcised the storm-spirit from his home among the thunder-crags, but compelled him to become the slave and minister of man: to electrify paralytic limbs; to restore vitality to exanimate forms; to turn the wheel of the artizan; and, with the speed of light, to convey intelligence along the electric wire. To its inventive power, likewise, are we indebted for those Dedalian wings, which, dispensing with the slow and laborious agency of oar and oarsman, have made the winds of heaven tributary to the purposes of commerce. From the same source are derived those nautical instruments which delineate the dangers of inhospitable coasts: which direct the course of the mariner across the pathless deep: by which the navigator is enabled to question the moon of his whereabouts, and to compel true responses from that otherwise fickle, but to him constant, regent of the nocturnal skies. It is to the same power that we owe the subjection to human control of that fearful monster, at once hybrid and amphibious, the hissing emanation of incongruous elements, alike powerful on land and water, which is fast consigning to desuetude the old vehicles of traffic and of travel, substituting machinery for muscle in manufacture and transportation, and bringing remotest regions almost into contact by its space-devouring energies.

To specify, in detail, the achievements of the intellect in the various departments of science, even if I had the requisite learning and ability, would be to draw too largely on your pages and your patience. I shall merely advert, in passing, to its discoveries in the various branches of medicine, by which the healing art has been so greatly improved and perfected: in Botany and Zoology, by which plants and animals, aquatic and terrene, have been named and classified, their structures delineated, their habits described, their uses and properties made known: in Chemistry, which have conduced so much to the health, comfort and convenience of man; decomposing the forms, and disembodying the essences, of things; recombining them in different proportions, and thereby producing the most pleasing, useful and often brilliant results; eliciting the latent properties of substances; analyzing earths, minerals and plants, and extracting their sanative virtues; imbuing the products of the loom with perennial dyes; illuminating the night of cities with multitudinous brilliancy; supplying an unfailing light to the miner in his subterranean labors; moulding matter into insectile forms, and almost vitalizing the novel creations; distilling from its alembic, if not the elixir of life, at least the subtle essences which preserve from corruption and decay, bodies in which life has been. A familiar instance of the practical benefits of chemistry may be drawn from the manufacture of glass; a body (to appropriate the thought and, for the most part, language of a celebrated writer), a body at once solid and transparent; which admits the light of the sun, and excludes the violence of the wind; which enables the student to contemplate nature, and the beauty to behold herself; which supplies the decays of nature, and succors old age with subsidiary sight; which extends the view of the philosopher to new ranges of existence, and charms him, at one time, with the unbounded extent of the material creation, and, at another, with the endless subordination of animal life.

In the department of the fine arts, likewise, the intellect has achieved wonders. Its plastic powers are no where more conspicuously displayed. In Music, it draws forth and appropriates the harmonies of nature, fixes and characters their volatile and evanescent properties, and associates them in those varied, new and exquisite combinations, which "take the prisoned soul, and lap it in Elysium." It moulds the lifeless, inexpressive marble, callous from solidity, and ragged with excrescences, into polished, life-like, and almost breathing forms. It guides the pencil of the painter in producing the noblest specimens of the pictorial art; in arresting and perpetuating on canvass all that is beautiful and sublime and picturesque in nature: in transmitting to posterity the likenesses of eminent men who have illustrated the annals of their age; in portraying to the gaze of bereaved survivorship, a faithful resemblance of the loved and lost; and in embodying those conceptions of inspiration, those rays of immortality, which, star-like, beam upon his soul, till, by the concentrating powers of his genius, they "are gathered to a God!" As a trophy of its achievements in architecture, I would point to the Cathedral of St. Peter at Rome, the chef-d'œuvre of the prince of architects. The beholder, deceived by its gigantic elegance, is at first betrayed into an under-estimate of its dimensions. Examining, however, its eloquent proportions, one by one, the idea of its vastness grows upon him by degrees, till at length the glory of the mighty whole, "all musical in its immensities," bursts upon his enraptured vision. He enters: its grandeur overwhelms him not; for his mind, "expanded by the genius of the spot, has grown colossal." He feels that it is a temple worthy of the Being whose service it is dedicated; that

"Majesty,

Power, glory, strength and beauty, all are aisled
In this eternal ark of worship, undefiled."

For the first time, perhaps, he fully appreciates the creative power of genius.

But, great as have been the achievements of the intellect in the fine arts, in inductive philosophy, in demonstrative science, in solving the mysteries, and interpreting the laws of the material universe, and in applying the principles thence deduced to purposes which have wrought such beneficial changes in the condition of society,—still its influences on man himself, on his moral nature, on his political destinies and prospects, have been yet more important and ennobling. In connexion with Christianity, it has given him the inappreciable power of self-control. It has enabled him to sound the depths of his own soul with the plummet of self-knowledge; to troll among the treasures there imbedded, and draw them to the surface from their most secret recesses. It has enabled him to awaken its dormant energies; to restrain its vagrant propensities; to disabuse it of its pernicious fallacies. It has endued him with power to bear, with equanimity, the vicissitudes of pain and pleasure, the alternations of joy and sorrow, to which his earthly condition is liable: to endure contumely, persecution, suffering, death itself, in a righteous cause.

The intellect has been the prime agent in elevating man from barbarism to civilization—in raising him from a condition only a little higher than the brutes, to a station but a little lower than the angels. It has enabled him to substitute mental enjoyments for sensual gratifications; the regulated labors of husbandry for the fitful and feverish excitements of the chase; the comforts of permanent habitation for the manifold privations and exposures of a wandering existence; the blessings of law and order, of regularly organized government, for the roving, plundering, homicidal life of the predatory bandit. The seminal principles of those great improvements which have taken place in political institutions have almost universally proceeded from literary men,—from men whose minds have been unremittingly devoted to the acquisition of knowledge,—who, by an earnest interrogation of the past, and a vigilant observation of the present, are enabled to anticipate and provide for the future,—whose passions are unengaged in pending controversies, and whose interests, except in so far as country or humanity is concerned, are unaffected by their issues,—whose positions, in short, placing them beyond the pale of those strifes and contests, between infliction on the one hand, and endurance on the other, enable them, from the loop-holes of retreat, to look on calmly, to scrutinize closely, to decide impartially, between the contending parties.

It is thus that improvements in the theory of human rights have originated in the closet of the student. A thought, elicited by the shock of opposing interests, is caught up by the solitary recluse, watchful for the discovery of truth. It is communicated to congenial minds. Each new recipient becomes, in his turn, an agent in its propagation; till, kindling as it goes, it imparts its cheering light and vivifying warmth to the eyes and bosoms of a whole people. The humble name of him from whom it first emanated may be lost to his own times, much more to posterity. But the thought itself survives. It is kept alive, like vestal fire, in the temple of human hearts. It is a contribution to the great mass of human knowledge, and becomes the property of nations. It may, indeed, be repressed for a time. Political power may seek to immolate it on the scaffold; to confine it in dungeons; to drive it into exile; to compel it to seek shelter in caves and in mountain fastnesses. But it cannot be expelled from the hearts and understandings of men. It is unquenchable, inextinguishable, immortal. In its own good time it reappears, with new accessions of brilliancy, and lights the nations in their progress towards social regeneration.

These are some of the influences which the mind exercises on the world and the things therein. And yet, notwithstanding that they transcend, in quality and extent of operation, the agencies of government, the depositories of political power occupy, in general estimation, the vantage ground of the comparatively obscure and solitary student. Upon the former are fixed the regards of the world. Rumor reports of his deeds with her thousand tongues. His whereabouts is chronicled by the newspaper press throughout the land. His talents are lauded, and his services magnified, by interested partizans. His magnificence attracts the gaze, and his largesses call forth the acclamations, of the unlettered multitude. The dispenser of patronage, his levees are crowded by the mercenary and the ambitious, anxious for pensions, offices and honors. The power which he wields, and the influence for good or for evil which he exercises on human affairs, cause him to be regarded, even by the patriotism and intelligence of the land, with a watchfulness and interest extrinsic of his personal claims and qualities.

The man of letters, on the contrary, has no factitious claims on public notice. With no appointments of honor or profit to bestow; with no means at command to win the epicure through his palate, or the venal through their cupidity; with no party, or party press, interested in diffusing his fame, or extending his popularity; with no official insignia nor outward decoration, to blazon forth his rank or his importance to the masses, with whom the visible is ever more imposing than the intellectual, his prospects of renown are dependent on himself alone—on the opinion which his countrymen or the world at large may, from a perusal of his writings, entertain of his merits. These writings, unless ushered into the world under circumstances peculiarly auspicious, or deemed to have an important bearing on party politics, generally make their way slowly into the channels of circulation. Shakspeare and Milton even, those minds capable of comprehending the universe, and from which, figuratively speaking, a universe might be fashioned, lived to enjoy but a small portion of that immeasurable renown, which after times have so liberally, but not less justly than liberally, accorded them.

It must be confessed, however, that a new era is dawning upon the world. The increased and increasing taste for reading, the rapid multiplication of literary productions, and the great facilities recently introduced for their transmission to the remotest bounds of civilization, are operating with great power on social and individual man. We live in the midst of what may be emphatically styled the age of free inquiry. Thought has roused itself from the lethargy and slumber of centuries. It is fast shaking off the trammels which had been imposed upon it by kingcraft in conjunction with priestcraft. From the lowly and bending posture in which it formerly crouched, it has sprung to its natural upright attitude, and, without embarrassment, nay, with a proud confidence, confronts the majesty of kings. It has taken rank by the side of the great powers of the earth. It will, ere long, rise above them, and put them beneath its feet. Already are the corrupt and time-worn institutions of despotism mouldering and crumbling at its touch. Already are new institutions, leavened more or less with the spirit of freedom, springing into existence, under its influence. It no longer speaks, as of yore, in timid undertones, fearful of calling down upon itself the avalanches of political power; but, swelling with the amplitude, and deepening with the profundity, of its vast conceptions, it emulates the blast of the trumpet, startling its thousands from repose, on the dawn of a world-winning battle! Let us trust that it is the pioneer of a more enlightened civilization than has yet been foreshadowed in the dreams of mere philosophy,—that it is destined by Providence to be the harbinger of a state of things as yet unprecedented upon earth—the morning star, burning in pensile beauty on the brow of the millennium,—that in the fulness of time, it will usher in the commencement of that era, when the war-announcing trumpet shall be heard no more,—when Peace shall gather the entire family of man under the shadow of her wing,—when, with individuals and communities, Rectitude, in thought and deed, shall not only be an aim, but an attainment—not only an abstract Reality, but an universal Presence.

MAURIEPEAR.

FLATTERY OF A POET LAUREATA.

The poet Waller, in the profusion of poetical decoration, makes Queen Henrietta, the consort of Charles I, so beautiful, that her beauty would affect every lover "more than his private loves." She was "the whole worlds mistress." A portrait, in crayon, of Henrietta, at Hampton court, however, sadly reduces all his poetry; for the miraculous was only in the fancy of the court poet.

TO EMILY.

Oh! ask not verse or song of one
With feelings chilled, with fancy slow,
Whose harp can echo but the tone
And voice of woe.

Fittier far were gayer themes—
Thy youth's strong spell—thy beauty's power—
Than those which fill my midnight dreams
And waking hour.

Behest like thine, few years ago,
Had caused Romance to plume his wings,
And made poetic language flow
Like sparkling springs.

My heart has ceased to own a chord
Responsive e'en to Love's own sound,
Save when at thy soft look or word
It fears a wound.

Then, lady, ask no verse of one
Whose song ne'er knows a cheerful strain;
Whose heart owns but the monotone
Of grief and pain.

POPULAR EDUCATION.

Some years since we announced our determination to discontinue the publication of Lectures and Addresses in the Messenger. To this resolution we were driven by numerous complaints from our readers, elicited by the great number of papers of this description,—the least attractive form of literary contributions,—which had crowded our pages, and by the fact that our table was then loaded with many others, of a like character. We have since uniformly rejected them, although in doing so we have excluded many articles of signal ability, and in some instances incurred the displeasure of our earliest and staunchest friends.

We have been reluctantly persuaded to depart from that rule, however; and we hope that the theme and the occasion will be an ample justification in the eyes of our readers. The Address of James M. Garnett, Esq., delivered before the Education Convention assembled in this place, on the 9th of December last, which we have consented to publish, discusses a subject,—Popular Education,—to which, at this moment, the attention of the People as well as of the Legislature of Virginia is directed, with unwonted and intense solicitude; and nothing can more forcibly illustrate this assertion than the fact that this Address was delivered before the members of a numerous and enlightened body of citizens, convened at the Metropolis, from almost every quarter of the Commonwealth,—leaving the quiet and the comfort of their firesides, to contribute their mite in this holy and patriotic effort to diffuse knowledge among the people, and thereby to make them happier men as well as better citizens. A copy of this Address was, by an unanimous vote of that Convention, solicited of its venerable and distinguished author for publication, and by the same vote the Messenger was specially selected as the medium of communicating it to the public. We could not resist such an application, proceeding from such a body of men, convened for such a purpose,—and more especially when we saw the ability with which the sound views and just opinions of the orator are illustrated and enforced.

We may add, in conclusion, that we do not intend hereafter to relax a rule, which was originally approved by our most deliberate judgment, and the necessity of which subsequent experience has most satisfactorily demonstrated.—[Ed. Mess.

Friends and Brother Members of the Education Convention :

It is with feelings such as I have no language to express, that I am about to address you on that most deeply interesting of all subjects—Popular Education. And although I have been most kindly invited to do so by yourselves, it requires a bolder heart than I can boast of, not to feel some fears of failing to do what may be expected of me. These fears are not a little augmented by seeing before me many of the sons of Virginia, who are most distinguished for their talents, their literary attainments, and their great moral worth—men, whose minds must be quite as deeply impressed as my own, with the vast importance of the object which has drawn us together; and, who are much more capable than I am of advocating the great, the vital cause which we are here assembled to promote. But I have been taught to believe, that there is often more of false pride than true modesty in such apprehensions; and that it is every man's sacred duty to contribute, to the utmost of his power, towards the advancement of every good word and work in which he may be called on to assist. The moral courage requisite to enable us to make such efforts by public addresses, I believe, might always be commanded, if we would only keep our thoughts intently fixed upon the cause which we are about to maintain, rather than on the praise or dispraise that may be bestowed on ourselves for our exertions in its behalf. This shall be my earnest endeavor on the present occasion; and relying, as I confidently hope that I may, on your goodness to excuse all my short-comings in this labor of love for the rising generation, I will proceed to offer such opinions on the subject of education as I have entertained, for the last thirty or forty years of my life.

It is a circumstance, much to the discredit of the citizens of Virginia, and deeply to be deplored, that we have so long neglected to regard the subject of popular education as requiring, in a far greater degree than all others, that sedulous care and constant attention, both of the government and the people themselves, without which it never can reach that degree of improvement to which it may be brought, when it is made the constant object of national as well as individual concern. This is of the utmost importance in all governments. But it is indispensable in ours, where all political power emanates immediately from the people, who must be themselves both intelligent and virtuous, or it will rarely happen that their public functionaries will be any better than themselves. Indeed, the probability will always be, that they will have among their rulers a much greater proportion of cunning, unprincipled demagogues, than of wise, capable and honest men.

Long before the present year, as some files of our old newspapers could prove, a few isolated individuals had most earnestly invited the friends of popular education to hold a convention for the same purpose that the present one has been formed to promote. But these efforts, few and far between, fell still-born from the press, and, if my recollection fail me not, obtained no friendly response from any quarter whatever. This, I verily believe, would still be the case, had it not been for the startling fact, disclosed by our late census, that there are nearly sixty thousand of our white population, over twenty years of age, who can neither read nor write. The publication of such a fact throughout the United States—a fact so replete with reproach, degradation and disgrace to Virginia—has effectually shamed and alarmed us all. It is, in truth, the primary cause of this convention. And since it is among the wise and beneficent dispensations of Providence that some good should grow out of all evil, we have much cause to rejoice at it, however humiliating it may be to our State pride. This besetting sin, I most earnestly hope, has been punished enough of late years, to awaken us all to such a thorough and abiding sense of our real moral and political condition, as will rouse every member of this community to do his uttermost towards its improvement and exaltation, so far as that can possibly be done by a wise and efficient system of popular education. Let us all do our parts, as parents, as guardians, as private citizens; and never cease, until we succeed in urging our legislators to do theirs, towards the accomplishment of this vital work. Not only the present generation, but thousands upon thousands yet unborn would bless us for the heavenly deed; while we ourselves should partake, in full measure, of that most delightful of all mental enjoyments—the consciousness of having contributed to the happiness of our fellow-creatures. Education, as it should be, not only increases in a great degree the desire of those who have obtained it, to find opportunities of enjoying this highest of all intellectual gratifications, but it augments their power of exciting a similar desire in others, and thereby multiplies the means of doing good in every direction.

The excitement which has resulted in producing the present convention, has given rise to many suggestions in our public journals, which evince how sincerely and deeply their authors feel the political, as well as moral evils, that are the necessary consequences of the totally unlettered state in which so large a portion of our people have been found. But few of these writers, if any, seem to me to strike at the true cause of the evil. This—if I may be permitted to offer an opinion, without being thought too presumptuous—consists of certain radical defects and errors in our whole system of education, which may be traced through all its ramifications, from the humblest of our primary schools, up to our academies, colleges, and universities. In all these, with scarcely an exception, so far as I know and believe, the great end of education is the advancement of the worldly interests of the students. Riches, literary fame, political honors, or general celebrity; in other words, the gratification of avarice, pride or ambition, in some one or more of their infinite variety of forms, is made to be, either by direct or indirect means, the sole aim of all the pupils; and the methods adopted to urge them on in these ever-restless, insatiate pursuits, are such as to cherish some of the worst passions of the human heart—envy, jealousy, hatred, and unalloyed selfishness. Do any of you doubt it? Then examine for yourselves, the whole of what is called (but falsely, as I think,) the well educated portion of our fellow-citizens; and what will you find a very great portion of them to be? Why, as an admirable writer well observes of the effects of the system of education in another country—"a restless, anxious generation; tortured by the cravings of inordinate ambition; maddened by rare examples of individual, occasional success; panting, wrestling, elbowing each other with a wrathful emulation;—most apt, no doubt, to give the whole social order a rapid, onward impulse, but no less tending to drive contentment from the face of the civilized world."

This is, undeniably, the effect (with far too few exceptions) of education as it is, and long has been, in our own country. In this respect, indeed, it seems to be no better than it was in the days of that witty satirist, Horace; although we live in a christian country, and his was one of idolatry. For in one of his celebrated satires, addressed to his friend Mæcenas, he complains that nobody lived content with his situation, whether it was one of choice or chance; but that every one coveted some other than that which he himself occupied. This melancholy fact, which Horace, with all his learning and sagacity, was incapable of explaining, every christian can make clear to the commonest understanding. It is neither more nor less than because our systems of education are not founded on religion; but primarily, on merely knowing how to read, write and cypher; and, as you ascend higher up the ladder of worldly ambition, on scientific and literary acquirements, together with a knowledge of ancient and modern languages. Against the superstructure I have no complaints whatever to utter; on the contrary, I would be for giving it a greater diversity of embellishment than it has yet had in our country. But I must again and again repeat, that unless the basis be religion, there cannot possibly be (according to my understanding of the term) any such thing as true education. "Its main object should be," as the same writer already quoted most justly remarks, "to fit man for life. It ought to instil into the youthful mind that there is a society already in existence, in which he is to fill a place—in which he will have duties to perform, and hardships and storms to endure. It ought to teach man to know himself—to resign and reconcile him to his lot—to recognize and adore the hand of Providence, even in those social arrangements which might perhaps strike him as unjust and arbitrary, and to lift him above the petty miseries of life, not only by a firm, but by an active belief in another and a better world." Education should do all this and more, or it will be little better than "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

With us, however, it has done scarcely any thing, indeed, I believe I might say nothing of the kind, so far as the laws of the land have undertaken to direct or control it. For the modicum of good which has been accomplished, society is indebted almost solely to early parental instruction; although this, in thousands of instances, has been either criminally neglected, or so miserably perverted as to administer mental poison to the poor unfortunate children, rather than the true bread of life. In our primary public schools, they very rarely acquire any thing more than I have already stated; whilst in schools of a higher grade, a youth is said to be well educated who has gone through a certain college course, with which neither religion nor morality has had any thing to do, unless it be that sort of worldly morality which substitutes a fair, showy, but often variable exterior, for real, internal, incorruptible religious principle. Without this indestructible foundation for every thing that bears the name of education, there can be no lasting peace, no security, no happiness, either for individuals, states or nations. But with it, there is nothing within the power of human agency to effect, which our beloved country might not rationally hope to accomplish: for every man in it would feel it to be his indispensable and most sacred duty to cultivate, to the full extent of his ability, every faculty of his soul—every power of his intellect.

This is only my own opinion. Permit me here to sustain it by proofs, taken from a very able writer on this subject, which most conclusively, as I think, establish the fact, that no system of education ever yet tried, unless religion were the foundation, has done more than to change the form of crime, without lessening, even in the smallest degree, its amount.

"In France," according to the celebrated statistical tables of M. Guerry, "out of 7,147 crimes, 1,865 were against the person, and 5,282 against property; that is as 1 : 3, nearly.

The same peculiarity obtains in comparing the different provinces of France, as may be seen from the tables referred to. It is well known that civilization is far more advanced in the north of France than in the south. In the north of France in 1829, there was one male pupil to every 16 inhabitants; in the south, only 1 to 43. In the same year, of 69 crimes in the north, 25 were against the person, and 44 against property.

In England, out of 121,888, a total number of crimes reported from 1810 to 1826, 2,539 were crimes against the person, and 119,349 against property. In Norway, the per centum in 1826, is 10 crimes against the person, and 90 against property; as 1 : 9.

In Spain in 1826, the per centum is 37 crimes against the person, and 63 against property; as 1 : 2, nearly.

In Massachusetts, the per centum is 635 crimes against the person, and 9,364 against property; as 1 : 16, nearly.

From this statement we see that crime changes its form with the advance of civilization, and the general diffusion of knowledge; crimes against the person decreasing, and crimes against property increasing, with the increase of the means of education. This fact—the simple change of the form of vice, as the effect of civilization—has had not a little influence in leading many to the erroneous conclusion, that the mere diffusion of human knowledge, unaided by christianity, is sufficient for the promotion of a sound morality.

According to these statements we see that the form of crime changes with the advance of knowledge and civilization. I now proceed to show that education, unaided by christianity, may give a new phasis to crime; it has no power to expel it.

The statements I am about to present, though collated from the most authentic sources with great care, can claim to be only an approximation to the exact result. But still they are so uniform, so broad and palpable, that they appear to my mind as satisfactory for the purpose for which I now introduce them, as the most complete data could make them. First then let us compare, in different countries, the proportion of crimes committed, to the means of education enjoyed:

1. France, in the north and the south, is widely distinguished in civilization and the means of education. In the north of France, there is one male pupil to about fourteen inhabitants. In the south, there is one to about forty-five. And allowing an equal provision for an equal number of females, it would make the proportion one pupil to about seven inhabitants in the north, and one to about twenty-three in the south: and this would make, of the whole population, not more than one in three who could read and write, and one in fourteen of the inhabitants receiving education. Now if education has a tendency to expel crime, we shall see a difference in the criminal statistics of the north and south of France, favorable to the latter. Is it so? Exactly the reverse, according to Mr. Guerry. For though he makes it appear, as was before shown, that there were more crimes against the person in the south and west of France than in the north and east, yet the total amount of crime shows a greater proportion in the north than in the south. From the tables he has so carefully prepared, exhibiting the precise amount of instruction and crime in each department of France, I should think the average would be about one hundred crimes in the north to eighty in the south. In the whole of France the number of accused were in the proportion of one in 4,195 of the population.

2. Let us now compare England and Wales with France. In England and Wales, out of a population of about fourteen millions, it is supposed that about seven millions can read and write; that is, about one in two, and one in seven, in the whole population, are supposed to be receiving education. The total number of crimes brought before courts of justice in England in 1828, was 16,564; in the proportion of one to 721 inhabitants.

3. Let us now compare Spain with England. I have no means of ascertaining the proportion of those who can read and write, to the whole number of inhabitants in Spain; but we are very safe in supposing it to be far less than in England or France.

In 1826, according to official reports, the number of criminals in Spain amounted to 12,937; which, if the population be 11,447,629, would give one crime, not accusation, for 885 persons—a proportion much less than the accused even in England."

The author gives references to other countries to establish the same facts, but the foregoing are deemed sufficient. Let us examine his references to prove that education, founded on religion, changes not only the form of crime, but greatly lessens the aggregate amount:

"Scotland, compared with England, gives a different result. Of convicted criminals there were in Scotland in 1823, one to 9,649 inhabitants; in England in 1826, there was one to 1,082.

Scotland is distinguished from all the countries named in this article, for its having the christian religion as the basis of its whole system of national education: and this it is that gives it such a disparity, in its criminal statistics, with other countries."

The writer goes on to cite various acts of the government, to show that, by the laws establishing the schools in Scotland, religion was made the basis; and that the means of education provided were far more ample than in any of the countries heretofore mentioned:

"The power to read and write and an acquaintance with the elements of arithmetic were placed within the reach of almost every individual, while all classes of the people were enabled to read the Bible from their earliest years, and, with the assistance of the catechism, (which was regularly taught in every school,) have received the rudiments of a religious education, such as they could not have had the same means of attaining in any other country of Europe." It is supposed that about one-ninth part of the population are in the process of education.

Let us now look at Prussia, and inquire into the effects of the school system upon the morals of that community. I shall take occasion hereafter to speak more fully of the Prussian system of education, and shall content myself now with simply presenting, in a few words, the deep religious sentiment that pervades it, and the effect of it in diminishing crime.

In the first place, the teachers in their schools are required to be religious men, and their examination, previous to their admission to office, is as particular in regard to their religious character, as it is in regard to their intellectual.

In the examination of Dr. Julius before the education committee of the British House of Commons, July, 1834, he was asked whether the teachers in the Prussian schools were persons of a religious turn of mind? Answer: "The whole teaching of the seminaries is directed to instil into them a deep feeling of religion."

In the law of 1819, relating to the "training of primary teachers," we find it declared—"A schoolmaster, to be worthy of his vocation, should be pious, discreet, and deeply impressed with the dignity and sacredness of his calling."

"The principal aim of primary schools should be to form men, sound both in body and mind, and to imbue the pupils with the sentiment of religion, and with that zeal and love for the duties of a schoolmaster which is so closely allied to religion."

In the ordinance regulating the appointment of teachers it is declared—"As a general rule, any man of mature age, of irreproachable morals and sincere piety, who understands the duties of the office he aspires to fill, and gives satisfactory proofs that he does, is fit for the post of public teacher."

Without fatiguing your attention with a detail of the statistics given by our author, I will merely add that fourteen years after the establishment of this system of education in Prussia, the total amount of crime in the kingdom had decreased thirty-eight per cent.

Do any here present want the proofs of what, and how, a people can do without religion? Then ask yourselves what was France, when the whole nation committed the shocking impiety of decreeing that there was no God? Was she not a scene of such universal bloodshed, misery and horror, as the world had never before witnessed? Were not all the laws of both God and man openly violated—deeds and crimes of unparalleled atrocity publicly perpetrated, and even gloried in; while the whole country, throughout all its borders, was convulsed and torn to pieces, as if all justice, virtue and humanity had been banished forever from the face of the earth? All Europe still feels some of the effects of this truly dreadful moral earthquake; and even the land of France itself has hardly ceased to reek with the blood of the countless multitudes who fell victims to this most appalling destitution of all morals and religion in a whole nation.

The preliminary steps which led to this most awful catastrophe, are thus described by a late truly eloquent writer: "Such men as Voltaire, Mirabeau, Diderot, Helvetius, d'Alambert, Condorcet and Rousseau entered into the grand scheme of mental disenthralment, with all the ardor of Frenchmen, united with great learning, genius and wit. The press was subsidized, and speedily the whole literature of the nation was steeped in the philosophy that was to prove a panacea for all their social and political disorders. The schools, the books, the weekly gazettes, and heavier reviews,—all, all were laid under tribute, and converted into vehicles of truth and light for heralding the dawn of this new millennium. It came. But not like

'Another morn,
Risen on mid-noon;'

but 'cloud instead and ever-during night,' it came on them. It rose—a little cloud at first,—the gathered exhalations of a few noxious hearts: but it spread, and possessed an attractive power, that drew up those dark materials to its bosom, which, when it broke, was as if an avenging Deity, in one awful cataract of woe, had poured upon them all the vials of the apocalypse. The living God they had voted out of existence;—his written code they had burned in sacrifice to the gods of their own creation;—his temples they had converted into scenic exhibitions of licentious enticement: and prostitution personified became the 'god of their idolatry.' They had written upon their gravestones that 'death was an eternal sleep;' which was at once the record of their blasphemy, and the epitaph of their wisdom. Thus they 'cursed all human, and insulted all divine;' until righteous Heaven, wearied out with their impiety, drew the avenging sword; and the Divine Nemesis, thundering the maledictions of an incensed God, swept them to the grave they had mocked, and to the retributions they had defied." "The miseries," says President Dwight, "which were suffered by that single nation in the course of a few years, have changed all the histories of the preceding sufferings of mankind into idle tales. They were enhanced and multiplied, without a precedent, and without end. It seemed, for a season, as if the funeral knell of the nation were tolled, and the world summoned to its execution and burial."

But one of the happy consequences of this awful visitation of Divine Providence on a people who had dared to deny even its existence, has been, that the people themselves have become so thoroughly convinced of the utter impossibility of enjoying any thing like national prosperity and happiness, without religion to guide and govern them, that they have lately made the Bible a text-book in all the schools of the empire. This wonderful and most astonishing revolution in public sentiment, throughout a whole civilized country, of such extent and population, has nothing like it in the annals of the world: and to what else can any rational man ascribe it, but to the Almighty power of the Creator of this world, whenever he chooses to exert it?

But if the example of France be insufficient to convince you all of the truth for which I am contending, let all history be diligently searched; and I will venture to assert, without fear of contradiction, that the most prosperous and happy countries will always be found to be those in which the true principles of morality and religion most predominate. Nay, we may extend our scrutiny into all the ranks and conditions of private life, and the same most conclusive, irrefutable results will assuredly follow every such examination. The best ordered and happiest families, no matter whether they be poor or rich, unlearned or learned, (according to the common acceptance of the term,) will always be found amongst the moral and religious portion of every community. If the members of these families possess scholastic and literary acquirements, so much the better; but they themselves will assure you, that it is something very different, something infinitely more precious, to which they owe their happiness: in a word, that it is an abiding, ever-active sense of their accountability to the Divine Author of their existence, for every feeling of their hearts—every thought of their minds—every act of their will. What then do these facts prove? Do they not demonstrate, with the irresistible force of thorough conviction, that all the knowledge of sciences, arts, literature and languages, which schools and colleges can impart, are utterly insufficient, without morals and religion, to make man what he ought to be?

What is commonly called education is certainly much more diffused over our State than it formerly was, notwithstanding the lamentable deficiency of it, made known by our recent census, in every part of Virginia. Consequently, if such education alone were sufficient to render man the useful, happy being his Creator designed him to be, we should find in our community a corresponding, proportionate increase of whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report. But do we find them? I appeal to our criminal statistics to answer the question. These—unless I have greatly misunderstood them—exhibit a most alarming and increasing catalogue of swindling, theft, robbery, murders and assassinations, both public and private, besides many other crimes and atrocities, which are too shocking to mention, that are frequently perpetrated in almost every part of our country. Many of them are not committed by such men only as can neither read nor write, but by vast numbers of those who have enjoyed all the advantages of what is commonly styled "the best education," and have gone through the usual course of studies generally followed in all our schools and colleges. Can this system then be perfect? Nay, is it not radically defective? And ought not the strong arm of the law to interpose for its correction—at least so far as law can effect this most desirable end? Surely it might do much for our primary schools, if it could exert its influence no farther; for many of them are in a truly deplorable situation, even where there is a pretence of carrying them on. So little regard is sometimes paid to the qualifications of their teachers, that persons are not unfrequently permitted to conduct them, who can produce no other evidence of their fitness than their own declarations, nor any other recommendation than the pittance for which they agree to take upon themselves the all-important office of a teacher of youth. In these cases the schools often go on for months, without any examination, either by the school commissioners, or by the parents of the poor helpless children, who suffer irreparable injury, not only from the entire loss of their time, but from the bad treatment and corrupt examples of the worthless men to whose care they have been entirely surrendered. The money appropriated by the State, or applied from other sources, to such schools, is thus totally wasted—nay, infinitely worse than wasted,—for it goes to feed either some of the drones or moths of the social hive, or a portion of the poisoners of the public morals.

In making these remarks, I beg to be distinctly understood as not intending to censure the whole class of common school-teachers or the commissioners;—far from it,—for many of these persons are worthy men, and do their duty, I believe, faithfully. But the fact should not be concealed, that a large portion of the teachers are utterly incompetent, even if they were willing to render the services expected of them. The wonder is that any should be found fit, when we consider that their annual wages hardly amount to as much as we give to a common day-laborer;—thus evidently showing that we attach a far higher value to the bodily labor exerted for our benefit, than to that of the mind!

But the time has come—the hour is at hand, when we must all do something towards changing this fearful state of things for the better, or an awful responsibility awaits us if we much longer neglect to do it. I have often—very often—contemplated the signs of the times in regard to popular education, with the deepest sorrow, the most melancholy anticipations; and scarcely a solitary ray of hope has dawned on my mind, until the voice of the people themselves began to cry out for reform,—aye, radical, efficient, permanent reform. This cry, thank heaven, has been too loud and too general for their legislators any longer to disobey its imperative requirements. Why their own good sense and patriotism should not have impelled them long ago to make the necessary changes in our present system, it is by no means easy to explain. The increasing disregard and frequent violation of their laws; the growing licentiousness of the public press, and various other strong indications of a morbid public sentiment, might have taught them a lesson, one would think, which would force upon the minds of the least observant—the most insensible amongst them—a thorough conviction of the absolute necessity for doing something to arrest the downward course of our commonwealth. And it seems to me equally manifest, that every reflecting man will discern, at a single glance, that this something must be Popular Education as it should be. Rest assured, my dear hearers, perfectly assured, that nothing else under heaven will do. Some palliatives possibly might be found, which, like the nostrums of certain quack doctors, would give temporary relief; but this would be all. The fatal moral maladies, which, like deadly cancers, are eating into the very heart's core of our body politic, require physicians of the soul, and those of the very first order, effectually to cure them. To employ any empirics will only be to make that which is already bad, still worse.

Should any of you desire to know what I mean by Popular Education as it should be, I will most respectfully endeavor to explain it somewhat more fully than I have yet done. One reason alone appears to me sufficient to convince any man who will listen dispassionately to its dictates, that such education should always be founded (as I have already said) on religion and morality,—that kind of it, I mean, which certainly results from true religious faith. But should there be any unwilling to trust to abstract reason only as their guide, I will most confidently refer them for practical, aye and undeniable proofs, to our Sunday-schools,—those truly admirable educational nurseries, not only for the children of the poor and destitute who have no means wherewith to purchase instruction for them, but for the offspring of all the wealthy who feel the necessity of giving to them such kind of instruction as these schools are calculated to impart. There the teachers all act upon the principle, that since children begin to feel long before they learn to think, or at least to think to any good practical purpose, their little innocent hearts and their affections must be the first objects of special regard and most assiduous culture. This culture is an indispensable preliminary to instructing them in the knowledge of their various duties, to themselves, to society, and to God; as such knowledge would avail but little towards the fulfilment of these duties, unless their hearts were first prepared to love them. Acting upon these principles, Sunday-schools become—what all others might be—fruitful sources of pure, unalloyed good to all that portion of the community by whom they are maintained. This I can assert from long personal experience, having acted for twelve years as superintendent of a very large one, in which there were many adults, besides children of every age and condition; and I can truly say, that never, since I was capable of reflection, did I enjoy the approbation of my own conscience so fully, so much without reproach, as whilst I was thus engaged. These schools, in fact, render incalculable service, not only to the children, but to many of their parents; and though last, not least, to the teachers themselves. The first are taught to know and to love their duty, which is intrinsically worth all other knowledge put together. The parents become ashamed of being so ignorant as to be incapable of answering the numerous questions which their children ask them whilst they are preparing for the next Sunday; and are thus impelled to make efforts, often effectual, for their own instruction. As for the teachers, they are constantly improving their own hearts and understandings by such employments, and at the same time treasuring up for themselves an exhaustless fund of pure self-approval, in reflecting on the good they have rendered to numbers of the most destitute and helpless of their fellow-creatures. All schools, I believe, if properly conducted, would produce the same salutary effects on all the parties concerned. The pupils would be prepared, so far as the well-directed efforts of their teachers could prepare them, not only to enjoy, as they should do, every blessing of life, but courageously to encounter all its insuperable ills; to endure, with true christian fortitude, its unavoidable calamities; and to make the best of every situation in which they might be placed. But this kind of preparation is never received in any of our public schools, from the lowest to the highest, so far as I know any thing about them. On the contrary, in the primary schools, the children are taught only to read, write, and cypher; whilst the matriculates of our colleges and universities have their heads crammed with much of what is called learning, which they never afterwards use, whilst their hearts and affections have been left to take care of themselves; and they are turned loose into a world of which they know next to nothing, although destined to live and act a part in it, for which they have still to make the necessary preparation. This often costs them much loss of time, many miscarriages, and great suffering, from which they might have been saved, had the right course of instruction been pursued with them. In these cases there is none of that reaction on the parents which Sunday-schools produce; nor can the teachers find their employment much else than a source of great annoyance both to body and soul.

In the Sunday-school with which I was connected, there were not a few of the poor children who had previously been so utterly destitute of all moral and religious instruction as not to have the least idea of a Supreme Being, and had never so much as heard the name of Christ. Yet several of them have since grown up to be united to some christian church, and to become useful, worthy members of society. Is there the least probability that so beneficent a change could have been wrought in them, had they received no other instruction than that which is required to be given in our primary schools? None, I believe, are so prejudiced, none so totally blind to truth, as to answer yes. On the contrary, all may understand, if they will, that the magic influence, the almighty power, which produced this heavenly work—was neither more nor less than the Bible itself, which was made their text-book, and the divine gospel of the Saviour of the world. These taught them why it is that “we live and move and have our being;” why we have a rational and immortal soul, accountable to Him who gave it, for the use or abuse of all its God-like faculties. It taught them also to know what constituted the proper use, and what the abuse of these faculties; how to exercise them for good, and how to avoid using them for evil purposes. In a word, it taught them how they must all live in this world, if they would ever hope for happiness in the world to come.

Such is my experience, and such my firm belief, in regard to the influence and beneficent effects of Sunday-schools. But having had much to do with other schools of a higher grade for both sexes, I beg leave now to offer a few remarks on them, as they may perhaps contribute something towards the great object of devising a proper system of education for every class, which we all have so much at heart. In these schools I always found the pupils obedient, docile, studious and praiseworthy, just in proportion as they had become susceptible of moral suasion and religious impressions. And this susceptibility was invariably greatest in those children who had received most of that ever-tender, affectionate, indefatigable and pious maternal instruction, for which no perfect substitute has ever yet been found. I fear indeed it never can be; for woman’s love for her offspring, is a thing sui generis. Nothing on earth can compare with it but the love of a pious father; but even that falls short of it in several of the means of its manifestation. Neither agony of body nor anguish of mind can abate or extinguish it, for it survives all the changes and chances of this mortal life; and never, never dies until the poor mother herself sinks into her grave. The first and great aim of such mothers in teaching their children, is to cultivate their hearts and affections; and such instruction prepares them, in a way that nothing else can, for receiving all the learning of the schools. In this, however, their progress will not depend merely on such previous culture; for many who have least of it, acquire most learning. But all other things being equal, there surely can be no comparison between learned men with well cultivated hearts and affections, and learned men without them. The former owe their gains in scientific and literary acquirements to the thorough conviction, that he who seeks for true glory and honor and immortality, must do it “by patient continuance in well doing ;” and that his inestimable reward will then be “eternal life.” Whereas the latter are indebted for their acquirements to superior genius and memory, stimulated by pride, ambition, and that soul-corroding quality, emulation, which parents and teachers in general are so fond of exciting in children, but which I have never found entirely dissociated from those malevolent, detestable passions—envy and jealousy. The advocates of emulation deceive themselves in regard to the true nature of this all-powerful stimulus to human effort, by constantly coupling it with the attractive terms—"noble and generous." But in my humble opinion, it would be quite as proper to call fire a freezing substance, or to style poison wholesome food. That emulation will impel young persons to acquire learning, I admit to be certain, if it can be sufficiently excited; but I deem it equally certain that it makes them selfish, just in proportion as they become emulous. This opinion is the result of very long experience and close observation, in watching, most anxiously, the various effects of this grand panacea of the schools, upon all the young people, of both sexes, to the amount of some two or three hundred, who, from first to last, have come partially under my care.

Let me entreat you not to infer from any thing I have said, that I am an enemy to the learning of the schools, even in the greatest extent to which it can be carried. All I contend for is, that it should always be represented and sought, merely as the means, and not the end of education; that it should be made the great object of pursuit—not for the various worldly distinctions which it may possibly procure for its possessors—not for literary fame, nor for political power, nor princely wealth,—but for the greater ability which it confers of promoting their own and others' happiness, both in time and in eternity. "It should be cultivated" (by all who seek it) "for the soothing, cheering, humanizing influence that it is calculated to exercise over the mind and heart; until they study principally, if not exclusively, in order better to understand their mission upon earth; better to enable themselves to fulfil their duties, and to vindicate their true rights; until they derive from their knowledge the means of ennobling their nature, and approaching, as near as can be, by mortal means, that future state of perfection to which Divine clemency entitles them to aspire—until, in fine, education is essentially moral and religious."

What a truly noble, glorious being is man, when thus indoctrinated! Even though he be in the lowliest, most humble walks of life, still he is made after God's own image;—he knows and loves to fulfil all his duties; he is an ever-active, illustrious example of all that is great and good in human nature; and derives a title to the only true nobility from God himself. On the other hand, how base, how abject, how utterly despicable a creature is he, who, though possessed of all the learning of the schools, of all the wealth and distinctions which the world can bestow, has become the willing slave of his own beastly appetites; the self-devoted victim of his own inordinate lusts and criminal passions! Should he be in private life, he is the constant object of scorn, contempt, loathing or pity to all who know him; if a monarch on his throne, he is the dreaded scourge, the abhorred curse of the whole people whom he governs.

Although most of the foregoing remarks relate chiefly to schools of a higher order than those which are the first objects of our concern on the present occasion, I hope it is needless for me to point out to so intelligent an audience as I now have the honor to address, in what way they apply and may be made available towards the preparation of any new system for our common schools. The details of this all-important work, I doubt not, will be confided to such a committee as you yourselves may deem competent to so arduous a task. I will not therefore presume to do more, before I conclude, than to add a few general remarks to what I have already said, in special reference to our schools of the lowest grade.

The late census reports the enormous amount of 58,462 persons, over twenty years of age, who cannot read! But however deep may be our alarm and mortification at seeing this disclosure, we may feel perfectly sure that it falls short of the truth. My reason for thinking so is, that no returns whatever of such persons have been made, in the statement which I have seen, from either of the counties of Charles City, Frederick, Marshall or Stafford, although their aggregate population amounts to 24,133. Again, Rock-bridge and Ohio, with an aggregate population of 23,290, are reported to have only eight such persons in each; whilst the number given for Powhatan is sixteen—for Fairfax, twenty-eight—for James City, twenty-nine—for Goochland, thirty-nine—for Warwick, forty-three—for Wood, forty-eight—and for Lancaster, fifty-one. Now a very moderate allowance for these obvious errors would certainly swell the amount of our white adults who cannot read, to at least 60,000. If to this we add the probable number, under twenty and over twelve or thirteen, who are thus ignorant, we shall find the whole number of our youth that are in this deplorable condition, not less probably than 120,000! Is not such a fact, my friends, enough to strike the heart of every true patriot in the land with the deepest shame and grief? Is it not enough to rouse even the most insensible, the least public-spirited amongst us, to a thorough conviction that something must speedily be done, to save our State from the numerous evils, both moral and political, which must inevitably befall her, if so vast a portion of her young citizens be suffered to remain much longer so utterly destitute even of the first elements of learning? What though it be an Herculean task that lies before us? Who is there in this numerous assembly—nay, who is there any where, in our whole community, that calls himself a Virginian, so lost to shame, so dead to all those fraternal and patriotic feelings which should animate the hearts of all who are members of the same political family, as not to join in the cry—now almost universal—of "hasten to the rescue?" Law may do much for us: but public sentiment must do more. Upon this we must depend for the accomplishment of all which the law is powerless to effect. In our government, for instance, it has no power, as many foreign governments have, to force people to go to school. If therefore those amongst us, who have never had that advantage, are ever to enjoy it all, it must be brought about by the arguments, persuasions and entreaties of all who take any interest in the matter. Public meetings must be held in all our counties where any reluctance is manifested to receive such instruction as the schools can give; and at such meetings lectures and addresses should be delivered on the subject, by all who can obtain an audience. The ministers of the Gospel too, of every denomination, should frequently exhort their respective congregations in regard to the sacred duty of educating their children by sending them to school, if they themselves cannot teach them. Then indeed, but not until then, may we hope for much effectual change—even though our legislature should devise the best system for common schools which has ever yet been devised.

This subject is one of the few—the very few—which our fiend-like party strifes and contentions have left us, (and thanks be to God for it,) in regard to which our fellow-citizens of all political parties, and of every religious creed, may most cordially coöperate. Most heartily then, and from my inmost soul, do I say to all—come, dear friends, come, let us unite, like a band of brothers, to take "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," that we may drag into some bottomless pit, there to lie forever, all the obstacles, of every nature and kind, to Popular Education as it should be. It will prove the restorative balsam, the grand elixir vitae, to our languishing body-politic; restoring it to sound and vigorous health, and preserving that health unimpaired as long as time shall last. Let all then, assist in such soul-cheering ministrations. Let husbands and wives, fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters—every one, give their aid. Let the heavenly work commence in the nursery; to be followed up, and continued by "line upon line, and precept upon precept," before parents confide to others the sacred instructing their beloved children—aye, and ever is, as long as the parental voice has any influence hearts or understandings. Let this be faithfully all; and many of you here present may yet live to good old mother Virginia rise, as it were, from the her fallen fortunes, and once more resume that exalt which she formerly held, with so much true glory

THE SINLESS CHILD.

A POEM, IN SEVEN PARTS.

BY MRS. SEBA SMITH.

PART III.

pace of the soul is sure to impart expressiveness to the face. It must beam through its external daily, as the material becomes subordinate to the l, will its transparency increase. Eva was lovely, spirit of love folded its wings upon her breast. All administered to her beauty; and angelic teachings whence came the power that winneth all hearts.
 ther is aware of the spell resting upon her daughter, that which seemed a spell to her, but which in as nothing more than fidelity to the rights of the edience to the voice uttered in that holy of holies.
 to comprehend the truthfulness of her character, not recoils from its gentle revealments. Alas! that nitate to the good and the beautiful should debar us man sympathy. Eva walked in an atmosphere of id images of surpassing sweetness were ever pre-to her eye. The dark and distorted shapes that he vision of the unenlightened and the erring, dared reach her. She wept over the blindness of her and tenderly revealed to her the great truths press-her own mind, and the freedom and the light in the soul might be preserved. She blamed not the sto which weak humanity is prone to be betrayed, loved that it should thus blind its own spiritual visions impress dark and ineffaceable characters upon
 ; thus sink, where it should soar.

As years passed on, no wonder, each
 An inward grace revealed;
 For where the soul is peace and love,
 It may not be concealed.
 They stamp a beauty on the brow,
 A softness on the face,
 And give to every wavy line
 A tenderness and grace.

Long golden hair in many curls
 Waved o'er young Eva's brow;
 Imparted depth to her soft eye,
 And pressed her neck of snow:
 Her cheek was pale with lofty thought,
 And calm her maiden air;
 And all who heard her birdlike voice,
 Felt harmony was there.

And winning were her household ways,
 Her step was prompt and light,
 To save her mother's weary tread
 Till came the welcome night;
 And though the toil might useless be,
 The housewife's busy skill,
 Enough for Eva that it bore
 Inscribed a mother's will;

For humble things exalted grow
 By sentiment impressed;
 The love that bathes the way-worn feet,
 Or leans upon the breast.
 For love, whate'er its offering be,
 Lives in a hallowed air,
 And holy hearts before its shrine,
 Alone may worship there.

Young Eva's cheek was lily pale,
 Her look was scarce of earth,
 And doubtingly the mother spoke,
 Who gave to Eva birth—
 "O Eva, leave thy thoughtful ways,
 And dance and sing, my child;
 For thy pallid cheek is tinged with blue—
 Thy words are strange and wild.

Thy father died, a widow left,
 An orphan birth was thine,
 I longed to see thy baby eyes
 Look upward into mine.
 I hoped upon thy infant face,
 Thy father's look to see—
 But Eva, Eva, sadly strange
 Are all thy ways to me.

E'en when a child, thy look did hold
 Communion with the sky,
 Too tranquil are thy maiden ways;
 The glances of thine eye
 Are such as make me turn away,
 E'en with a shuddering dread,
 As if my very soul might be
 By thy pure spirit read."

Slow swelled a tear from Eva's lid,—
 She kissed her mother's cheek—
 She answered with an earnest look,
 And accents low and meek:—
 "Dear mother, why should mortals seek Emotions to conceal?
 As if to be revealed were worse
 Than inwardly to feel.

The human eye I may not fear—
 It is the light within,
 That traces on the growing soul
 All thought, and every sin.
 That mystic book, the human soul,
 Where every trace remains,—
 The record of all thoughts and deeds—
 The record of all stains.

Dear mother! in ourselves is hid
 The holy spirit-land,
 And thought, the flaming cherub, stands
 With its recording hand.
 We feel the pang when that dread sword
 Inscribes the hidden sin,
 And turneth every where to guard
 The paradise within."

"Nay, Eva, leave these solemn words,
 Fit for a churchman's tongue,

And let me see thee deck thy hair,
A maiden blithe and young.
When others win admiring eyes,
And looks that speak of love,
Why dost thou stand in thoughtful guise?
So cold and tranquil move?

Thy beauty sure should win for thee
Full many a lover's sigh,
But on thy brow there is no pride,
Nor in thy placid eye.
Dear Eva! learn to look and love,
And claim a lover's prayer,
Thou art too cold for one so young,
So gentle and so fair."

"Nay, mother! I must be alone,
With no companion here,
None, none to joy when I am glad,
With me to shed a tear;
For who would clasp a maiden's hand
In grot or sheltering grove,
If one unearthly gift should bar
All sympathy and love!

Such gift is mine, the gift of thought,
Whence all will shrink away—
E'en thou from thy poor child dost turn,
With doubting and dismay.
And who shall love, and who shall trust,
Since she who gave me birth,
Knows not the child that prattled once
Beside her lonely hearth?

I would I were, for thy dear sake,
What thou would'st have me be;
Thou dost not comprehend the bliss
That's given unto me;
That union of the thought and soul
With all that's good and bright,
The blessedness of earth and sky,
The growing truth and light.

That reading of all hidden thought—
All mystery of life—
Its many hopes, its many fears,
Its sorrow and its strife.
A spirit to behold in all,
To guide, admonish, cheer—
Forever in all time and place,
To feel an angel near."

"Dear Eva! lean upon my breast,
And let me press thy hand,
That I may hear thee talk awhile
Of thy own spirit-land.
And yet I would the pleasant sun
Here shining in the sky,
The blithe birds singing through the air,
And busy life, were by.

For when in converse, like to this,
Thy low, sweet voice I hear,
Strange shudderings o'er my senses creep,
Like touch of spirits near—
And fearful grow familiar things,
In silence and the night—
The cricket piping in the hearth,
Half fills me with affright.

I hear the old trees creak and sway,
And shiver in the blast;
I hear the wailing of the wind,
As if the dead swept past.

Dear Eva! 'tis a world of gloom,
The grave is dark and drear,
We scarce begin to taste of life
Ere death is standing near."

Then Eva kissed her mother's cheek,
And look'd with saddened smile
Upon her terror-stricken face,
And talked with her the while—
And Oh! her face was pale and sweet
Though deep, deep thought was there
And sadly calm her low-toned voice
For one so young and fair.

"Nay mother, everywhere is hid
A beauty and delight—
The shadow lies upon the heart—
The gloom upon the sight—
Send but the spirit on its way
Communion high to hold,
And bursting from the earth and sky,
A glory we behold.

And did we but our primal state
Of purity retain,
We might as in our Eden days,
With angels walk again.
And memories strange of other times
Would break upon the mind,
The linkings, that the present join
To what is left behind.

The little child in its first state
A holy impress bears—
The signet mark by heaven affixed
Upon his forehead wears—
And nought that impress can efface,
Save his own wilful sin,
Which first begins to draw the veil
That shuts the spirit in.

And one by one its lights decay,
Its visions tend to earth,
Till all those holy forms have fled
That gathered round his birth;
Or dim and faintly may they come
Like memories of a dream—
Or come to blanch his cheek with fear:
So shadow-like they seem.

And thus all doubtingly he lives
Amid his gloomy fears,
And feels within his inmost soul,
Earth is a vale of tears:
And scarce his darkened thoughts may
The mystery within;
For darkly gleams the spirit forth
When shadowed o'er by sin.

Unrobed, majestic, should the soul
Before its God appear,
Undim'd the image He affix'd,
Unknowing doubt or fear—
And open converse should he hold,
With meek and trusting brow;
Such as man was in Paradise
He may be even now.

But when the deathless soul is sunk
To depths of guilt and woe,
It then a dark communion holds
With spirits from below."
And Eva shuddered as she told
How every heaven-born trace

Of goodness in the human soul
Might wickedness efface.

Alas! unknowing what he doth,
A judgment-seat man rears,
A stern tribunal throned within,
Before which he appears;
And conscience, minister of wrath,
Approves him or condemns,
He knoweth not the fearful risk,
Who inward light condemns.

"O veil thy face, pure child of God,"
With solemn tone she said,
"And judge not thou, but lowly weep,
That virtue should be dead.
Weep thou with prayer and holy fear,
That o'er thy brother's soul,
Effacing life, and light and love,
Polluting waves should roll.

Weep for the fettered slave of sense,
For passion's minion weep—
For him who nurtureth the worm,
In death that may not sleep;
And tears of blood, if it may be,
For him, who plunged in guilt,
Perils his own and victim's soul,
When human blood is spilt.

For him no glory may abide
In earth or tranquil sky—
Fearful to him the human face,
The searching human eye.
A light beams on him everywhere;
Revealing in its ray,
An erring, terror-stricken soul,
Lanched from its orb away.

Turn where he will, all day he meets
That cold and leaden stare;
His victim pale, and bathed in blood,
Is with him everywhere;
He sees that shape upon the cloud,
It glares from up the brook—
The mist upon the mountain side,
Assumes that fearful look.

He sees, in every simple flower,
Those dying eyes gleam out;
And starts to hear that dying groan,
Amid some merry shout.
The phantom comes to chill the warmth
Of every sunlight ray,
He feels it slowly glide along,
Where forrest shadows play.

And when the solemn night comes down,
With silence dark and drear,
His curdling blood and crawling hair
Attest the victim near.
With hideous dreams and terrors wild,
His brain from sleep is kept—
For on his pillow, side by side,
That gory form hath slept."

"O Eva, Eva, say no more,
For I am filled with fear;
Dim shadows move along the wall;
Dost thou not see them here?—
Dost thou not mark the gleams of light,
The shadowy forms move by?"
"Yes, mother, beautiful to see!
And they are always nigh.

Oh, would the veil for thee were raised
That hides the spirit-land—
For we are spirits draped in flesh,
Communing with that band;
And it were weariness to me,
Were only human eyes
To meet my own with tenderness,
In earth or pleasant skies."

PART IV.

The widow, awe-struck at the revelations of her daughter, is desirous to learn more; for it is the nature of the soul to search into its own mysteries: however dim may be its spiritual perception, it still earnestly seeks to look into the deep and the hidden. The light is within itself, and it becomes more and more clear at every step of its progress, in search of the true and the beautiful. The widow, hardly discerning this light, which is to grow brighter and brighter to the perfect day, calls for the material lights that minister to the external eye; that thus she may be hid from those other lights that delight the vision of her child. Eva tells of that mystic book—the human soul—upon which, thoughts, shaped into deeds, whether externally or only in its own secret chambers, inscribes a character that must be eternal. But it is not every character that is thus clearly defined as good or evil. Few indeed seize upon thought, and bring its properties palpably before them. Impressions come and go with a sort of lethargic indifference, leaving no definite lines behind, but only a moral haziness. The widow recollects the story of old Richard, and Eva supplies portions unknown to her mother, and enlarges upon the power of conscience, that fearful judge placed by the Infinite within the soul, with the two-fold power of decision, and punishment.

"Then trim the lights, my strange, strange child,
And let the faggots glow;
For more of these mysterious things
I fear, yet long, to know.
I glory in thy lofty thought,
Thy beauty and thy worth,
But, Eva, I should love thee more,
Did'st thou seem more like earth."

A pang her words poor Eva gave,
And tears were in her eye—
She kissed her mother's anxious brow,
And answered with a sigh:—
"Alas! I may not hope on earth
Companionship to find,
Alone must be the pure in heart,
Alone the great in mind.

We toil for earth, its shadowy veil
Envelops soul and thought,
And hides that discipline and life,
Within our being wrought.
We chain the thought, we shroud the soul,
And backward turn our glance,
When onward should its vision be,
And upward its advance.

I may not scorn the spirit's rights,
For I have seen it rise,
All written o'er with thought, thought, thought—
As with a thousand eyes—
The records dark of other years,
All uneffaced remain;
Unchecked desire, forgotten long,
With its eternal stain.

Recorded thoughts, recorded deeds,
 Its character attest—
 No garment hides the startling truth,
 Nor screens the naked breast.
 The thought, fore-shaping evil deeds,
 The spirit may not hide—
 It stands amid that searching light,
 Which sin may not abide.

And never may the spirit turn
 From that effulgent ray,
 It lives forever in the glare
 Of an eternal day ;
 Lives in that penetrating light,
 A kindred glow to raise,
 Or every withering sin to trace
 Within its searching blaze.

Few, few the shapely temple rear,
 For God's abiding place—
 That mystic temple, where no sound
 Within the hallowed space
 Reveals the skill of builder's hand—
 Yet with a silent care
 That holy temple riseth up,
 And God is dwelling there.

Then never weep when the infant lies
 In its small grave to rest,
 With the scented flowerets springing up
 From out its baby breast ;
 A pure, pure soul to earth was given,
 Yet may not thus remain ;
 Rejoice that it is rendered back,
 Without a single stain.

Bright cherubs bear the babe away
 With many a fond embrace,
 And beauty, all unknown to earth,
 Upon its features trace.
 They teach it knowledge from the fount,
 And holy truth and love ;
 The songs of praise the infant learns,
 As angels sing above."

The widow rose, and on the blaze
 The crackling faggots threw—
 And then to her maternal breast
 Her gentle daughter drew.
 "Dear Eva ! when old Richard died,
 In madness fierce and wild,
 Why did he in his phrenzy rave
 About a murdered child !

He died in beggary and rags,
 Friendless and grey, and old ;
 Yet he was once a thriving man,
 Light-hearted, too, I'm told.
 Dark deeds were whispered years ago,
 But nothing came to light ;
 He seemed the victim of a spell,
 That nothing would go right.

His young wife died, and her last words
 Were breathed to him alone,
 But 'twas a piteous sound to hear
 Her faint, heart-rending moan.
 Some thought, in dreams he had divulged
 A secret hidden crime,
 Which she concealed with breaking heart,
 Unto her dying time.

From that day forth he never smiled ;
 Morose and silent grown,

He wandered unfrequented ways,
 A moody man and lone.
 The schoolboy shuddered in the wood,
 When he old Richard passed,
 And hurried on, while fearful looks
 He o'er his shoulder cast.

And nought could lure him from his mood,
 Save his own trusting child,
 Who climb'd the silent father's neck,
 And kissed his cheek and smiled.
 That gentle boy, unlike a child,
 Companions never sought—
 Content to share his father's crust,
 His father's gloomy lot.

With weary foot and tattered robe,
 Beside him, day by day,
 He roamed the forest and the hill,
 And o'er the rough highway ;
 And he would prattle all the time
 Of things to childhood sweet ;
 Of singing bird, of lovely flower,
 That sprang beneath their feet.

Sometimes he chid the moody man,
 With childhood's fond appeal :—
 'Dear father, talk to me awhile—
 How very lone I feel !
 My mother used to smile so sad,
 And talk and kiss my cheek,
 And sing to me such pretty songs ;
 So low and gently speak :'

Then Richard took him in his arms
 With passionate embrace,
 And with an aching tenderness
 He gazed upon his face ;—
 Tears rushed unto his glazed eyes,
 He murmured soft and wild,
 And kissed with more than woman's love,
 The fond but frightened child.

He died, that worn and weary boy ;
 And those that saw him die,
 Said, on his father's rigid brow,
 Was fixed his fading eye.
 His little stiffening hand was laid
 Within poor Richard's grasp ;—
 And when he stooped for one last kiss,
 He took his dying gasp.

It crazed his brain, poor Richard rose
 A maniac fierce and wild,
 Who mouthed, and muttered every where,
 About a murdered child."
 "And well he might," young Eva said,
 "For conscience, day by day,
 Commenced that retribution here,
 That filled him with dismay.

Unwedded, but a mother grown,
 Poor Lucy pressed her child,
 With blushing cheek and drooping lid,
 And lip that never smiled.
 Their wants were few ; but Richard's purse
 Must buy them daily bread,
 And fain would Lucy have been laid
 In silence with the dead.

For want, and scorn, and blighted fame
 Had done the work of years,
 And oft she knelt in lowly prayer
 In penitence and tears—

That undesired child of shame,
Brought comfort to her heart,
A childlike smile to her pale lip,
By its sweet baby art.

And yet, as years their passage told,
Faint shadows slowly crept
Upon the blighted maiden's mind,
That oft she knelt and wept
Unknowing why, her wavy form
So thin and reed-like grew,
And so appealing her blue eyes,
They tears from others drew.

Years passed away, and, Lucy's child
A noble stripling grown ;
A daring boy with chesnut hair,
And eyes of changing brown,
Had won the love of every heart,
So gentle was his air—
All felt, whate'er might be his birth,
A stainless heart was there.

The boy was missing, none could tell
Where last he had been seen ;—
They searched the river many a day,
And every forest screen—
But never more his filial voice
Poor Lucy's heart might cheer ;
Pale in her grief, and dull with woe,
She never shed a tear.

And every day, whate'er the sky,
With head upon her knees,
And hair neglected, streaming out
Upon the passing breeze,
She sat beneath a slender tree
That near the river grew,
And on the stream its pendent limbs
Their penciled shadows threw.

The matron left her busy toil,
And called the child from play,
And gifts for that lone mourner there
She sent with him away.
The boy with nuts and fruit returned,
He sought in forest deep,
A portion of his little store
Would for poor Lucy keep.

That tree with wonder, all beheld,
Its growth was strange and rare ;
The wintry winds, that wailing passed,
Scarce left its branches bare,
And round its roots a verdant spot
Knew neither change nor blight,
And so poor Lucy's resting place
Was always green and bright.

Some said its bole more rapid grew
From Lucy's bleeding heart,
For, sighs from out the heart, 'tis said,
A drop of blood will start.*

* It is a common belief amongst the vulgar, that a sigh always forces a drop of blood from the heart, and many curious stories are told to that effect ; as, for instance : a man wishing to be rid of his wife, in order to marry one more seductive, promised her the gift of six new dresses, and sundry other articles of female finery, provided she would sigh three times every morning before breakfast, for three months. She complied, and before the time had expired, was in her grave. Many others of a like import might be recorded.

It was an instinct deep and high
That led that mother there,
And that tall tree aspiring grew,
By more than dew or air.

The winds were hushed, the little bird
Scarce gave a nestling sound,
The warm air slept along the hill,
The blossoms drooped around ;
The shrill-toned insect scarcely stirred
The dry and crisped leaf—
The laborer laid his sickle down
Beside the bending sheaf.

A dark, portentous cloud is seen
To mount the eastern sky,
The deep-toned thunder rolling on,
Proclaims the tempest nigh.
And now it breaks with deafening crash,
And lightnings livid glow ;
The torrents leap from mountain crags
And wildly dash below.

Behold the tree ! its strength is bowed,
A shattered mass it lies.
What brings old Richard to the spot,
With wild and blood-shot eyes ?
Poor Lucy's form is lifeless there,
And yet he turns away,
To where a heap of mouldering bones
Beneath the strong roots lay.

Why takes he up, with shrivelled hands,
The riven root and stone,
And spreads them with a trembling haste
Upon each damp, grey bone ?
It may not be, the whirlwind's rage
Again hath left them bare—
Earth hides no more the horrid truth,
A murdered child lies there.

Of wife, and child, and friends bereft—
And all that inward light,
Which calmly guides the white-haired man,
Who listens to the right ;
Old Richard laid him down to die,
Himself his only foe,—
His wronged nature groaning out
Its weight of inward woe."

PART V.

The storm is raging without the dwelling of the widow, but all is tranquil within. Eva hath gone forth in spiritual vision, and beheld the cruelty engendered by wealth and luxury—the cruelty of a selfish and unsympathizing heart. She relates what she has seen to her mother. Certain qualities of the heart are of such a nature, that, when in excess, they shape themselves into appropriate forms, and thus haunt the vision. The injurer is always fearful of the injured. No wrong is ever done with a sense of security ; far less wrong to the innocent and unoffending. The little child is a mystery of gentleness and love, while it is preserved in its own atmosphere ; and it is a fearful thing to turn its young heart to bitterness ; to infuse sorrow and fear, where the elements should be only joy and faith.

The loud winds rattled at the door—
The shutters creaked and shook,
While Eva, by the cottage hearth,
Sat with abstracted look.
With every gust, the big rain-drops
Upon the casement beat,—

How doubly, on a night like this,
Are home and comfort sweet !
The maiden slowly raised her eyes,
And pressed her pallid brow :—
“ Dear mother ! I have been far hence ;
My sight is absent now,—
O mother ! 'tis a fearful thing,
A human heart to wrong—
To plant a sadness on the lip,
Where smiles and peace belong.

In selfishness or callous pride,
The sacred tear to start—
Or lightest finger dare to press
Upon the burdened heart.
And doubly fearful, when a child
Lifts its imploring eye,
And deprecates the cruel wrath
With childhood's pleading cry.

The child is made for smiles and joy,
Sweet emigrant from heaven—
The sinless brow and trusting heart,
To lure us there, were given.
Then who shall dare its simple faith
And loving heart to chill—
Or its meek, upward, beaming eye
With sorrowing tears to fill !

I look within a gorgeous room—
A lofty dame behold—
A lady with forbidding air,
And forehead, high and cold—
I hear an infant's plaintive voice,
For grief hath brought it fears—
None soothe it with a kind caress,
Nor wipe away its tears.

His sister hears with pitying heart
Her brother's wailing cry,
And to the stately matron turns
Her earnest, tearful eye.
‘ O mother, chilling is the air,
And fearful is the night—
Dear brother fears to be alone—
I'll bring him to the light.

On our dead mother hear him call ;
I hear him weeping say,
Sweet mother, kiss poor Eddy's cheek,
And wipe his tears away.’
Red grew the lady's brow with rage,
And yet she feels a strife
Of anger and of terror too,
At thought of that dead wife.

Wild roars the wind, the lights burn blue,
The watch-dog howls with fear—
Loud neighs the steed from out the stall :
What form is gliding near ?
No latch is raised, no step is heard,
But a phantom glides within,—
A sheeted spectre from the dead,
With a cold and leaden skin.

What boots it that no other eye
Beheld the shade appear !
The guilty lady's guilty soul
Beheld it plain and clear,—
It slowly glides within the room,
And sadly looks around—
And stooping, kissed her daughter's cheek,
With lips that gave no sound.

Then softly on the lady's arm
She laid a death-cold hand—
Yet it hath scorched within the flesh
Like to a burning brand.
And gliding on with noiseless foot,
O'er winding stair and hall,
She nears the chamber where is heard
Her infant's trembling call.

She smoothed the pillow where he lay,
She warmly tucked the bed—
She wiped his tears, and stroked the curls
That clustered round his head.
The child, caressed, unknowing fear,
Hath nestled him to rest ;
The mother folds her wings beside—
The mother from the blest.

Fast by the eternal throne of God
Celestial beings stand,—
Beings, who guide the little child
With kind and loving band—
And woe to him who dares to turn
The infant foot aside,—
Or shroud the light that ever should Within his soul abide.”

PART VI.

It is the noon of summer, and the noonday of Eva's earthly existence. She hath held communion with all that is great and beautiful in nature, till it hath become a part of her being ; till her spirit hath acquired strength and maturity, and been reared to a beautiful and harmonious temple, in which the true and the good delight to dwell. Then cometh the mystery of womanhood ; its gentle going forth of the affections seeking for that holiest of companionship, a kindred spirit, responding to all its finer essences, and yet lifting it above itself. Eva had listened to this voice of her woman's nature ; and sweet visions had visited her pillow. Unknown to the external vision, there was one ever present to the soul ; and when he erred, she had felt a lowly sorrow that, while it still more perfected her own nature, went forth to swell likewise the amount of good in the great universe of God. At length Albert Linne, a gay youth, whose errors are those of an ardent and inexperienced nature, rather than of an assenting will, meets Eva sleeping under the canopy of the great woods, and he is at once awed by the purity that enshrouds her. He is lifted to the contemplation of the good—to a sense of the wants of his better nature. Eva awakes and recognizes the spirit that forever and ever is to be one with hers ; that is to complete that mystic marriage, known in the Paradise of God ; that marriage of soul with soul, that demandeth no external right. Eva the pure minded, the lofty in thought, and great in soul, recoiled not from the errors of him who was to be made mete for the kingdom of Heaven, through her gentle agency ; for the mission of the good and the lovely, is not to the good, but to the sinful. The mission of woman, is to the erring of man.

’Tis the summer prime, when the noiseless air
In perfumed chalice lies,
And the bee goes by with a lazy hum
Beneath the sleeping skies :
When the brook is low, and the ripples bright,
As down the stream they go ;
The pebbles are dry on the upper side,
And dark and wet below.

The tree that stood where the soil is thin,
And the bursting rocks appear,

Hath a dry and rusty colored bark,
And its leaves are curled and sear.
But the dog-wood and the hazel bush,
Have clustered round the brook—
Their roots have stricken deep beneath,
And they have a verdant look.

To the juicy leaf the grasshopper clings,
And he gnaws it like a file—
The naked stalks are withering by,
Where he has been erewhile.
The cricket hops on the glistening rock,
Or pipes in the faded moss—
From the forest shade the voice is heard
Of the locust shrill and hoarse.

The widow donn'd her russet robe,
Her cap of snowy hue,
And o'er her staid maternal form
A sober mantle threw ;
And she, while fresh the morning light,
Hath gone to pass the day,
And ease an ailing neighbor's pain
Across the meadow way.

Young Eva closed the cottage door ;
And wooed by bird and flower,
She loitered on beneath the wood,
Till came the noon-tide hour.
The sloping bank is cool and green,
Beside the tinkling rill ;
The cloud that slumbers in the sky,
Is painted on the hill.

The angels poised their purple wings
O'er blossom, brook and dell,
And loitered in the quiet nook
As if they loved it well.
Young Eva laid one snowy arm
Upon a violet bank,
And pillow'd there her downy cheek
While she to slumber sank.

A smile is on her gentle lip,
For she the angels saw,
And felt their wings a covert make
As round her head they draw.
A maiden's sleep, how pure it is !
The soul's inwrought repose—
It enters to its chamber in,
Then onward stronger goes.

A huntsman's whistle, and anon
The dogs come fawning round—
And now they raise the pendent ear,
And crouch along the ground.
The hunter leapt the shrunken brook,
The dogs hold back with awe,
For they upon the violet bank
The slumbering maiden saw.

A reckless youth was Albert Linne,
With licensed oath and jest,
Who little cared for woman's fame,
Or peaceful maiden's rest.
Light things to him, were broken vows—
The blush, the sigh, the tear ;
What binders he should steal a kiss,
From sleeping damsel here ?

He looks, yet stays his eager foot ;
For, on that spotless brow,
And that closed lid, a something rests
He never saw till now ;

He gazes, yet he shrinks with awe
From that fair wondrous face,
Those limbs so quietly disposed,
With more than maiden grace.

He seats himself upon the bank
And turns his face away—
And Albert Linne, the hair-brained youth,
Wished in his heart to pray.
But thronging came his former life,
What once he called delight—
The goblet, oath, and stolen joy,
How palled they on the sight.

He looked within his very soul,
Its hidden chamber saw,
Inscribed with records dark and deep
Of many a broken law.
No more he thinks of maiden fair,
No more of ravished kiss—
Forgets he that pure sleeper nigh
Hath brought his thoughts to this.

Now Eva opes her childlike eyes
And lifts her tranquil head,
And Albert, like a guilty thing,
Had from her presence fled.
But Eva held her kindly hand
And bade him stay awhile ;—
He dared not look upon her eyes,
He only marked her smile ;

And that, so pure and winning beamed,
So calm and holy too,
That o'er his troubled thoughts at once
A quiet charm it threw.
Light thoughts, light words were all forgot—
He breathed a holier air—
He felt the power of womanhood—
Its purity was there.

And soft beneath their silken fringe
Beamed Eva's dovelike eyes—
In hue and softness made to hold
Communion with the skies.
Her gentle voice a part did seem,
Of air, and brook, and bird—
And Albert listened, as if he
Such music only heard.

O Eva ! thou the pure in heart,
Why falls thy trembling voice ?
A blush is on thy maiden cheek,
And yet thine eyes rejoice.
Another glory wakes for thee
Where'er thine eyes may rest ;
And deeper, holier thoughts arise
Within thy peaceful breast.

Thine eyelids droop in tenderness,
New smiles thy lips combine,
For thou dost feel another soul
Is blending into thine.
Thou upward raisest thy meek eyes,
And it is sweet to thee ;
To feel the weakness of thy sex,
Is more than majesty.

To feel thy shrinking nature claim
The stronger arm and brow—
Thy weapons, smiles, and tears, and prayers,
And blushes such as now.
A woman, gentle Eva thou,
Thy lot were incomplete,

Did not all sympathies of soul
Within thy being meet.

Those deep dark eyes, that open brow,
That proud and manly air,
How have they mingled with thy dreams
And with thine earnest prayer!
And how hast thou, all timidly,
Cast down thy maiden eye,
When visions have revealed to thee
That figure standing nigh!

Two spirits launched companionless,
A kindred essence sought—
And one in all its wanderings
Of such as Eva thought.
The good, the beautiful, the true,
Should nestle in his heart—
Should lure him by her gentle voice,
To choose the better part.

Her trusting hand, young Eva laid
In that of Albert Linne,
And for one trembling moment turned
Her gentle thoughts within.
Deep tenderness was in the glance
That rested on his face,
As if her woman-heart had found
Its own abiding place.

And when she turned her to depart
Her voice more liquid fell—
“Dear youth, thy thoughts and mine are one;
When I have said farewell!
Our souls must mingle evermore;—
Thy thoughts of love and me,
Will, as a light, thy footsteps guide
To life and mystery.”

And then she bent her timid eyes,
And as beside she knelt,
The pressure of her sinless lips
Upon his brow he felt.
Low, heart-breathed words she uttered then:
For him she breathed a prayer;—
He turned to look upon her face,—
The maiden was not there.

PART VII.

Eva hath fulfilled her destiny. Material things can no further minister to the growth of her spirit. That waking of the soul to its own deep mysteries—its oneness with another, has been accomplished. A human soul is perfected. Sorrow and pain—hope, with its kin-spirit fear, are not for the sinless. She hath walked in an atmosphere of light, and her faith hath looked within the veil. The true woman, with woman's love and gentleness, and trust and childlike simplicity, yet with all her noble aspirations and spiritual discernments, she hath known them all without sin, and sorrow may not visit such. She ceased to be present—she passed away like the petal that hath dropped from the rose—like the last sweet note of the singing-bird, or the dying close of the wind harp. Eva is the lost pleiad in the sky of womanhood. Has her spirit ceased to be upon the earth? Does it not still brood over our woman hearts?—and doth not her voice blend ever with the sweet voices of Nature? Eva, mine own, my beautiful, I may not say farewell.

’Twas night—bright beamed the silver moon,
And all the stars were out;
The widow heard within the dell
Sweet voices all about.

The loitering winds were made to sound
Her sinless daughter's name,
While to the roof a rare toned-bird
With wondrous music came.

And long it sat upon the roof
And poured its mellow song,
That rose upon the stilly air,
And swelled the vales along.
It was no earthly thing she deemed,
That, in the clear moonlight,
Sat on the lowy cottage roof,
And charmed the ear of night.*

The sun is up, the flowrets raise
Their folded leaves from rest;
The bird is singing in the branch
Hard by its dewy nest.
The spider's thread, from twig to twig,
Is glittering in the light—
With dew-drops has the web been hung
Through all the starry night.

Why tarries Eva long in bed,
For she is wont to be
The first to greet the early bird,
The waking bud to see?
Why stoops her mother o'er the couch
With half suppressed breath,
And lifts the deep-fringed eyelid up?—
That frozen orb is death.

Why raises she the small pale hand,
And holds it to the light?
There is no clear transparent hue
To meet her dizzy sight.
She holds the mirror to her lips
To catch the moistened air:—
The widowed mother stands alone
With her dead daughter there.

And yet so placid is the face,
So sweet its lingering smile,
That one might deem the sleep to be
The maiden's playful wile.
No pain the quiet limbs had racked,
No sorrow dimm'd the brow—
So tranquil had the life gone forth,
She seemed but slumbering now.

They laid her down beside the brook
Upon the sloping hill,

* We are indebted to the Aborigines for this beautiful superstition. The Indian believes that if the wekolis or whippoorwill alights upon the roof of his cabin and sings its sweet plaintive song, it portends death to one of its inmates. The omen is almost universally regarded in New-England. The author recollects once hearing an elderly lady relate with singular pathos an incident of the kind. She was blest with a son of rare endowments and great piety. In the absence of his father he was wont to minister at the family altar; and unlike the stern practices of the Pilgrims, from whose stock he was lineally descended, he prostrated himself in prayer in the lowliest humility. It was touching to hear his clear low voice, and see his spiritual face while kneeling at this holy duty.

One quiet moonlight night while thus engaged, the mother's heart sank within her to hear the plaintive notes of the whippoorwill blending with the voice of prayer. It sat upon the roof and continued its song long after the devotions had ceased. The tears rushed to her eyes, and she embraced her son in a transport of grief. She felt it must be ominous. In one week he was borne away, and the daisies grew, and the birds sang over his grave.

And that strange bird with its rare note,
Is singing o'er her still.
The sunlight warmer loves to rest
Upon the heaving mound,
And those unearthly blossoms spring,
Uncultured from the ground.

There Albert Linne, an altered man,
Oft bowed in lowly prayer,
And pondered o'er those mystic words
Which Eva uttered there.
That pure compassion, angel-like,
Which touched her soul when he,
A guilty and heart-stricken man,
Would from her presence flee.
Her sinless lips from earthly love,
So tranquil and so free ;
And that low fervent prayer for him,
She breathed on bended knee.
As Eva's words and spirit sank
More deeply in his heart,
Young Albert Linne went forth to act
The better human part.

Nor yet alone did Albert strive ;—
For, blending with his own,
In every voice of prayer or praise
Was heard young Eva's tone.
He felt her lips upon his brow,
Her angel form beside ;
And nestling nearest to his heart,
Was she, THE SPIRIT-BRIDE.

The Sinless Child, with mission high,
Awhile to earth was given,
To show us that our world should be
The vestibule of Heaven.
Did we but in the holy light
Of truth and goodness rise,
We might communion hold with God
And spirits from the skies.

THE 'WHISKER' ORDER.

Beards, the nearer that they tend
To the earth, become more reverend :
As cannons shoot the longer stretches,
The lower you let down their breeches.—Butler.

To T. W. WHITE, Esq.

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

SIR,—A history of the various transformations, to which the human hair has been subjected by the capricious edicts of fashion, would compose a very amusing book ; nor would the kindred subject of beards be less fruitful of interest to the curious antiquary. This venerable appendage has, indeed, been the sport of some singular revolutions. A world of learning might be displayed in tracing its "decline and fall"—its origin, its progress—the numberless persecutions it has endured from the prejudices and the tyranny of man—its temporary obscuration for nearly a century past—and its wonderful resuscitation at the present time, when it has sprouted forth with a vigor augmented by the severe pruning, to which it has been so long unjustly exposed. I have not opportunity to explore a field so varied and extensive ; nor, to confess the truth, is my erudition (as the learned Dominie Sampson would say) adequate to the arduous task ; but the arbitrary attempt, which, I understand, was lately made by a high dignitary of our land, to curtail and cripple this ancient ornament of the human face, by consigning one moiety of its spreading honors to the tender mercies of the razor, induces me, in default of an abler advocate, to stand forth in its defence, and to vindicate its present dimensions by an appeal to the uniform practice of former ages, through every successive phasis of society.

A certain clergyman, not indeed the most enlightened of his calling, having been sworn to testify in a court of justice, premised the delivery of his evidence with the following formal exordium. "I shall," said he, as if he were about to analyze a text, "divide my testimony into three heads : in the first place, I shall not pretend to repeat the exact words of the parties ; in the second place, I shall endeavor to come as near them as I can ; and third and lastly, I shall be lengthy."

Now, like this methodical divine, I am a great friend to logical order and arrangement ; and I shall, therefore, consider the subject proposed, historically, analytically and politically ; politics being, now-a-days, a condiment as essential to give pungency in the productions of the literary caterer, as pepper and salt, are to impart a relish to the chef-d'œuvres of cookery. Indeed, such, I believe is the condition of the public palate from over-doses of this agreeable stimulant, that

Its relish grown callous almost to disease,
Who peppers the highest is surest to please.

I shall not, at present, disclose the extent, to which I mean to carry the principle contained in the third branch of our worthy clergyman's testimony ; but I shall imitate in this respect, the policy of other prudent hucksters, who cautiously conceal an approaching glut of the market, lest they impair the value of their own wares. It were, indeed, impossible to foresee into what vagaries imagination may be seduced on a theme so fruitful in sportive fancies, or what collateral disquisitions may become necessary to illustrate the main subject of inquiry. To impose a limit on my speculations were to surrender the freedom, so essential to the unfettered exercise of the faculties—to put gyves upon the mind—to convert its elastic bound, its natural and graceful curvetings, into the "forced gait of a shuffling nag."

I cannot conceive a "more lame and impotent conclusion" than the finale of an orator trammelled by the famous one hour rule—compelled to "check his thunder in mid volley," by the chilling annunciation that the brief hour has expired—struck down "with his arm aloft, extended like eternal Jove when guilt brings down the thunder"—his lips suddenly sealed up with the shout of victory thrilling on his tongue—cut off in ~~one~~ of his most brilliant ebullitions of rhetoric, perhaps in the midst of a sentence, with the "burning words" congealed, as it were, in his mouth—brought "plumb down" from his empyrean height, by the iron tongue of the clock tolling the knell of his new-fledged speech, while yet "instinct with life," and pruning its pinions for a still loftier flight. I thank my stars, that you have not yet sanctioned, by your practice, this modern enormity; and, that I may speak out my speech in your pages, without fear of interruption from either the clock or the chairman. But in order to do so, I must begin; for, if I waste more time in these preliminaries, I may share the fate of the boy, who, to make sure of leaping a ditch, took the run of a mile, and fainted before reaching the point, from which he was to spring. Let us proceed then, without further preamble, to the discussion of those weighty matters, which I have, perhaps too rashly, undertaken to handle.

I lay it down as a fundamental proposition, that man was originally a bearded animal—that he came into existence, full-fledged; as it were, accoutred with his entire complement of hair—and that, though, from an ungrateful caprice, he may sometimes have denied the value of this great bounty of nature, yet there lurks in his heart, an innate veneration, an instinctive attachment to it; which, in spite of artificial restraints and casual fashions, must ultimately reestablish its former ascendancy.

Whenever the human face emerges from that thick cloud, which envelopes the early transactions of the world, we find it clothed with this primitive, and honorable covering. If we consult the remotest records of authentic history, whether sacred or profane, we discover that the beard was cherished and revered by all nations; and, that its bushy ringlets, in those unsophisticated times, were suffered to descend in all their native luxuriance, untouched by tonsonial scissors, or deceitful razor. It was countenanced alike by the ancient patriarchs, the superstitious Egyptian, the ingenuous Greek, and the austere Roman.

To swear by one's beard was the deepest pledge of veracity; and no higher indignity could be offered than to pluck, or disarrange it. Beards saved the Roman Senate, until some whiskerless barbarian, in sacrelegious admiration stroked down the sacred appendage. The mere touch of this barbarous hand was a mortal offence to the assembled wisdom of that enlightened nation. Aaron gloried in his beard; and Samson in his hair. Samuel, and all the razor-hating sect of Nazarites, wore their unshorn locks as the outward and visible sign of the Divine favor. Even to this day, Mr. Peterkin, and many an 'old salt' of the sea, wear their queues—unless 'cut off by the previous question,' or the order of the late secretary, as an appendage of peculiar veneration. And, in such esteem, has the beard been held, that it was universally regarded as the appropriate emblem of wisdom, and all who preferred the slightest pretensions to learning or philosophy, claimed it as their peculiar appendage.

The benighted pagans imagined, that no sacrifice more acceptable could be offered on the altars of their idolatry, than the first fruits of the chin; and, even in more modern times, christian churches have deemed the shape and appearance of the beard, a matter of the most vital importance. Councils were held to determine whether it should be peaked, or round, or forked, or square, or whether it should be abolished altogether as a sinful indulgence; and thus it became the badge of parties, and a source of the most bitter and implacable dissensions. Though religious zeal in the nineteenth century expends its energies on subjects less frivolous, and more appropriate than the sacerdotal tonsure, and justly regards the minutia of personal decoration as beneath the dignity of its notice; yet, such is the instinctive passion of men for these vanities, that we sometimes see, even at this day, Ministers of the Gospel of Peace whiskered like Austrian Pandoors, and whistling the word of God through the overshadowing bristles with a shrillness and ferocity quite terrifying to the more nervous part of their congregations. Were we to judge from the formidable aspect of these reverend gentlemen, we should conclude that they came "to murder, not to heal"—to wield the sword of flesh—to "cry havoc, and let loose the dogs of war," instead of breathing the soft accents of peace and consolation. Now, though I look upon this parasitical growth of the human chin with a veneration almost as superstitious as that cherished by our ancestors for the sacred mistletoe; yet, I insist that there should be some congruity, at least, between a man's costume and his profession; else there must be a total confusion of ranks and occupations.

The predominance of beards at an era so remote, demonstrates the fact, that they were coeval with the first feeble beginnings of society; and hence it is a reasonable conclusion, that they were designed by nature for the comfort and ornament of man. It is clear, that they impart dignity to the human countenance; and, even with respect to brute animals, it may be observed, that those, whose muzzles are invested with this imposing excrescence, are distinguished by the sedate and imperturbable gravity of their demeanor.

A learned Scotch philosopher has written an elaborate treatise to prove, that man is nothing but a reclaimed monkey gradually improved in character and appearance by the refining touch of civilization; and, in support of his theory, he analyzes with much minuteness the manners and customs of some of our supposed kindred, who are still cracking cocoa-nuts in the woods of Sumatra, unconscious of their slumbering capacities. Now, I acknowledge the justice of that noble sentiment of the ancient poet, homo sum, et nil humanum alienum a me puto; and I am therefore surprised, that some of our benevolent societies, in their anxious solicitude for the welfare of distant nations, have not, on the faith of these sagacious speculations, engaged in some enterprise to civilize and instruct this parent stock of the human race. Surely the natural man, yet untainted by the usages and superstitions of artificial society, would be far more docile than the fierce Indian, the depraved Hindoo, or the dissolute Polynesian.

From a careful investigation of comparative anatomy, the ingenious philosopher above mentioned, has inferred, with great semblance of reason, that the human form was once garnished with a tail, which, in process of time, has been worn off by our sedentary habits; but this argument a posteriori (as Dr. Johnson, with all his horror of a pan, was tempted to call it) is scarcely more cogent to establish our affinity to the monkey tribe, than that to be derived from our innate predilection for whiskers. Pug, though he may sometimes make experiments on others for his private amusement, has an invincible repugnance to the use of the razor on his own jaws; and the only instance, in which he has been known to attempt such an operation on himself, had, if legends speak truth, a most tragic termination. It may be argued, therefore, with great plausibility, that our immemorial devotion to the beard strongly corroborates the hypothesis of Lord Monboddo; for, as puss, metamorphosed into a young lady, could not resist the impulse of her original nature when she saw a mouse run across the floor; on the same principle, it may be affirmed, the inborn propensities of the monkey manifest themselves in the care, with which, for so many ages, men have cultivated the hairy covering of the face.

But this is not all. Evidence seems to thicken, the farther we push our inquiries. It is an undoubted fact, that when the human skin has been exposed for a length of time to the action of the elements, nature beneficently supplies the deficiency of covering by a luxuriant coat of hair; an indubitable proof, that all artificial clothing, from Adam's vine-leaves to our modern inexpressibles, is a superfluous and flagrant innovation on the original laws of creation. It is true, that this native and homely vesture has mouldered away insensibly under the enervating integuments of human invention; and fashion now forbids us to appear in these puris naturalibus of the primitive ages,

When wild in woods the noble savage ran;
but it cannot be doubted, that were our beards debarred from the genial influences of light and air, they would vanish, in like manner, from the human visage. Is it not plain then, that, before the introduction of dress, man, in his external appearance, must have been nearly assimilated to the monkey!

And this inference, from reasoning a priori, finds abundant confirmation in the traditional accounts* of satyrs and foresters, with whom, it is said, the earth was formerly infested. These creatures were not altogether fabulous, but were, doubtless, monkeys in the transition, or chrysalis state.

It has been well said, that the various departments of human knowledge are always found, when thoroughly explored, to furnish mutual support and illustration. This account of the origin of man, accordingly, gives unexpected verisimilitude to the supposition of a learned commentator on the Bible, that Satan did not appear to our first mother in the disgusting form of a serpent, but in the more engaging guise of an ourang outang. On the principles of Lord Monboddo, nothing seems more probable than that, in the prosecution of a plan to seduce Eve from the path of duty, the father of sin should assume the figure of a kindred race in order to pursue his machinations with the greater prospect of success. So far from rejecting his Lordship's speculations as the offspring of skepticism, Doct. Clark, mindful of their remarkable coincidence with his own views, would have embraced them, I doubt not, as in perfect harmony with the Mosaical account of creation.

After all that has been said of the vaunted dignity of human nature, it must be confessed, that man, divested of the adventitious advantages of dress, is a poor shivering creature, a sprawling featherless biped, not much more comely and imposing in his appearance than those wild denizens of the forest, from whom our Scotch philosopher so confidently derives his extraction. When we consider his uncouth figure, his imperfect speech, and his disgusting habits in the ruder stages of society, it requires no great stretch of imagination to conceive, that he might have once gathered nuts, swung from tree to tree, and chattered unintelligible gibberish, like his supposed prototype. Yet however cogent the reasoning, and striking the analogies by which it is sustained, my pride revolts at the idea of admitting a theory so degrading to mankind. I cannot recognize, as my ancestor, a long-tailed animal, whose greatest performances could scarcely entitle him to preferment among a company of dancers on the slack-rope. The author of this new genealogical tree, where the propositus is a long-armed ape, is, in truth, a crazy metaphysician, deranged by too much learning, and fond of groping in the crepusculous obscurity of those immense regions, that lie beyond the extreme boundaries of human knowledge. He is not entitled even to the merit of originality; for the germ of his hypothesis is evidently discernible in the Yahoos of that vera-cious traveller, Capt. Lemuel Gulliver. As to those coincidences in the aspect and usages of men and monkeys, on which he lays so much stress, they are easily susceptible of another explanation. It is an old adage, that "evil communication corrupts good manners;" and, as man is an imitative animal, it may well be supposed, that, in his early association with the beasts of the field and the forest, he adopted some of their habits and practices.

Discarding then all far-fetched speculations and conjectures derogatory to human nature, I conceive that the beard was bestowed as an appropriate and friendly skreen to the more insignificant part of the human countenance, giving breadth and dignity to its sharp outlines and inexpressive features; and that the care lavished upon it in the early ages of the world, was the impulse of an original principle implanted, at his first creation, in the character of man. It is no new opinion, that a man's sagacity is commensurate to the longitude of his beard; and, indeed, when it is considered that, where nature has either sparingly imparted, or altogether withheld her bounty in this particular, men have exhibited an incorrigible fierceness, or incurable stupidity, it may well be affirmed, that the potentiality, if not the actual possession of that appendage, is uniformly conjoined to that constitution of mind, which has given rise to all the inventions, discoveries, and improvements of civilized society. Is it not strange then, that this venerable adjunct of the human chin should wane and dwindle with the advance of refinement, when, in truth, it should be honored by the civilized man as his distinguishing feature, and peculiar attribute?

But beards are, also, the outward and visible sign of hilarity and good cheer, and one of their most enlivening accompaniments; for it was well said and sung in the olden time that

It is merry in hall
When beards wag all.

Hence we plainly derive the name as well as the practice of waggery; since nothing gives such point to a jest or facetious tale as to repeat it with an unmoved and solemn aspect; and mirth is never half so uproarious, as when the Momus of the company, by the gentle agitation of his beard, announces, that the mask of pretended gravity may be thrown aside, and that his bursting hearers may, without further resistance, abandon themselves to the full tide of suppressed risibility. Now here is an etymology as palpable as any in the Diversions of Purley, which demonstrates the early and intimate association between beards and the display of wit and humor, and that they are worn with equal propriety by the laughing, as by the weeping philosopher. The figure of one of these whiskered wags, equipped with a cigar whose burning extremity is buried in the clustering hair, while ever and anon he emits, from some hidden aperture, volumes of smoke, like the shaft of a deserted coal-mine in full conflagration, or the crater of a half-extinguished volcano, is the very picture of good-fellowship, and sufficient of itself to set the table in a roar. How true is the remark of Bonaparte, that there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous.

Possessed of such multiplied claims to the gratitude and the countenance of man, the beard, in various forms, continued to maintain a fluctuating authority in modern Europe, till the Reformation, which overthrew all old opinions and usages, threatened to uproot even this precious heritage of antiquity from the human visage. From that time it languished and shrank in all protestant countries. On the continent, indeed, it still retained some faint relics of its former grandeur; but in England and its dependencies, the encroaching razor had, by the middle of the last century, nearly denuded the human physiognomy of its last remaining hair. Still the ghost of a whisker, thin and shadowy, might sometimes be seen to haunt the withered cheek of some superannuated beau, like a disembodied spirit yet lingering in the scenes of its earthly enjoyment. A face of desolation then succeeded, unchecked by a solitary tuft of hair to relieve the dreary waste; and the diminished beard, driven from its last foothold, and shorn of its former glories, found a partial refuge from the fury of its enemies, in the casual protection of the rude soldier, the despised mendicant, and unbelieving Jew. Yet even in this lowest state of depression and contempt, it was preparing, with a power of renovation which nothing could subdue,

To repair its drooping head,
And trick its beams, and with new-spangl'd ore
Flame on the visage of ungrateful man.

The revival of letters was preceded by a long period of intellectual darkness, and the restoration of the beard to its ancient honors was foreshadowed by a similar eclipse. Some years since, the expounders of signs and portents were greatly at a loss to decypher the meaning of that surprising shower of meteors, which "with fear of change" dismayed the inhabitants of this continent; but it is now evident, without the aid of an interpreter, that this singular phenomenon only prefigured the approaching descent of our banished beards from the "lunar sphere,"

Since all things lost on earth are treasur'd there. Thus announced by prodigies, this imperishable fungus, within the last fifteen years, has suddenly shot forth, both in this country and Europe, with astonishing exuberance, and, by a strange inversion of the order of nature, overspread the faces of the young and middle-aged, leaving the cheek of stubborn age to wither in comfortless and barren nakedness.

"I was born," said Sir John Falstaff, "about three of the clock in the afternoon, with a white beard, and something of a round belly." Judging from the enormous masses of hair sported by some of our youth, who to all appearance have just chipped the shell, I should imagine, that they had been equally precocious in the development of their whiskers with the jovial knight. When I behold one of these youthful Esaus garnished on either cheek with a coat of bristles, whose thick shadow threatens almost to extinguish the light of his countenance, and groaning like Issachar between two burthens, I am compelled to believe that this portentous growth was coeval with his birth—that it sprung into existence, like Minerva, complete and perfect in all its proportions, totus, teres atque rotundus. Here then, if it were before doubtful, is conclusive proof of the march of mind; since the type of wisdom has, by a retrograde movement, disappeared from its accustomed seat on the cheek of age, and migrated to the chin of boyhood. Who can question, that a youth of twenty, with a beard, which Aristotle might have envied, is gifted with higher capacities, and entitled to more reverence and respect, than the smooth-shaved ancient, the meagre covering of whose shrivelled lip furnishes a scanty harvest to the exploded razor? And yet there are some so blinded by prejudice as to controvert this self-evident proposition!

A gentleman of the past age, who has unhappily survived the obsolete customs of his contemporaries, was dilating to an acquaintance on the liberality of a friend of his, who had furnished a son with a generous advancement to enable him to push his fortune in the South-west. This young man, after remaining some years in the El-Dorado of the United States, returned to Virginia. Did he bring back much money? was the natural inquiry. Nothing but his whiskers was the sneering reply. Now had this gentleman put a proper estimate on the value of this derided acquisition, he would have known, that the expansion of mind, of which it was the symbol, was well purchased by this young man with the expenditure of his patrimony.

In resuming its rightful dominion among our contemporaries, the beard has not been compelled, like other deposed sovereigns, to submit to any abridgement of its prerogatives. What with whiskers, imperials, and mustachios, aut quocunque alio nomine gaudent, the office of the razor has become a sinecure, and the neglected mouth, as Hood would say, has been hair-metically sealed.

Comæ steterunt et vox faucibus hæsit.

As extremes beget each other, there is now manifest danger that the tongue will fall into desuetude, and that the disciples of this new school of philosophy, like the hermit of the Arabian tale, can only be restored to the use of speech by a timely application of the scissors. It must be an amusing spectacle to behold a circle of these modern wise men sitting with mute solemnity, like an assemblage of Quakers, or Indian magi, till the "glittering forfex" has broken the spell of silence, and opened a vent to their imprisoned eloquence. To facilitate the removal of such untoward impediments, the modern exquisite will find the simple implement of female industry, above-mentioned, as essential an article in his dressing apparatus, as his watch-guard, his quizzing glass, or his perfume box. Now this curb upon the cacoethes loquendi, will impose a very slight inconvenience on the military part of our community, since it is their province to deal in action rather than words; but it would be a most woful catastrophe, if one of our great debaters, big with a speech of three days, should have his lips inextricably entangled at the very moment when the furor of disputation had descended upon him. Some facetious writer, (Rabelais, I believe,) gives an account of a city, which was blown up by sneezing, and there are not a few, who believe that our Republic will be overthrown by the insatiable rage of discussion. These prophets of evil suppose, that the people, wearied with perpetual wrangling where nothing is done or decided, will at length take refuge from this tempest of unprofitable debate in a government of energy and action. I am not willing to anticipate an end so inglorious to our institutions; yet, I confess, the hypothesis wears an air of plausibility. To guard against the worst, I propose that our orators adopt the present fashion of beards, and thus close up effectually the channel, through which this flood of evils may burst into the body politic. Let it be an established rule, that ultraism in this particular shall be an indispensable qualification for a seat in our deliberative assemblies, and there may be some hope of a peaceful, orderly, and expeditious administration of public affairs.

If there be a heretic so obstinate as to question, after this review, the utility and antiquity of beards, I might well abandon him to his own devices, as a creature equally impassive to fact or argument. But I have yet another consideration to urge, which must carry conviction to the most prejudiced understanding. I shall insist, that beards are not only a comfortable and dignified appendage, but that they have been planted on the human face in obedience to the clear dictates of moral duty. In defining the principle of virtue, some able writers on ethics allege, that it consists in living according to nature. Now it is evident, that, in a state of nature, the beard is suffered to vegetate and expand without restraint, or curtailment, and that the inroads made upon it, have all been the result of artificial customs and inventions. Does it not follow, then, that whether we capriciously impair its native proportions, or wantonly abolish it, we depart from nature, and, to that extent, infringe the principle of virtue? Let it not be forgotten, that all the great teachers of morals in ancient times from Zoroaster to Aristotle, acknowledged, in practice, their sense of this paramount obligation ; and shall a degenerate smockfaced modern, with his stunted starveling whiskers, venture to deride it ? I disdain to reply to those captious objectors, who insinuate that, if we live according to nature, we must discard all the "means and appliances" of dress—all the inventions and refinements of civilization ; but could I stoop to refute such frivolous sophistry, I might maintain, on the authority of some ingenious and eloquent writers, that the savage is vastly superior to the civilized man in every moral qualification, and that all our boasted improvements have served only to aggravate our toils by the unnecessary multiplication of our wants. The progress of society, therefore, has plainly corrupted our native simplicity, and, as the price of knowledge, robbed us of our innocence.

I might write volumes on this fruitful theme. I might show how largely poetry is indebted to the human beard for its finest epithets and allusions ; even the golden tresses of woman, have scarcely furnished to the muse more copious materials of embellishment. I might enlarge on its convenience in designating individuals, and insist on the superior elegance of distinguishing men by the size, shape, and color of the beard, when compared to the vulgar cognomens of big foot, long nose, cross-eye, and such like coarse appellatives, by which we are so frequently offended. But I forbear, and, in mercy to your readers, shall pass on to a kindred subject.

The flowing locks, which, after a long interregnum, have, of late, reasserted their supremacy on the human temples, lay claim to a lineage not less ancient and honorable. Without entering deeply into their history, it is evident, that they were universally esteemed by all ancient nations—that as far back as the luxuriant tresses of Absalom, which proved so fatal to that aspiring youth, they were worn by the princely and the noble—and that, in the middle ages, they were deemed the peculiar ornament of a freeman and a gentleman ; while a shaven crown, except among the clergy, was the distinguishing characteristic of servitude. Even in more modern times, the love-locks of the cavalier were carried to such excess as to provoke the unsparing animadversion of the self-denying puritans. At length the combined influence of fashion and fanaticism stripped the human head of its waving tresses ; and, for nearly a century, our ancestors were content to expose their bare polls, shaven like that of a malefactor, or sheltered under the adventitious covering of an enormous peruke. The wigs and huge artificial queues of that age of baldness, serve to prove how deep a hold our natural locks had taken on the human heart, and how necessary they are, like ballast in a balloon, to preserve the equilibrium of the system. Indeed, it would seem as if a certain quantum of hair were indispensable to us ; for, it is a remarkable fact, that its increase or decline, in any direction, is always counterbalanced by a corresponding diminution or extension in the opposite hemisphere of the cranium.

From whatever cause this strange propensity, which prevailed during the last century, to substitute a load of artificial hair for our native tresses, proceeded, it gave rise occasionally to some very ludicrous mischances. A gentleman of that time, who harbored some matrimonial projects, paid a visit to a family where there were several handsome young ladies ; and, to render his person the more comely and acceptable to the object of his devoirs, he engrafted on his own short hair, according to the fashion of the day, a queue of prodigious dimensions. At night, he neglected the precaution of removing this unaccustomed incumbrance, and, being somewhat restless after he retired to bed, the ligaments, which secured it, unluckily gave way. In tossing about, he happened to lay his hand on this formidable bundle of hair nicely wrapped with black ribbon, and, in the confusion of the moment, imagined, that he had come in contact with a serpent. Springing up in the utmost consternation, he summoned the family to aid in the destruction of the tremendous reptile, which had so strangely thrust itself into his bed ; his chamber was instantly filled with a throng of half-clad menials armed with such implements as they could snatch up in the hurry of their alarm. While one held a light, and another, with trembling caution, drew down the bed-clothes, the residue of the combined forces stood around, with uplifted weapons, ready to pounce down on the first glimpse of the intruder ; when lo ! there was revealed to their astonished vision, no boa constrictor, nor rattlesnake, but the veritable queue lying quiet and unoffending on the very spot where its master had left it. The gentleman could not stand the ridicule of such a discovery, and silently evacuated Flanders the next morning.

But it is a most important inquiry how these fashions are relished by the fair sex. It might be thought, at first view, that such delicate creatures would as soon "kiss a bunch of thistles," as one of these hairy prodigies—that it would be "out of all reasonable match" to betray a tender maiden of sixteen, with her breath redolent of sweets, and the fresh down of the peach just blushing on her cheek, into the arms of a satyr loaded on each temple with huge masses of hair, that reduce his visage to a mere profile—bearded up to the very snout—with bristles standing out "like quills upon the fretful porcupine," and reeking with their own grease.

Faugh ! "give me a little civet to sweeten my imagination." The civet, however, would be more german to the whiskers. If any one, unpractised in the mysteries of womankind, should imagine, that female taste would revolt at the approach of a lover of this description, I fear he will find himself egregiously mistaken. Indeed, it is remarkable, that, though these hideous accessories to the human face often strike terror into the ranks of an enemy, they have never been known to shake the nerves of the most timorous maiden with the slightest alarm. Whether it be, that the ladies suppose these hairy constellations, like an assemblage of asterisks, significant of some hidden meaning, which, with characteristic curiosity, they are eager to penetrate; or, that they are the outward tokens of courage, a quality peculiarly fascinating to woman; it is certain, that they have always found the most flattering acceptance with the fair sex.

"Having now," said a Kentucky orator, "got through the argument, I shall proceed to the pathetic." In like manner, having disposed of these preliminary matters, I shall now consider my subject in its political aspects, which I have reserved as a dessert to regale my readers after the fatigues of so dry a dissertation.

To begin methodically, and according to the most approved precedents in political discussion—I hold it to be the imprescriptible, unalienable, indefeasible, and constitutional right, of every citizen, to train his natural ringlets, in such fashion, and to mould his beard into such figure, as may suit his own humor, without let, molestation, or hindrance either from rulers, or individuals. I maintain, that any attempt to add or subtract a single hair from the human head by sheer authority, is a palpable and dangerous infraction of our organic law; and that, consequently, when our late Secretary of the Navy, by his simple ipse dixit, condemned to the razor "at one fell swoop," a moiety of the whiskers, which embellish the faces of our gallant Naval officers, (hiatus maxime deflendus) he aimed a deadly blow at our institutions; and, to that extent, has he shorn us of our liberties. The executive, it is said, has already usurped the control of the purse and the sword; and, if that of the razor be superadded, I know not how we can resist its future encroachments on our persons and pockets.

I have always admired the firmness of that stout old officer, who, when Gen. Wilkinson, with a tyranny like that of Procrustes, commanded the excision of his queue, not only resisted, with the spirit of a Hamden, this curious application of military discipline during his life, but resolved not to acquiesce in such a palpable invasion of his rights even in death; he directed, with his last breath, that he should be buried face downward, that a hole should be bored in the top of his coffin, through which this cherished excrescence should be drawn, uncropped and unconfined, waving defiance to his persecutor, and standing forth as a beacon to the oppressed.

It cannot be doubted that our Navy will furnish many prepared to imitate this noble example, and equally determined to maintain the integrity of their whiskers, neither curtailed by the fiat of a pragmatical martinet, nor "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd" even by the narrow limits of their last mansion. There is not one, I should suppose, so poor-spirited as to yield without a struggle, the fruit of so much care and cultivation, or who, with the simplicity of the lamb,

Pleas'd to the last, would tend the admiring fair,
And kiss the hand just rais'd to sheer his hair.

Our late Secretary may rely on it, that, by this bare-faced regulation, he had brought himself into hot water; and, that his resignation was a timely and prudent retreat from the gathering storm. I know but one precedent in history of such a barbarous and indiscriminate invasion of the privileges of the face, and that is furnished by the annals of a despotism. The czar Peter, when he undertook to remodel the institutions of his empire, resolved, among other reforms, to unbeard his subjects. For that purpose, he appointed officers in each city, town, and village, with instructions to bring every chin in his dominions to the standard of his imperial taste; and, if any were so rash as to resist the mandate, to submit the struggling recusant to the compulsory operations of the barber. Never was there such a sudden revolution in the physiognomy of a whole people; and one, formerly conversant in Russia, might have travelled from Petersburg to Kamskatka without recognizing the face of a single acquaintance. Never did the brethren of the pole ply their trade with such unwearied assiduity, nor reap such a rich and abundant harvest. The unfortunate boor, who unthinkingly went to market with a beard, which "seemed a shoebrush stuck beneath his nose," was forthwith transformed, by force of this imperial alchymy, into a new creature, and sent back to his wondering family with a chin as bare and smooth, as that which graces, or rather disgraces, the visage of a youth of fifteen. No matter how deeply the refractory peasant might deplore in secret the loss of this shaggy excrescence, he could not dispute an edict enforced by half a million of bayonets; and thus, the imperial reformer achieved a conquest over his subjects, as difficult, if not so glorious, as his victory in the plains of Pultowa over the Northern Alexander.

In this country we have, happily, no such means of coercion, and our rulers may rest assured, that the officers of the Navy will as soon submit to the severing of their whiskers, as the Jewish mother, by the judgment of Solomon, to the division of her infant. Indeed, such a privation would be as flagrant an infraction of the principle of meum and tuum, as the so much dreaded doctrine of agrarianism. If we cannot claim an exclusive property in our whiskers, I can conceive no solid security for any human possession. I have never heard, that the wildest advocate of an equal partition of property, ever coveted, or proposed a division of beards; nor, can the most inordinate cupidity discern the slightest profit to be derived from the perpetration of such an outrage. Yet our late Secretary goes a bowshot beyond these disorganizers, and, shears in hand, threatens to deprive our gallant officers of that, "which not enriches him, but makes them poor indeed." Aye, leaves them naked.

It is surprising, that some of our politicians, whose vulture-like olfactories snuff the approach of tyranny at the greatest distance, have not noticed this dangerous stretch of authority, and sounded the tocsin of alarm throughout the country. For is it not evident, that this unconstitutional amputation of beards, has an "awful squinting" at decapitation? What citizen can feel his head safe upon his shoulders, when the razor of arbitrary power is thus brandished in his eyes, and at his very throat? When our prime minister, like another Oliver le diable, seizes his reluctant nose, and cuts off, at the same fell stroke, the clustering ringlets, that curl around his chin, and his brightest hopes of matrimonial success? Will our injured officers cry craven under such treatment? and be ready to exclaim in the language of Hamlet,

Who

Plucks off my beard, and blows it in my face?
Tweaks me by the nose? Who does me this?
Why I should take it: for it cannot be
But I am pigeon-livered, and lack gall
To make oppression bitter.

Shade of the martyred Butler, forbid such humiliation! The bankrupt bill, distribution, and the bank, which follow, like the three degrees of comparison, in a terrific climax, are bugbears all, when contrasted with this gigantic stride of usurpation. Those measures propose to put money in our purses; which, according to honest Iago, is an infallible passport to success; while this threatens to strip us by force, the ultima ratio of tyrants, of one of our mostly valuable possessions, without the shadow of an equivalent.

But the worst of the matter is, that, when this deed of oppression has been consummated; and the unconstitutional razor has mowed down the better half of their whiskers from the faces of our gallant officers, the marred and mutilated remnant will remain a thing without a name—a caput mortuum—a non-descript; which, like some of our leading politicians, will be neither fish nor flesh.

By the way, if any "villainous misleader of youth," like Sir John Falstaff, should presume to assert of the politicians aforesaid, that they are amphibious like an otter, and that "no man knows where to have them;" they could reply, I doubt not, with as much truth as Dame Quickly, that "he was an unjust man in saying so," and that "any man knows where to have them."

But to return to the case of our officers; can it be supposed, that they, who have been as distinguished in the fields of Venus as in those of Mars, would venture to exhibit this miserable caricature—this stump of a whisker, too scanty even to hide their blushes, to the derision of the fair sex? This blow,* then, will wound them in the tenderest point; and, if they tamely submit to such an indignity, they must hereafter hide their "diminished heads," in shame and obscurity.

Let not our rulers hug themselves in the fallacious belief, that "the head and front of their offending hath this extent, no more." Let me tell them, that this onslaught on maritime whiskers, is not only an unconstitutional assumption of power, but a most atrocious felony according to the principles of the common law. One of the most heinous offences known to that system of jurisprudence, is denominated Mayhem, which consists in wilfully depriving a citizen of any limb, or member, necessary, or useful in flight. Now I know nothing better calculated to strike an enemy with panic than those prodigious masses of hair, with which military men delight to clothe the nether part of their physiognomy. An Indian warrior, begrimed with paint, is a mild and amiable personage, when you contrast his expression with the truculent and ferocious scowl, that gleams through the thicket of bristles, in which the visage of an American soldier is embosomed. An apparition of "anthropophagi, or men who wear their heads beneath their shoulders," could scarcely be more appalling to men of ordinary mould. Of such a formidable champion it would hardly be extravagant to say,

His whiskered muzzle looks so wondrous grim,
His very shadow is afraid of him.

When, therefore, you disrobe the sailor of these uncouth and terrific appendages, you disarm him of his most potent weapon—you reduce him like Samson shorn of his locks, to the strength and prowess of ordinary men. Is not such a mutilation, therefore, a palpable maiming, according to the strictest definition of the law?

It were a delicate stratagem to shoe
A troop of horse with feet;

exclaimed old Lear in one of those rants, where sense and madness have been so artfully blended by the great master of tragedy. Now an American army, accoutred according to this fashion, might almost realize all the advantages of this insane device: for when the face is enveloped in such an accumulation of hair, the enemy, at a short distance, would be unable to distinguish the inciput from the occiput—the rear from the front; and, consequently, would be at a loss how to make his approaches. Conceive the amazement of a hostile army when, reversing the usual process, our Janus-faced forces, instead of backing out, should, without a single evolution, back right into their line of battle. Such troops would be deemed invincible, because the usual manœuvre of outflanking, and attacking in the rear, would be utterly unavailing against men, who fought with the same facility, whether their backs, or faces were turned to the foe.

It is an established doctrine with military men, that all stratagems are justifiable in war. Now, though an army incog. has not been heard of since Bayes' rehearsal; yet, if this fashion continue to prevail, such a thing will be by no means absurd, or impossible. I have seen some of these hairy gentlemen, whose physiognomy was so completely mystified with beard and mustachios, as to defy the recognition of their most intimate acquaintance. An army, composed of such quaint maskers as these, might elude the scrutiny of the most vigilant enemy, and penetrate into the heart of a hostile country without the slightest suspicion of their character, or designs. The suitability of such a body of men for secret enterprizes, or sudden incursions, must be obvious to the most superficial observer; nor is it necessary to suggest to the practical politician, whose morality never obstructs his designs, how much these disguises facilitate the policy of recognizing acts of aggression when crowned with success, or disavowing them when baffled or defeated. This convenient "coat of darkness," recommends itself especially to that band of disinterested philanthropists, who, without the slightest prospect of personal profit or advantage, are secretly organizing an army for the invasion of Canada, and preparing to carry fire and sword into a peaceful country, in order to force liberty down the throats of the reluctant inhabitants. They have only to prosecute their schemes sub barba, and they possess at once all the privileges of invisibility. When the whiskered offender is enabled, by the sorcery of the barber, to affect, so easily, a metamorphosis as complete as any recorded in the Arabian Nights, or the fables of Ovid, there can be little difficulty in proving an alibi, that never-failing resource for eluding the penalties of the law, or involving the strongest evidence of personal identity in the mists of uncertainty.

Nor are the advantages of the beard, so much vilified and derided by some, who, like the fox with his tail cut off, have not wherewithal to avail themselves of its immunities, confined to military operations. The treacherous politician, the public peculator, the defaulting bank officer, the absconding bankrupt, will find it equally expedient to shelter their disgrace under this friendly disguise, whose broad mantle will not only cover, like charity, the multitude of their sins, but shield them, at the same time, from the clutches of offended justice.

When such are the manifold benefits derived from this ancient covering of the human face, the wonder is, not that it has enjoyed a temporary revival of its popularity, but that any combination of circumstances should have undermined its rightful domination.

THE LONELY PICTURE.

"Un pezzo di cielo caduto in terra."

* * * * * Decay had laid its "effacing fingers" upon the once stately mansion. The long, rank grass pent up the doorway—where were the steps that had once gambolled before it?—The branches of many rose trees, drooping under their fragrant burden, yet bloomed in tangled masses around the casements—where was the hand that had once twined and trained them? The rooms were silent; empty and deserted—where were the merry voices that had once rang in all their joy through the old halls—where the lithe forms that had once graced them? I paused in one, which, perchance, had been "The Lady's Bower." Here the voice of song had perhaps been breathed—"the heart's hushed secret" had been whispered—the dearer vow had been plighted—the first trembling caress had been exchanged—all, all passed away forever!—Against the bare wall there still hung a portrait, ever and anon, swinging to and fro, as the capricious zephyr did toy with it. No gilded frame clasped it, no silken curtain o'ershadowed it—and over its surface the spider had woven its frail, fantastic drapery, which indeed did "break at every breeze;" but nought could dim the beauty, the sad, touching loveliness of that countenance, limned upon the time-worn canvass. Looking upon it, Imagination went back to the hours when the beauteous lady had been the living and moving Divinity of the Temple which, now, her speechless image hallowed—and dwelling upon the faded lineaments, pausing upon each wild fancy which arose before me, my heart sickened, as I thought of the falling away of Hope and Affection—the Genii who only can dispel the murky shadows of this transient existence. Thus I sighed, in response to the dirge-like wind which swept fitfully through the empty apartment. I turned away from the sunlight which streamed through the casement, and, as I bent my steps from the beautiful picture, the echo of my footfall smote upon my heart like a knell—* * * * *

Where mouldering lies the wreck of long past years;
Where Time with heavy step hath roughly past;
Where Desolation stalks, and silence broods;
Why lingerest thou, fair Child of Beauty's self?
Why mak'st thou here thine home? Still doth thine eye
Gleam bright and soft, as in the cloudless years!
And yet were't not a slumbering smile doth hang Upon thy full rich lip, and stir the dimple
Of thy roseate cheek, a starry shower
Of tears might seem to lurk unshed, and bright,
Beneath the fringed lid! So tremulous;
The dewy ray doth quiver on its orb!

Anon the sunbeam, with its golden hand,
Doth toy and dally with thy features fair;
But yet no mild reproof its shadow casts,
Upon the still calm beauty of thy brow,
As if thou chid old Sol, for impious sport.
And now, on viewless wing, comes Zephyrus—
With soft caress he lolls upon thy cheek,
He basks him on thy lip, or strives to stir
One sunny ringlet, 'mid the burnished mass,
That on thy veined temple richly sleeps!
But to his whispered bidding, to his touch,
No answer comes in flush, or brighter ray

Upon thy cheek, or in the shadowy depths
Of thine eye's blue Heaven—nor yet doth move,
Responsive to his wooings, one bright tress
Upon thy forehead fair!—Sunset's rich flush,
And Twilight's shadow—Midnight's mystery,
And the fair Mother of the Winds and Stars,
The Goddess of the Dawn, all, all do come
In train successive to thy lonely home—
With one fixed smile, thou greet'st them ever,
Keeping alway thy vigil o'er the graves
Of household mem'ries—Watcher untiring!

What may thy fate have been? The question springs
Unbidden to my lip. I picture thee
Rich in all blessings, with the wealth of Hope
Winding its glittering coils about thy home,
While Love, the master-spirit of them all,
Reposes 'mid its bowers—and thus, I quench
The truth so dark—Life's story all too sad,
That Grief doth ever seek the rose's heart
To riot on—that summers brightest day
Too often weeps its golden hours to rest—
That tempest's searing breath doth alway blight
The flower, that bloomed where sunlight longest laughed!

But now, I ope the Volume of thy Life,
And scan its records. Fancy lends her light,
Her rainbow-tinted light, to gild the page—
I greet thee in the morning of thy days,
Pausing upon the green and gentle hill,
Which rears itself 'twixt Youth and Womanhood.
The Past, so beautiful which thou hast trod,
Claims from thine eye no tear—brings to thine heart
No sigh. Fair, soft and still, as thine own dreams,
The realm of Memory smiles behind thee—
But softer, and more fair, doth beam the Land,
The Land of Promise, which a Future paints,
Stretching its glittering length before thee!—
Not one silvery, summer cloud or shadow,
Upon the deep blue sky doth sail, or throw Fantastic veil upon the flow'ry earth
It canopies! Nor yet one bud of hope,
But token gives of glorious blossoming!

And dost thou pause alone upon the height,
Viewing Futurity? Sweet Ladye, no!
One stands beside thee, who with softened gaze
Doth feast him ever with thy beauteousness—
So lovingly doth wander o'er thy face
His dark clear eye—as if he had no power
To turn its glance away!—He speaketh now,
And pointeth thee to many a shaded glen
Or sunbright bower, with the Future's land,
Where ye shall wander free, ne'er severing!
Dost thou not list his words? Ah yes! The flush
Of crimson on thy cheek, the dawning smiles
That revel on thy lip, the downcast eye,
Anon half-raised, anon the liquid orb
Drooping beneath the curtained lid, these,
These I mark, and well I ween, thereby
Learneth the youth a tale he joys to read!
I farther yet the scroll of Fate unfurl!
The bridal flower doth kiss thy forehead pale,
The silvery veil doth shade thy changeful cheek,
Thy hand doth hide its tremblings in the clasp
Of his who stands beside thee! The same glance
Of passionate idolatry doth sleep
Within his dark eye's tenderness, as when Together, ye did linger on the Mount,
Which parted a Maturity from Youth.

Years long, but happy, fall into the past—
Young, shining heads do cluster round thy hearth,

A ring of beaming faces ever turn
Their bright and earnest looks of love on thee.
Sweet childhood's group doth gird thee with new ties,
Gilding thy noon of life, and to its eve
Bringing a roscate dye, like morning's ray.
What marvel then, that guarded, circled thus
Thou should'st descend into the vale of years,
Unknowing of regret? The Lover's faith,
The Lover's vow ne'er chilled, nor broken,
Since the Altar's holy rite did bind ye
With ties indissoluble!—Around thee
"Daughters and Sons of Beauty"—a fair band—
A precious boon,—the picture of thy life,
Begun anew!

But o'er my heart
A sadd'ning thought has come, and swept away
The hues with which I decked thy destiny!—
Another leaf I turn in thy Life's Book,
And dwell in tearful thought upon its truths.
Sorrow thou'st known, e'en in thine early day;
Thy youth hath spent itself in tears. Its hopes,
So dearly garnered in their treasure-house,
Have, one by one, drooped, but to die! What power
Had they to wrestle with the mighty host
Of Grief, or stay its dark and rushing tide!
Love's soft and golden dream hath passed away,
And thou hast bent thee o'er the early bier,
Dropping thy heart's-blood in each tear that rained
Upon the damp brow of the Dead!—the face,
Which had been all thy sunlight, in Life's gloom!—
Around thy knee, pillowed upon thy breast,
The lip of childhood has grown pale and cold;
The light of gladness has gone from the eye,
The bloom stol'n from the cheek, the young bright head
Has sunk into the grave! Thus link by link,
Has dropped away the chain of Infancy,—
And now, as 'twere, the only living thing
Amid Death's ravages—a breathing wail
Around the holy silence of the Dead,
Thou stands't alone! another Niobe!—

But still a darker grief thou may'st have known—
The cold world's scorn—its scoff—its heartless taunt—
With all thy purity unseared, undimmed,
Fresh in thine innocence, no thought of guile
Thy seraph life e'er sullying,—still, still
The hot breath of the storm hath scorched thee,
And made for thee this earth, a naked waste!
Then too the task to learn, the heart to school!
Alas! alas! a lesson all too sad!
To hang upon the lip a sparkling smile—
Care's touch to banish from the brow, the eye
To laugh with joy and hope, while thick tears gash
Unbidden to its lid—light, careless words
To breathe, while pent-up sighs forever spring
From the heart's bitterness, and bubble forth
From 'neath its dark, and deep, and turbid waves!
Is 't not wise? For who would cast the sorrows
Of his soul, before the light tribunal
Of the world? there to be toyed with—judged of—
Ne'er felt—forgotten, soon as heard—haply
If e'er remembered, thought of, but to taunt!
Forgive, sweet Ladye, if I blend with thine
My own life's agony! What now to me
Doth seem this fair and smiling earth? Its wealth
Of sun and flowers doth mock my wretchedness—
With youth scarce parted, all its store of hopes
Death or the World hath rifled, and Mem'ry,
Dark Mem'ry, o'ermantles my lone fate
With clouds, I erst, at morning, recked not of.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART III.

Charles, finding many of his soldiers falling ill from their exposure to the sun, and from the impurity of the water which they were compelled to drink, determined, at the advice of Muleasses, from whom he had received much valuable information of the position of Tunis, of the strength of its walls, and of the number of his enemies, immediately to advance, and lay siege to the city. When his resolution was made known, there were found many among his advisers who were strongly opposed to the measure. They stated that the Emperor had obtained glory enough, by taking the castle of Goletta, and destroying the fleet of Barbarossa, without exposing his life, in attempting to get possession of Tunis, which at last he must leave under the dominion of an Infidel, who, only to serve his own ends, had been found to recommend so dangerous and impolitic a movement. Charles having listened to these remarks, and given them that attention which, coming from such wise men, he said they so justly deserved, jestingly observed, that the gun was not yet cast by which an Emperor was to be killed; and that even if it were, he would rather be buried under the sands on which his tent was pitched, than leave his work in Africa half finished, and his enemy in quiet possession of his usurped power.

When a garrison had been left in Goletta, and every preparation made for battle, the Christian army began to move in the following order: On the right, where the road was bordered for its whole extent by groves of olive trees, the Spaniards, under their leader Alarco, were posted; on the left, resting on the lake, were the Italians, under the Prince of Salern; and in the centre, the Germans, under Maxamilian Ebustein. Vastius, who for the day had the chief command, was in the vanguard; while at the rear was the Duke of Alba, who had several companies of choice horsemen with him, to skirmish with the barbarians, who might advance to trouble the army. The Emperor, accompanied by his brother-in-law of Portugal, was at all times riding from one corps to another, and telling his soldiers that he expected them to act as valiant men, determined to conquer the naked Arabs, who were alike the enemies of their God, their religion, and themselves.

For several hours the march of the Christians was conducted with the utmost good order; and it was not until the troops came in sight of some fountains, that they, wholly regardless of the orders of their officers, and the presence of their Emperor, left their ranks, and deserted their standards to quench their parching thirst. So eagerly did they drink, that many fell down and perished while attempting to swallow the water which was yet in their mouths. Tullius Cicero, a distinguished captain, in this way lost his life. When order was restored, which was with much difficulty effected, Vastius again advanced, until he came within three miles of Tunis, when he was met by immense bodies of Moors, Turks, Numidians and Arabs, who were approaching with their flags flying; and who, at the command of Barbarossa, with horrible cries, quickly rushed upon their enemies, and caused a general fight.

The impetuosity of the barbarians could effect nothing against the discipline of the Christians.

Barbarossa perceiving his soldiers were wavering, exposed himself in all parts where the danger was most imminent; and by his example, tried to encourage his friends to remain firm, and continue the battle.

His exertions were vain. A panic had seized his troops; and they, with the loss of a few hundred men, who were mostly slain by the artillery and arquebuses of the Spanish army, were easily routed.

When Barbarossa retreated upon Tunis, he found the gates of the city open, the people flying in all directions, and the citadel in the hands of his Christian enemies, who, by the assistance of two of their jailers, both of whom were renegade Corsicans, had been freed from their chains, and armed for their defence. Finding his affairs thus desperate, he fled to Bona with a few thousand Turkish soldiers; intending, should that place also be besieged, to embark on some few galleys which he had left in port; and once more, with his old motto flying, "here sails one who is a friend to the sea, but an enemy to all who sail upon it," murder and plunder all who might come in his way. Bitterly did Barbarossa repent his not having destroyed the Christian slaves; and often did he curse his friends for their advice to save them, and himself for listening to their suggestion.

The Emperor was slowly advancing towards the city, and using those precautions which are so absolutely necessary while marching in an enemy's country. Fearing an attack from the Moors, who might be lying in ambush awaiting his approach, he was met by the Christians, under the command of Paul Simeoni, a Maltese Knight, who had, years before, behaved very gallantly against the Turks; he had been long confined; and for his liberation, his captor would name no price. Charles V, when made aware of this good fortune—no obstacle whatever existing to oppose his entering into Tunis—called for Simeoni, and said, "Courteous Knight, blessed forever be the resolute valor which has enabled you to break your chains, to facilitate my victory, and to increase the glory of your Order."

We could wish that the little which remains for us to say respecting the siege of Tunis, would tell as much to the credit of the Emperor as that which we have already written. But this conquest is sullied by the fiend-like deeds of the soldiers, who, on entering the city, indiscriminately murdered thirty-four thousand of its innocent inhabitants—people who had taken no part in the conflict, and were more inimical than friendly to Barbarossa, who, they said, had obtained his throne by treachery, and governed his conquered subjects like condemned slaves. The aged who walked with their crutches, and the infants in their mothers' arms, alike suffered; so general was the slaughter of the inoffensive Arabs.

Some historians have asserted, that these rigorous measures were necessary for the purpose of intimidating the Infidels.

The Germans were particularly noted for the part they took in these atrocities, while the Italians and Spaniards turned their attention more to plunder, rioting, and debauchery. Charles, it is said, tried to prevent the excesses of his army; but the soldiers would give no heed to his commands, until their sanguinary dispositions had been satiated by the blood of their foes. Too often is the history of Christian warfare disgraced by the enacting of such like deeds. Ten thousand slaves were embarked on board of the different galleys to gratify the lust of the soldiers, during their homeward voyage—the most of whom were orphans, and selected for their distinguished beauty.

The Turks, on their retreat, were pursued by some Numidian horse; but they suffered but little, as their enemies dared not approach sufficiently near to do much execution among them. The greatest loss which Barbarossa met with was the decease of Hanim; who, overcome with heat, and coming to the banks of a river, drank so freely, that he immediately expired.

The Spanish Admiral, wishing to destroy the galleys of his enemy, sent Adam, (a Genoese Captain, who was more distinguished for his wealth, and as a kinsman of Auria, than for his experience or bravery,) with a portion of his fleet, to carry his wishes into execution. When Adam arrived at Hippona, he found, much to his disappointment, that Barbarossa had got there before him, and put the harbor in such a good state of defence, that it would be impossible to attack him with any chance of success. At the suggestion of his officers, he returned to Tunis. The Turks soon after set sail, coasted along the African shore, and safely arrived at Algiers.

Charles reinstated Muleasses on the throne. A treaty was concluded, in which, among other regulations, it was stipulated, that the Tunisian King should support one thousand Spanish soldiers, who were to be left in the castle of Galotta; should yearly send to the Emperor, two falcons, and two Arab horses, as tribute; and should ever be friendly to the Christians, and an enemy to the Turks. The Emperor then embarked his army and sailed for Massina, where he safely landed, and was received with the utmost distinction. Charles, who repeatedly honored Aurelio Botigella, the Maltese commander, with his presence at dinner, on the day of his departure, gave him a letter directed to the Grand-Master, in which he informed him of the result of his expedition to Tunis, and of the pleasure he had in passing the highest encomiums on the character and conduct of the Knights of his Order—adding, that so mindful was he of the services they had rendered in this siege, that from that time he would remit the duty on corn, which they had always before been accustomed to pay when taking it from Sicily; and would order that no monk should enjoy any revenues in his kingdom, unless by the consent of the council at Malta. Pierino del Ponte was deceased on the 17th of November, 1535, some few days before his galleys returned from this expedition.

Five days after the death of the Grand-Master, the Prior of Tolosa, Didier de St. Jaille, who so singularly distinguished himself at Rhodes, was unanimously chosen to fill the vacancy. During the brief time this Prince reigned, it being only ten months and four days, a daring corsair, who, for his ferocity of disposition, and recklessness of character, was called "drive devil," landed in Barbary; and, at midnight, made an attack on Tripoli. Failing in his attempt to take the place by surprise, and being severely wounded by a musket shot, he hastily retired, leaving many of those who landed with him, dead on the beach, which lined the walls of the fortress.

The Knight who commanded at Tripoli, fearing a second visit from this Infidel, sent a felucca to Malta, asking of the Grand-Master, reinforcements for his garrison, and engineers to repair his fortifications. These requests were speedily granted. Botigella being despatched on this service, after landing some troops for the protection of the city, advanced with a small body of men and some Arab cavalry to attack the tower of Alcaid, from which the Turks made their predatory excursions. The Maltese Admiral was so anxious to take the place, that he did not wait to erect batteries; but, having his artillery drawn up, immediately commenced his attack. Haysaddin, who was at a short distance with a Turkish force, fearing that the place would be captured, advanced to relieve it; but in this movement he was foiled by the Knights, who, sallying out of Tripoli, joined battle, and compelled him to retreat;—he left those who were in the tower to defend it as best they could: it being out of his power, in their extremity, to afford them the least assistance.

Botigella, under cover of his galleys, succeeded in springing a mine, which not only razed a portion of the fortifications, but killed many of the corsairs who were defending it. The few who were left, seeing that further resistance would be useless, as the Maltese were approaching, hauled down the flag, and surrendered at discretion.

The Admiral, then marching on to the small town of Adabas, easily took it; and, allowing the Arabs who were in his employ to pillage, they did their work so thoroughly, as to leave nothing which they could carry away. On his homeward voyage, Botigella fell in with, and after a hard fight, captured a large Egyptian galleon, valued at one hundred and sixty thousand crowns, and with a crew of two hundred men, which he safely took into port much to the joy of the Order.

St. Jaille, when making preparations for his departure for Malta, having from the time of his election always remained in France, was taken suddenly ill, at Montpellier, and died much regretted, on the 26th of September, 1536.

On the 20th of October following, at a General Chapter, and after various ballotings, John d'Omedes of the language of Arragon, and Bailiff of Caspe, was appointed to succeed him. This Prince owed his election only to his being a Spaniard; to the intrigues of Garcia Corter; and to the protection which Charles gave to his subjects, who then enjoyed the chief influence in the Order. The King of France was so displeased at his election, that he inquired of a French Knight, Trevoux, what motives the monks could have had in electing such a person to command them?

One of the first acts which Omedes, as Grand-Master, was called upon to perform, was to condemn an English Knight to death, who was accused of having, in a fit of jealousy, killed his mistress. The crime being proved, the monk was sewn in a sack and tossed into the sea.

This stain on the language of England, was soon forgotten by the intrepid conduct of a British commander, who was one of the most esteemed members of the Chapter. Dragut Raïses, who had long cruised in the Mediterranean, and made many prizes, was induced, in his tamerity, to land on Malta, and attempt to ravage the island. But in this he was prevented; Upton, with thirty monks and four hundred men, issued out upon him, and, after a severe conflict of several hours, routed the Infidels, and drove them to take refuge in their ships. The English Knight died of his wounds.

Omedes, who was naturally of a mean, suspicious and revengeful disposition, soon rendered himself so unpopular by his government, as to cause many of those who had given him their votes, publicly to declare, that he was indebted to his election only to their ignorance of his character. One action in particular (the removal of Botigella from the command of the Maltese squadron) made him many bitter enemies. For his known merit, and important services, the Maltese Admiral was singularly distinguished; so much so, that even the Spaniards regretted his removal from a station, which he had so long and so honorably filled. Leo de Strozzi, the young Knight who was named to succeed him, was a nephew of Pope Clement VII, by whom he had been made Grand-Prior of Capua, and a monk of St. John. This officer receiving the command of four galleys, was instructed to join the fleet of the celebrated Andrew Doria, who was cruising for the purpose of meeting the Turkish ships of Ali Zelif—as warlike a Turk, and commanding as desperate a set of Janizaries as ever infested the sea.

In the channel of Corfu the hostile squadrons met; and, although Doria had flattered himself that he should obtain an easy conquest, yet he, in the onset, was discomfited, and met with a grievous repulse. Strozzi, fearing for the event of the day, in a gallant manner, carried his galley into the midst of the enemy; and laying it alongside the flag-ship of the Turks, boarded her, sword in hand, with all his crew. The Maltese were victorious; and the crescent came down, when not a Janizary was left to defend it.

This service being finished, the Admiral shaped his course for Malta. On his way thither, and while sailing along the Calabrian coast, he fell in with two large corsairs and a galley; he captured them all; and released four hundred slaves, whom, with his prizes and prisoners, he brought safely in port. Although the Knights rejoiced at the success of the Prior of Capua, yet they did not treat him with that respect which he so well deserved. They were ever mindful of his youth, and of the unjust manner in which he received his appointment by the removal of his worthy predecessor. This treatment so operated on the honorable feelings of Strozzi, that he soon after resigned his command and entered into a foreign service.

The inhabitants of Lusa, a small town distant some thirty miles from Tunis, refusing to acknowledge the authority of Muleasses to govern them, Charles V. instructed the Sicilian, Marquis de Terra Nova, to proceed thither and reduce them to subjection. Omedes, anxious to take part in any expedition in which the Emperor was interested, despatched Simeoni, with a few galleys, to assist the Italians at the siege of the city. After various assaults, in which many brave monks were killed, and after the ammunition of the army had been uselessly expended against a part of the fortress, which the Marquis had been informed by a renegade, was the weakest; but which, when too late, he learnt was in the best state of defence, the siege was raised, and the Christians retired. The Maltese commander, when making a report to the Grand-Master, of the unfortunate result of this cruise, remarked, that its failure was wholly owing to the ignorance and cowardice of the one who commanded.

Botigella, who about this time returned to Malta from the governorship of Tripoli, in which command he had been succeeded by two experienced Knights, remarked in full council, that it would be far better to raze the fortifications in Barbary and recall the soldiers, than leave them to perish by the Moors and Arabs, who were at all times threatening to attack them;—urging also, that the Emperor should be informed of the defenceless state of the fortifications, and of the necessity which existed, that something should be quickly done for the protection of those who had been left to defend them. Charles receiving this information, would not consent to the destruction of the forts, but promised the monks a speedy relief.

So troubled were the Spaniards at the audacity of the Turks, who not only swept the sea of their ships, but landed on their shores, plundered their villages, and carried their people in exile, that Charles, in 1541, resolved to raise a large force and proceed to Algiers, from whence these pirates came, and whither they carried their prizes. So determined was the Emperor to carry his project into execution, that he would not listen to the advice of his councillors—all of whom were strenuously opposed to the measure. Hardly was his army in Italy and Germany collected, ere he heard of the defeat of his brother Ferdinand by the Turks, and of himself, being threatened with a declaration of war from Francis of France. The Pope suggested that it might be more prudent for Charles to remain at home and take care of his own kingdom; and if he had soldiers to spare, that he should send them to the aid of his brother, so hardly pressed was he by Solyman; to Auria, his Admiral, who made mention, with tears, of the advanced state of the season, and of the danger in approaching Barbary, when liable to heavy gales, and to be driven on an iron-bound shore, where, in the event of shipwreck, all must perish;—to Vastius, his General, who remarked that it would be much more popular with his army if told they were to fight the Turks, who were advancing in Germany. But Charles argued as follows: the opinions of his friends, wise and valiant men, were not without weight; yet he had pledged his word to his subjects to punish their enemies; and the fulfilment of this promise, let the result be for weal or wo, was, with him, his first and only consideration.

When Omedes made known to the Knights the call which he had received from the Emperor to assist him in this war with the Algerines, the monks, who were weary of an idle life, and desirous of signaling themselves, answered unanimously, that they were not only ready but anxious to join in an expedition against a common enemy, who had too long been permitted to annoy the Christians with impunity; when he might, for his audacity, have been so easily punished. Four hundred Knights, each with two attendants, embarked in their galleys, and united themselves with the squadron of Auria, at Sardinia, the place which was designated for a general rendezvous.

When the Spanish Admiral was at sea, and was steering for the Balearic islands, he met with such boisterous weather, as to compel him to bear away and enter the port of Bonifacium, in Corsica. Repairing his vessels, he sailed again; but meeting on his passage with another westerly gale, and suffering severely, he, with much difficulty, got his scattered fleet together at Mago—a small and unsafe anchorage of Minorca. While detained here with a head wind, news was received of the arrival of Gonzaga, the Viceroy of Sicily, at the neighboring island of Majorca, having under his command one hundred and fifty sail of Italian and Sicilian ships, laden with every kind of provisions, and sufficiently large for all their wants for many months.

Two days after the arrival of Gonzaga, the weather being fine and the sea calm, orders were given to loose the sails of the Christian fleet, and make for the coast of Barbary. After a pleasant passage of fifty hours, having for the whole time sailed before a light northerly wind, the Emperor, with a portion of his ships, entered the port of Algiers, and anchored near the town.

While Charles was awaiting the arrival of the Spanish galleys, which were becalmed off the Cape of Casineus, being desirous that his countrymen should take part in the operations against the Turks, he sent a boat on shore with a messenger to Assan Aga, promising that should he deliver the keys of the castle, and submit to his authority, the Turks would be permitted to depart whither they would; and the Moors might remain, enjoying their religion, and having their goods untouched.

It is singular that during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the most distinguished naval commanders in the service of the Infidels were Christian born; people, who either in their manhood became renegades, or being made captives in their infancy, were brought up in the Mahomedan creed.

Assan Aga was a Sardinian by birth, and a prisoner from his youth. Barbarossa, by whose order he was made an eunuch, took him on board his galley, and obliged him to perform the most menial offices; but observing in the boy a cruel disposition and great courage, he had promoted him through all the different grades of the service; and left him, in his absence, to govern Algiers.

The messenger was instructed to offer to Hassan the favor of the Emperor, to remind him of his being born a Christian; and that he had a good opportunity presented him, to return to the faith of his fathers, and punish Barbarossa for the cruel mutilation of his body. To these arguments he only answered, that a brave man could not be a traitor; and that, even if his situation was as desperate as his enemy imagined, but which he could not believe, all that remained for him to do, was to die defending the city which he had been left to command.

Had the army of the Emperor been immediately landed on its arrival, there can be no doubt but that Algiers would have soon been captured: but the delay for the Spaniards of only two or three days, caused its total defeat. On the second attempt, some three and twenty thousand soldiers were put on shore, with three thousand cavalry, the most of whom were veterans, and commanded by the most distinguished warriors of Italy, Spain, and Germany. The Moors observing this large force, became alarmed. But a noted witch, who dwelt in Algiers, laughed at their fears, and predicted that God would punish the rashness of the Emperor, and destroy his fleet. Hassan pretended to believe this prediction, and confidence was soon restored.

When the Christians took their position, the same order was observed as that at the siege of Tunis some years before. The Spaniards had the right, the Italians the left, and in the centre, were the Germans with the Emperor. While the soldiers were forming, and the seamen were getting their ordnance and horses on shore, the Numidians made repeated attacks upon them; but at such a distance, that their shot and darts had but little effect.

At six o'clock on the evening of the second day after the troops had left their ships, the sky became overcast; the dense clouds gathered with thunder and lightning, and discharged torrents of rain upon the soldiers, who had neither tents nor any thing else to shelter them from exposure. Hassan, like a watchful enemy, made a sally upon the Italians, who were in advance; and who, from their sufferings during the night after being so long cold and wet, were weary, and could make but little resistance. The Turks, advancing as their enemies retreated, came upon a small but determined body of Maltese Knights, who were conspicuous from their wearing on their breasts a covering of "crimson damask or velvet, upon which shone a white cross." These men, inured to hardships and accustomed to war, made a brave defence, bearing the whole brunt of the fight, until the main body of the army advanced to relieve the few, who were alive, from meeting with certain death. Two French monks were particularly conspicuous for their daring deeds of courage; the one, Villegagnon, finding himself in the midst of the enemy, and wounded in the left arm by a Moorish chief, parried a second blow which was made by the same person; and, jumping on the horse of his assailant, stabbed him to the heart, pitching him out of his saddle, and riding off in safety. The other, Savignac, the standard-bearer of the Order, pursued the Algerines to the very gates of the city; in one of which he left his poignard, to show where he had been in advance of all his friends.

Charles was so pleased with the conduct of the Knights—seventy-five of whom in this action were numbered with the dead—that he publicly declared they had sacrificed themselves to save his army; and that it was a deed of heroism which he would never forget.

Well would it have been had this defeat been all which the Emperor was doomed to witness. But as the day advanced, the wind increased to a perfect hurricane; and many of the vessels, parting their cables and losing their anchors, were cast on shore. Those of the crews who escaped from being drowned, only lived to get on the rocks, and die by the lances of the Numidians.

While there was such a general destruction of the Christian fleet, fifteen galleys and eighty-six other vessels having foundered, still it was singular that among this large number not one belonging to the Order was included. Charles entertained so high an opinion of the naval tactics and courage of the Knights, that when he observed some ships safely riding out the storm, he remarked that they must belong to his Maltese friends; as he was sure they would rather perish at sea, than attempt to save their lives by cowardly running their ships on shore, as some of their allies had so unwisely and fatally done. During the height of the gale, a galley, which was commanded by a nephew of the Admiral, was shipwrecked. The Emperor perceiving this, and desirous of saving the life of this young officer, sent Antonius, of Arragon, with a few companies, down to the beach to skirmish with the Moors while the Christians were landing. This service was so well executed, that the lives of all on board were saved. By this trifling circumstance the spirits of the soldiers were in a measure revived; though their situation could have hardly been worse than it was. The ships which brought them to Africa were the greater part lost, with all their crews; while they were exposed to a continual rain; were in an enemy's country; and seriously threatened with starvation.

The Christians, however, had but little time given to them to think of their sufferings, as Hassan made a second sally out of Algiers; and quickly overthrew the Italians, who still held the post nearest to the city, and could make but a trifling opposition. The Maltese Knights, who were next, and a small band of noblemen, formed themselves on a bridge, over which it was necessary the Turks should pass; and there maintained the unequal fight with such desperation, that the Infidels retired to Algiers, admiring the courage of their enemies—which no privations could overcome, no mortal prowess subdue.

Augustine Spinula, a celebrated officer, at this time, by his exertions, won the praise of the Emperor, and all his troops. With him originated the idea of taking this dangerous position, that his friends who were retreating might be enabled to recover from their fright, and form in their rear.

By this courageous deed alone, the army was saved. On the evening of this day, though the wind was more moderate and the rain had ceased, yet the earthquakes were so incessant and the lightnings so frequent, as to prevent the soldiers from getting the least repose. The Christians passed the night resting on their arms, and standing where they were ankle deep in miry clay.

Early in the following morning, a note was received by Charles from the Admiral, in which he stated, that during his long term of fifty years' service, he never before had been doomed to witness so dreadful a storm; and that to save the remnant of his fleet, he should bear away for Cape Metafur; whither he would advise his coming, as being the only means by which to preserve himself and his army. The Emperor, who had caused all his misfortunes and those of his subjects only by his own stubbornness, immediately saw the wisdom of the advice contained in Ausia's note, and as quickly acted upon it. Leaving his artillery and baggage to the enemy, he ordered the weak and wounded to be conveyed to the centre, where they would be the least exposed; and in no little disorder commenced his march, without tents to shelter, or provisions of any kind, save the horses of his cavalry, which were daily killed for the subsistence of his soldiers. During the retreat, which lasted for three days, so many Christians were taken prisoners by Hassan, that he is said, in derision, to have sold them for an onion a head. Those whose slavery could not be turned to their master's account, were inhumanly slain.

When the weary soldiers arrived at the beach, which bounded the bay, where the fleet in which they were to embark was at anchor, the weather was beautifully fine, and the sea perfectly calm. Being encamped among the ruins of the ancient Tipsara, the men had permission from the Emperor to regale themselves with the provisions which had been landed from the squadron, and to refresh themselves with several hours of uninterrupted sleep. The naked Arabs frequently showed themselves in the distance, but dared not approach to molest the Christians—who, with their spirits revived, and their fatigues forgotten, even proposed to return to Algiers, and conquer the Turks, or make the sands around Hassan's city, their common grave.

Charles, well knowing that the weather could not be trusted, would not listen to these suggestions; he instructed the Captains of the ships and galleys to prepare for the reception of his troops. When the Italians and Germans had embarked, and it was found that there was not room in the vessels for the Spaniards and Maltese, who were still in camp, the Emperor commanded that the horses which were on board should be thrown into the sea—saying, that however valuable they might be for their breed, yet far dearer to him was the life of the meanest boy in his camp. It was a grievous sight for all, to witness these fine animals vainly swimming around, and pawing against the sides of the ships from which they had been cast; and at last when wearied out and sinking, cast their eyes upon their masters, as if to chide them for their cruelty.

Though the Christians had left the African shore, yet their trials were not finished. After being a few hours at sea, the weather changed; and from a calm, it blew a gale. One vessel went down with seven hundred souls, and not a single man was saved; two others were, by a singular misfortune, driven into Algiers, where the Spaniards, observing their enemies hovering on the beach, and expecting no quarter from the barbarians, resolutely formed on their landing, and fought their way to the city. Hassan, who from the walls observed their prowess, listened as a brave man to their cries of mercy; and sending the Turks to drive away the Arabs, thus saved their lives, though he made them slaves.

By the violence of the tempest, the ships were scattered; and the Captains, fearing for their safety, made for those ports which they could the soonest and most easily reach. Thus in a brief time, the sad termination of this expedition was known in all parts of Europe; and much to the sorrow of all Christian powers, save the French King;—he was, with just reasons, preparing to declare war against the Emperor; and hoped that his haughty enemy had been so much crippled in his forces by this recent defeat, as would compel him, either to make such favorable concessions as he might desire; or insure to him a greater chance of success, in event of an open rupture between them.

Auria, with a few ships in company, putting before the wind, quickly arrived at Buria, where there was a small Spanish fortress; and where, until the wind moderated, he could anchor in safety. Much to the joy of the seamen and soldiers while the squadron was here detained, a large Genoese ship, laden with provisions, was driven in port by stress of weather; and though run on shore and her cargo damaged, yet it afforded them who had been, for a length of time, on limited allowance, a temporary and fortunate relief.

The wind, after blowing heavily many days, came round at last to the north-west. The Emperor gave orders to Gonzaga, to leave with his own and the Maltese galleys. This order was necessary; for had the ships been much longer detained, there would not have been food for their crews. The Viceroy, on his homeward voyage, putting into Utica, was kindly relieved by Muleasses, not only with the necessaries, but many of the luxuries of life.

With his men refreshed, and the weather good, Gonzaga went in safety to Drepanum, a good seaport town on the southern coast of Sicily.

Charles V. on the 10th of November, left Burea with an easterly gale; and after a pleasant passage of ten days, arrived at Carthage.

Thus terminated this unfortunate expedition, in which one hundred and twenty-five ships and galleys were lost, and ten thousand seamen and soldiers perished.

During all his trials, the Emperor was conspicuous "for firmness and constancy of spirit—for magnanimity, fortitude, humanity and compassion. He endured as great hardships as the meanest of his soldiers; he exposed his own person whenever danger threatened; he encouraged the desponding; visited the sick and wounded; and animated all by his words and example. When the army embarked, he was amongst the last who left the shore; although a body of Arabs hovered at no great distance to fall on the rear. Charles thus atoned, in some degree, for his obstinacy and presumption in undertaking an expedition so fatal to his subjects."

Though the Knights, in this disastrous attempt on Algiers, suffered severely, yet their prowess on all occasions, was manifest to their friends, and felt by their enemies. The few who survived, returned in three shattered vessels to Malta about the close of November, A. D., 1548.

SCENES IN THE WEST:

OR, A NIGHT ON THE SANTA FE TRAIL.

NO. III.

"There!" ejaculated my comrade, with a smack of the lips which made all crack again, as he shoved from before him the tin cup and pewter platter which had held his hot bacon and coffee, "a child might play with me now with perfect impunity."

The individual who gave such gracious proofs of the condescending nature of his disposition, was a man of fair and goodly proportions, whose years had not yet numbered thirty, and whose broad and humorous face was ever lighted by a frank and generous smile. We were in a wilderness.

Far out in the vast prairie, two hundred miles from the haunts of enlightened man, exists a tract of forest land, well known to the sojourners in those regions as the "Council Grove." There again those vast and mysterious mounds, those monuments of uncounted centuries, arrest the eye of the passing traveller; while their gigantic dimensions, and the military skill with which their directions are arranged, convince him at once that he stands on the ruined site of a once powerful city. Even now this spot is deemed a kind of Mecca of the West; for here, within the memory of those living, the delegates of the Nomade tribes of the prairie, were annually wont to meet and smoke the pipe of peace; and the corpses of brave men and chiefs are frequently conveyed hither, at this day, for interment, as to one of the sacred groves of the ancients.

Here also commences the famous highway, used by the American traders, stretching two thousand miles across the desert to the Western Spanish Provinces; and from various points of our long frontier, the minor trails converge to the "Council Grove," where the various caravans usually rendezvous preparatory to setting forth on their stated marches.

It was here, in the early part of autumn, that my friend and myself were seated at night in front of a crackling fire, enjoying to the full that measure of unmixed and heartfelt satisfaction, which one never fails to experience when a hearty meal and a cheerful fire have succeeded a long and chilly ride. The men of the detachment were grouped in various attitudes around their respective fires, the bright flames of which, shooting upwards, made the trunks of the huge trees seem like living giants; while the forms of the picketted horses in the background, looked, by the quivering light, like the demons of another world. The pencil of Salvator Rosa would have delighted in delineating such a scene. The bandit-looking groups scattered about the fires; their carbines and pistols piled in careless confusion, or hung with the belts and sabres on the drooping branch of some neighboring tree. But it would require the flexible pen of the author of Charles O'Malley, to write out the merry songs with which the arches of the forest were made to ring, or to tell again the thrilling tales of former scout and battle, which made so many circles of attentive listeners. As I intimated before, my comrade was a good-tempered and companionable messmate; but as agreeable as those attributes were, he was better distinguished for qualities of more sterling worth. Born in the West, he had been an adventurer from childhood; and, having spent some of the earlier years of his youth in the Midshipman's berth of a man-of-war, he joined to the polished deportment of a soldier, the quaint simplicity of the hunter, with the frank and frolicsome humor of the sailor; gallant and dashing in the discharge of his duty, reckless of danger, and fond of fun: such is a feeble outline of the character of my friend.

"The nights are getting a little chilly," he added, after he had delivered the ejaculation we have already recorded; "and before we turn our faces homeward again, my boy, the north-west wind will be keen enough to blow off the horns of a buffalo bull. You Pedro!" he cried to a mulatto servant, who was finishing the culinary operations of the evening at a little distance, "just creep through the thicket yonder to the road, and see if there are any fresh tracks leading in either direction; and be lively, boy, like a double and twisted streak of forked lightning," he added, as the black sluggishly lingered, with the customary indolence of his race. "Those feather-bed legs of yours will shrink up with the cold, younker, if we do not meet the fall traders, and increase our stock of Spanish blankets, before we march to the North, when winter sets in."

I thanked my comrade for the rather equivocal compliment he was pleased to bestow upon the enduring properties of my nether limbs; in truth, he felt himself privileged to quiz me, for I was very "green," having but a few months before relinquished books and black boards at my alma mater among the hills of the Hudson; and being then, for the first time, initiated in the vicissitudes of a prairie campaign. A novice, in his eagerness to acquire knowledge in a field where all is new, is generally willing to risk the sly jests which his ignorance may elicit, for the sake of the information he is sure, in the end, to gain. My friend (who by-the-by was commonly known among his equals by the familiar soubriquet of "Roaring Tom") was just the person calculated to supply my demand for this particular kind of lore; for he was an old rover in these regions, and his dashing bravery had frequently led him into rough encounters with the denizens of the desert.

"Did you ever go on a march to the Spanish provinces?" inquired I.

"Did I?" said Roaring Tom, as he ground in the palm of his hand some fibres of the fragrant Kinnik-in-nick, "aye did I; and just pass me the big pipe while I fill it, and then I will tell you how my first trip was near being my last."

Having lighted the pipe, he drew into his lungs the mild and care-dispelling vapor, and uttering the usual Indian ejaculation of supreme delight, he exhaled a huge cloud from his mouth and nostrils; and passing the implement courteously to me, commenced his relation:

"From time immemorial (that is to me) the frontier traders have been in the habit of collecting in large caravans, and traversing what is sometimes called the great American desert, to the Mexican town of Santa Fe. The usual point where the caravans rendezvous, in order to take advantage of any accession of their numbers, is the spot where we now lie. Beyond this, with the exception of grass and flowers, the whole route runs for hundreds of miles, through a region destitute of vegetation. Day after day you may travel onwards in the rays of a burning sun, without the glimpse of a tree or shrub to vary the monotonous expanse of sky and grass. This immense tract constitutes the hunting grounds of the Camanches, the Caddoes, the Pawnee Picts, and many other wild tribes, who subsist by following the buffalo in their range north and south, varied occasionally by the plunder of some weak or unwary party. The traders, though often leagued in formidable numbers, suffered frequently from their attacks, until at length they were in the habit of applying to government for escorts of troops, which were granted upon the same principle that secures armed protection to convoys of merchantmen in case of necessity. Now this soon became a service which our fellows did not admire; but pleasant or not, the lot soon fell upon me, and I was detailed to convoy a party. This was four or five years ago, younker, when you were sleeping on a soft pine plank, or taking lessons at roosting upon one leg, in a ten acre lot, with a shouldered musket.

"It was early in the spring when we set out, and then my troubles commenced. The men composing the caravan, seemed each independent of the other; and strove continually to set at defiance the wholesome restrictions of military discipline. Sometimes a wagon would break down and require repair, and the whole mass would move on, equally careless whether a guard were left to protect it, or whether it fell without defence into the hands of an enemy. And then at night, with their trampoosing through the woods, and their "fire hunts," and turkey shooting, and coon catching, and what not, it would have taken a regiment of sentinels to check the stragglers. Most of our march was performed after this militia fashion; though from the very commencement I had warned the principal men that the Indians would yet make a dash upon them, and cause a late repentance for their heedlessness.

"We had nearly finished the journey, the desert country was already passed, patches of woodland became more and more frequent, and a few spurs of the Rocky Mountains loomed gloomily up in the distance. We had been many days in the habit of seeing buffalo; and on the particular morning to which I allude, I left my troop in charge of the subaltern, and galloped away to seek some sport among a herd which I espied grazing in the distance. I soon overtook them, and had the satisfaction of bringing several to the ground. At length I had selected a fat young cow, who had separated herself from the rest of the gang, and eagerly gave chase. The animal, by her activity, proved too fast for me, and succeeded in frustrating all my endeavors to lay my horse along side at close quarters; for that is the only method by which one can bring them to. I do not know how long or how far I pursued my chase, but when I at length ranged up along side, I found myself entirely alone, having been so perfectly engrossed with the excitement of the chase as to have taken no note of time, course or distance. As the sun was now near the western horizon, I concluded in my mind as to the probable direction to the spot where the traders would pitch their camp; and securing the tongue as a trophy, (intending to send for the carcass afterward,) I threw the bridle over my arm, and, leading my tired and panting horse, walked briskly homeward. I had thus walked, I presume, half an hour; and was slowly ascending the gentle slope of a hill, whose ridge was at no great distance. Suddenly a cloud of dust rose over its crest, and I heard a rushing noise as of a mighty whirlwind, or the charging tramp of ten thousand horse. I had not time to divine its cause, when a herd of buffalo arose over the summit, and a dense mass, thousand upon thousand, galloped, with headlong speed, directly upon the spot where I stood. There seemed no possible escape for me; the vast inundations extended far to the right and left, backed by huge squadrons, who pressed forward in their panic, shoulder to shoulder; and the black surface of the mass, heaved and subsided like the waves of a raging ocean. I will not say that my heart grew faint; but a strange chill crept through my blood, and half-forgotten recollections of other days rushed like magic through my mind, as I placed myself, as a last resort, behind the body of my restless and frightened horse. Still onward they came—Heaven protect me! it was a fearful sight. Tramp, tramp! onward they came, with their shapeless humps and ungainly gait; and so near did they approach, that I could see their little red eyes glowing, like coals of living fire, from out their shaggy beds of matted hair. Suddenly the two files directly opposite to me shouldered their comrades away to the right and left, and I breathed once more when I saw the head of the column had passed me, leaving myself and horse in a narrow lane between them.

“I know not how long I stood in this position of suspense; for I heeded not the passage of time; but the mass of the gang had already passed, and the less crowded stragglers were closing up in the rear, when a wounded and maddened buffalo bull suddenly leaped from the crowd and made towards the place where I stood. Gallantly he came on, with his tail erect and quivering, his head inclined, his left horn pointed to its mark, with the red blood and white foam gathering upon his lips. I shut my teeth tight together, in anticipation of the shock which I could not prevent, and in a moment it was over. I felt myself thrown violently down by the weight of my horse; I indistinctly saw the dark form of the animal, like a passing cloud, as he cleared me in the leap, then I closed my eyes and awaited till the tumult was over. Upon arising, I found that I had received only a few slight bruises; but my poor horse had been gored to death, and the short carbine I carried had been broken by his fall.

“Without losing more time, I threw my valise upon my shoulder, and struggling between the impressions of gratitude for my own escape, and sorrow for the loss of my horse, I again resumed my walk. The sun was just setting, yet I little thought, with the share I had already had, that my troubles were just commencing. I had not passed over an hundred yards from the spot where I had left the carcass of my horse, when my ear caught the sound of distant firing. ‘The Camanches are teaching those fellows to keep closed up at last,’ said I to myself. The firing increased, though by the dull sound of the reports I knew it to be very distant. Pop, whiz, spang! went the carbines, rifles and pistols; then a volley fired at intervals, which I knew to come from my own steady fellows, and at length a loud report, followed by a space of silence. ‘There speaks Betsy Baker,’ (a four pounder,) I cried, as I quickened my pace: ‘if there is no howling to-night in the camp of the red skins, it is because grape shot don’t hurt.’

“In less than five minutes, I was made rather unpleasantly aware of the effect of this last discharge; for directly over the hill where the buffalo had passed, came a troop of at least thirty flying Camanches, yelling like incarnate demons, and urging their horses to their fullest speed. As their direction lay nearly towards me, I did not escape their notice. One huge and grim-looking barbarian, leading by a lariat a horse which I recognized as belonging to my own troop, galloped to where I stood, and, springing from his saddle, made a motion to assist me in mounting the led horse. As I saw no way easily of declining the proffered civility, I sprung to my seat, and in an instant we were in motion; the rest of the troop closed up in front and rear, and I found myself a close prisoner, with my horse’s halter in the hands of the big warrior who had taken me. I know not how far we had travelled, but my companions kept their horses at their speed by a continual drumming with their heels; and more than an hour after I commenced the unwelcome ride, the fiery little ‘mustangs’* were still panting and laboring onwards with their eager burdens. At length we entered a piece of woodland, and, descending into a sequestered ravine, soon reached the fires of the temporary camp.

“Here, for a few moments, all was bustle and confusion. The camp was large, probably arranged to contain a hundred persons or more; and upon the arrival of our party, the women and children crowded forward, to learn the success of the foray, and inquire the news of the day. The intelligence they acquired, I concluded, was of no flattering import; for there followed a great deal of wailing and loud talking, frantic expressions of grief, and tearing of hair. The men seemed to take it more coolly; and as large parties frequently went out, and stragglers as frequently came in, I concluded they were sending back to recover, if possible, their dead and wounded. Often, in the course of the evening, a loud and melancholy howl would arise on the night air, followed by a monotonous chant, which I could recognize as a dirge for some departed spirit. It was late at night, I presume near midnight, when this unwonted commotion began to subside. They had placed me, on my arrival, by a separate fire, and I sat with my back to a tree, my hands and feet secured by thongs of buckskin, watching the curious scenes which transpired—sometimes even with a feeling of merriment, notwithstanding the forlorn situation I was in. I had no reason to fear either death or torture, for these savages are more mercenary than cruel in their disposition, and generally reserve their prisoners for slaves, or for runners. Amid the convulsions which had agitated the little community this evening, I had escaped any very marked attention. Sometimes a boy, as he passed me, would salute me with an impudent grimace; or some withered old beldame, whose eye happened to rest upon me, would scowl from beneath her brows and mutter out a curse.

“At length the camp became quiet; the different groups at the fire gradually sunk upon the ground, and a few stealthily moving figures were all that betokened life. One old Indian, who had apparently been entrusted with my safe keeping, sat on the opposite side of the fire; but he seemed nodding and dozing; and I watched the effect of the flickering light of the dying fire, as it threw into alternate light and shade the hideous paint and deep seams and furrows of his visage.

“I was thus amusing myself, when the gigantic warrior, who had first secured me, advanced from a distant fire, and gravely seated himself near me. For some moments he maintained silence, diligently puffing from his pipe, and anon kicking into their proper places, the smouldering brands as they rolled aside. I thought, however, I could perceive by his grave yet uneasy manner, that he had some communication to make, or some information to elicit, which would require diplomatic tact, and that he was now busily cogitating in what way to address me. At length, he laid his pipe from his mouth, and made advances to a conversation, though in extremely defective English.

“‘The white traders are very many,’ said he, ‘and the young long knives from the forts have good rifles.’

“I made no reply to this truism, and he proceeded: ‘When the white traders fight the Camanches with their rifles only, our hearts are not sick with fear; but when the big wagons are made to fire like a hundred rifles, the young men of the Camanches are astonished and run away. Is it true,’ he added inquiringly, ‘that the white traders can shoot with their wagons like a gun?’

“I could not but smile at the odd conceit with which the chief had been impressed by the unexpected discharge of the four-pounder, and the ludicrous mixture of doubt and curiosity with which he made his statement and inquiry.

“‘Aye, aye, red skin,’ said I, ‘they can fire any thing on wheels, from a stage-coach to a baby’s wagon; and it’s lucky for you and your howling gang, old fellow, that the big ox-carts were not unlimbered and wheeled into battery.’

“I never learned exactly how much my friend understood of this frank exposition, but he looked at me steadfastly for a few moments and then rose and left the fire.

“Thus again left to myself, I resumed my former occupation of watching my rather stupid looking companion with a painted face. No change had taken place in his position, except that he had moved a little nearer; but he sat perfectly upright, with his eyes closed, like one in sleep, or engaged in deep meditation. A deep bright coat of vermilion was laid in a circle around each eye, parallel lines of blue pigment adorned his cheeks, and I observed that the single scalp lock which depended from his crown was trimmed and painted in a somewhat different style from those of his companions. I sat for more than an hour with my eye fixed upon the stiff figure of this grim barbarian, until the lights grew dim and wavering, when my eyelids fell heavily down, and I unconsciously, though but partially, slumbered.

“I know not how long this sleep lasted; but indistinct visions, connected with past recollections, were flitting through my brain, varied by hideous forms and painted spectres, when suddenly I started from my rest, impressed with the idea that I heard my own name pronounced in a clear and distinct whisper. Did I dream it? It could not be. I peered anxiously around for a few moments, until my eyes again fell upon the old savage; stiff and upright as before he still sat, but his eye was open, and the black and glittering iris sparkled with the rays of a diamond as he fixed it upon me. That old fellow, thought I, as I settled again into my former posture, has either heard the call, or been aroused by my sudden starting. I watched the old man for a few moments, and then, conscious that his eye was fixed upon me, closed my own, and feigned repose again.

This time my faculties were all awake, and I heard the same clear whispered pronunciation of my name. Cautiously did I open my eyes and fix them again upon the old man; he had moved himself to within a few feet of where I sat; his head was slightly inclined towards me; his eye was still on me; but I thought I detected about his mouth, a smile which betokened some better emotion than savage malignity.

“At length he moved himself cautiously still nearer, and then spoke in the same subdued tone in which my name had been uttered before, but otherwise in a manner which spake only of utter indifference.

“‘The Noyatunga* is very sleepy to-night,’ he said in English almost perfect.

“I nodded a simple assent. ‘But when he closes his eyes a spirit calls him by name, and bids him come back to his wigwam.'

"Who and what are you? and why did you call me by name?" said I, now thoroughly acquainted with the mystery of my late summons.

"The memory of my brother is very short," said my cautious companion. 'He does not remember my face, though he has seen it within ten summers; he does not remember that I have slept in his barrack; he does not remember that I have eaten of his bread, and been warmed by his blanket. I am now a Camanche, and my squaw is at their village in the wigwam of her father; but my brother, the white men once called me the 'Leaping Buck, a kahega* of the Kansas!'

"As he concluded, he gently drew his knife across the thongs which bound me, and slipping my hand quietly into his, I recognized my old friend with a hearty greeting.

"The Noyatunga must be fleet of foot, while his enemies are sleeping, if he wishes to find the camp of the Spanish traders. I will go by-and-by: let my brother follow; let him keep his eye upon yonder star until he strikes a trail, then he will see me!"

"He glided from my side as he spoke, and I watched his snake-like form as he crept through the underbrush and disappeared; though I listened with painful acuteness, I could not hear the rustling of a leaf, nor the crackling of a twig. After a few minutes of painful suspense, finding that all were still, and apparently buried in sleep, I ventured to commence my operations. Creeping through the thicket without any serious noise, I found the trail, and after a brisk walk, soon found my friend; he held in his hand the bridle of the troop-horse which had brought me in the evening before, and pointing out the course I was to pursue, motioned me to mount. I sprung to my seat, and putting spurs to my horse, ere the sun had fairly risen, I found myself safe in the camp of the traders."

"You, Pedro!" shouted Roaring Tom as he finished his story, "bring in Pomp and picket him to yonder sapling. If some outlying Osage," he muttered, "chanced to be skulking on our trail, he would cut his lariat so quick it would make his head swim.

"What! ho! younker, asleep?"

"No, no! I'm not asleep; but I would thank you not to slap me so hard on the shoulder, and to tell me why you called our little field-piece, 'Betsy Baker.'"

"That's Jack Tar's name for his flying artillery which is carried in the Launch, or Long-boat, as you lubbers call it. But, come! it's time to turn in; and give me a punch in the ribs if you hear the call sound for the reveillé and I do not awake, or Fisher will be down upon me at guard-mounting like a thousand of brick!" Whereupon we gathered our blankets around us and fell asleep. D. R. G. N.

THE OLD FRIAR.

BY SPENCER WALLACE CONE.

I.

Who is there but is sad at times,
And full of thronging fears;
So sad, the solemn vesper chimes
Oft fill their eyes with tears?
Who hath not sighed as those deep peals
On the shadowed eve retire,
And twilight through the window steals
Like an old gray headed Friar?

II.

A Friar old, a Friar gray,
A solemn man is he,
And, just ere night, upon his way
He wendeth noiselessly.
He cometh to the sad at heart,
The merry mind also,
And well he knows to play his part
With pleasure, and with woe.

III.

There are many wrinkles on his brow,
And his hair is nearly white,
And his step is slow and fearful now
For the failing of his sight.
His form is dim, and undefined.
Yet though I little see,
I know, by that within my mind,
He comes, and sits by me.

IV.

He asks no word of courtesy,
Though a man of ancient birth,
But without a sound, so quietly
He seats him by the hearth;
And there he sits, and seems to pray,
Beside the flickering fire;
And we think of things long passed away,
I, and that gray old Friar!

V.

I wot not what his thoughts may be,
So busy are mine own
That in a while I scarcely see
That now I am alone.
My left hand resting on my knee,
My head upon my right,
And mine eyes fixed ever musingly
On the dancing fire light.

VI.

Then comes to me a sister dear,
Who sleeps in my native south,
And she draweth to me very near,
And presses her ruby mouth,
With a gentle kiss, upon my cheek,—
Alice, my sister! Art thou there?
Come to my arms, my own—I speak
To cold, and formless air.

VII.

Anon there comes to me another;
Sweet lights about him shine,
And he my own beloved brother
Lays his soft hand in mine.
But when to that dear touch I start
Feature and form are gone,
And when I'd clasp him to my heart
I am again alone.

VIII.

And then that Friar old and gray,
As he my thoughts could see,
When these have vanished all away
Speaks comfort unto me ;
And bids me think how happier far,
Holy, and pure, and fair,
My sister, and my brother are
Than here on earth they were.

IX.

He preaches too that dull despair
But cowards should appal ;
That flowers in spring-time bloom as fair,
Though leaves in Autumn fall ;
That sorrow is a blessed ill ;
And life half shade, half light :—
Then the gray old Friar's voice is still
And he goes forth through the night.

OUR POETS.

NO. I.

H. W. LONGFELLOW.

It must be admitted that, we Americans, are rather a prosaic than a poetical people. This arises, as much from the peculiar nature of our institutions, as from any other cause ; for, in a country, where the road to political preferment is open to all, it is but natural, that youthful ambition should be directed to it, in preference to the slower, but more enduring trophies of literary distinction. Mingling in the practical business of life, at a much earlier period than is customary in Europe, the American youth is but too apt to entertain a contempt for pursuits, which do not realize any immediate advantage, but require a long and painful probation of sedentary study before any benefit can be derived from them ; and hence, it is rare to find among us a man, whose whole life has been dedicated to letters. Nor are the rewards here, of authorship, sufficient to tempt any one to devote himself to these pursuits ; for we have been informed, that nothing but the private fortune of Mr. Prescott, enabled him successfully to prosecute that great work, which will endure as long as the literature of our country ; and which will always be identified with the memory of that daughter, whose zeal, inspired by love, supplied the failing sight of her gifted father.

Literature with us then, is looked upon rather as an amusement, than as an occupation. Denied the learned leisure requisite to undertaking works of magnitude, the works of our authors are usually hastily written in some moments of leisure snatched from their ordinary occupations, and want that elaborate finish and careful revision which characterize the master-pieces of English genius.

The hard and practical nature of their pursuits tends to strengthen the judgment at the expense of the imagination, and hence our writers excel far more in prose than in poetry ; for, while in history, politics, and science, we have writers fully on a par with those of Britain, we must confess, (that in our humble judgment,) we have but little poetry worthy of the name. It is true, that we have had many writers of verses ; but a mere mastery over the mechanism of verse, is as far from constituting a true poet, as a sanctimonious visage, a religious man. Many have the knack of composing easy verses, who possess neither fancy nor feeling. The most ordinary penny-a-liner, may, with the assistance of Byshe's Rhyming Dictionary, construct any given number of verses, containing the proper number of feet ; and hence, arises the distinction between the poets, whose overflowing fancy pours forth its treasures in prodigal profusion ; and the dull scribbler, who cudgels his brain for a rhyme to his second couplet.

It has been the misfortune of our country to be overrun by these pseudo-poets, who mistake their own folly for inspiration ; encouraged by the indiscriminate eulogy passed on every American work by our critics, who, exasperated by the unfair and unjust censure of the British press, run to the other extreme ; and thus encouraged many—"in spite of nature and their stars, to write." We verily believe that injudicious praise has done more to lower the character of our literature, than all the slashing censure of the British critics.

Yet, in spite of these numerous disadvantages, we have had some noble poetry. "Marco Bozzaris" and "Thanatopsis" of themselves, would be sufficient to establish the character of any poet. How delightful is it, after wading through volumes which you judge to be verse only by the capitals prefixed to each line, to turn to some genuine flow of true poetry, as refreshing to the wearied reader, as the sight of the cool and gushing spring to the wayworn pilgrim. Of these, some have already gained their full meed of fame ; but others, who deserve it equally, have not been equally fortunate. Thus, Halleck and Bryant enjoy a merited celebrity with the whole reading public, while Longfellow finds "audience fit, though few : " his reputation being very high in some portions of the Union, while in others, he is comparatively unknown. And, as we believe that he is not at all known and appreciated at the South in proportion to his merits, we propose dedicating the remainder of this paper to a brief notice of his works ; in the hope that some one more worthy of the task, may thereby be induced to do justice to one who deserves so well of his country. For if, as Dr. Channing nobly expresses it, "one great and kindling thought can do much to elevate the character of a nation," what must he deserve, who, scorning the vulgar path to distinction, has dedicated his life to literature, and proved that America could produce a poet, who, for smoothness of verse, splendor of imagery and gushing thought, may challenge comparison with some of the proudest names of England! This is not the language of exaggerated encomium. We have no reason to be prejudiced in his favor. On the contrary, our local prejudices were at first arrayed against him; but these all faded away on the perusal of his works, which bear the impress of a soul "smit with the love of sacred song," and a mind rich in the lore of the present and the past.

Nor is it on paper alone that Longfellow is a poet. Poetry enters into the very nature of the man, and forms a portion of his being. Unlike those "who coin their brain for daily bread," and whose inspiration only lasts with the occasion which calls it forth, Longfellow is a poet by nature, to whose gifted eye the humble clod of the valley bears the impress of its great Creator. His melodious words, gushing forth full of tenderness and melody, are but the outpourings of a soul, as responsive to each touch of human sympathy, as the fabled lyre of Memnon to the rays of the morning sun. The selfish man cannot be a poet. To charm the eye, and fascinate the ear, of those who know him not; to cause the selfish and indifferent to forget the reality, and to regard the phantoms of his imagination as living and breathing beings; to touch the hearts of the cold, the callous and the vain; and to transfer to them, the light of that inspiration, which kindled his own soul,—this is the province of the poet. And to do this, it requires that he should himself possess the most boundless sympathy with human weakness and human suffering. Some few matchless spirits there have been, who seemed to soar above human weakness and human folly; who, enthroned in a majestic serenity of soul, sit like monarchs of the intellectual world. But these, though they command our admiration, cannot win our sympathy and love.

Such was Milton; such was Dante, monarchs of the wide domain of thought, and, like earthly rulers, isolated from communion with their kind, by the very loftiness of their position; we gaze with admiration on the triumphs of their genius; but neither the English bard who painted the primeval innocence of man, nor the gloomy Florentine, who sang of hell, can be brought home to the business and bosoms of ordinary men; for, each of them created a world of his own, into which none but himself might enter.

The very themes they selected are removed beyond the ordinary sphere of human sympathy. In Milton, the grand conception is the character of the fallen archangel; the most powerful descriptions are those where he paints the tortures of a being originally pure, who, with a perfect knowledge of good and evil, has dared to say "Evil, be thou my good," and whose invincible will, conquers agony, torture and shame. Adam and Eve are but subordinate characters; and the great interest of the piece is made to centre on the hopeless struggles of the baffled fiend.

Far more stern and gloomy was the spirit of Dante; to him, life had been but one long scene of sorrow and suffering, and mankind his bitterest enemies; with them, he knew no brotherhood, but that of hate; deep, enduring, inveterate hate; his gloomy spirit seems to revel in picturing the tortures of suffering sinners; he takes a gloomy joy in depicting the endless tortures of a future hell, without relief and without hope; the farther we proceed, the more do images of pain and terror thicken around us, until we reach the climax of them all,—Ugolino wiping his bloody lips on the scalp of his tortured enemy.

While then, we listen with fascinated eagerness to themes like these, we are sensible that nothing but the genius of the author can render them attractive; we know that our reason revolts at the pictures they have drawn; and that pain, not pleasure, is produced by their perusal. Yet we recur to them with a morbid eagerness, again and again, to be disgusted and fascinated as before. And why is this? Because there are two sources to which the poet may appeal, the imagination and the heart; they often act in concert, but are touched by different and independent causes. And, it is to the imagination, that these great poets appeal; while our pity for human suffering is often merged in our admiration at the beauty of the description.

The "Manfred" of Byron and "Prometheus" of Shelley belong to this school. For beauty of diction and splendor of imagery, they cannot be surpassed. Yet these have never been popular for the very cause we have stated. The taste of the age demands that poetry, to be successful, should be brought home to ourselves; that it should treat of man and the visible world, and that Imagination, who has heretofore circled heaven and hell in her rapid flights, should for a time, furl her wings, and abide within the limits of this world. Hence a style of poetry has arisen, which we may well term the poetry of the affections.

We repeat then, that the poet should sympathize with his reader if he wish to touch his heart; and, that the highest triumph of poetry, is, when it enlists our feelings in the cause of virtue and humanity, and ripens into maturity, the germs of goodness and beauty, which lurk in every human heart; for, to the gifted eye of the poet, much is revealed which escapes the ordinary observer. Thus, to the practical eye of common sense, the Scotch would appear to be a keen, calculating, matter-of-fact people; shrewd, hardy and commonplace. But the gifted eye of the peasant-bard saw them in their true light; he detected the latent vein of sentiment lurking in their minds; and his sweet and simple songs, full of pathos and tenderness, have become household words with every peasant throughout broad Scotland.

The poetry of Professor Longfellow, however, differs much from that of Burns; the subjects of which it treats, are not so popular in their nature, nor of as universal interest; but, if it lack the fire and humor of Burns, it possesses more softness and a deeper vein of thought. He is a man whose whole life has been dedicated to literature, but who has not slavishly followed any master; whose natural bent has been improved and enlarged by foreign travel, and who never permits a composition to pass from his hand, until polished and perfected with his utmost skill. Contemporary critics often labor under the difficulty of separating the man from the author, which sometimes must be done to insure a just criticism; for, in some instances, the man and the author are totally different persons. Thus, the writings of Bacon contain much sound morality and lofty principle. Yet Bacon was a timeserver and an unjust magistrate; the writings of Machiavel have made his name a by-word of infamy; yet, he spent a long life of unblemished integrity, and died a martyr to the cause of liberty; hence a book should generally rest on its own intrinsic merits alone for its success or failure. But there are some cases in which this rule does not apply, where the book and the author mutually explain one another; this is peculiarly the case with men exclusively literary, whose books are often the true transcripts of their own thoughts and feelings.

Professor Longfellow has written more prose than poetry. "Outre Mer" and "Hyperion," are, however, steeped in the poetry of the writer's thoughts; and the latter may well be regarded as a Poem in every thing except the metre, for it bears about the same analogy to the ordinary novel, that Spenser's Fairy Queen does to the "Columbiad" of Dwight. In these volumes much of the inner life of the student is unconsciously revealed, embodying as they do, the thoughts and feelings of the scholar, who visits for the first time, the land so rich in historic recollections, and who wanders with rapt enthusiasm among the castled ruins of the glorious Rhine.

An abler hand than ours has already done justice to the merits of "Hyperion." But there is one thought which struck us as peculiarly true and beautiful, and which seems to have escaped the notice of the reviewer. It is this: speaking of the troubles which beset the path of life, the author thus concludes: "The shadows of the mind are like those of the body: in the morning of life they all lie behind us; at noon we trample them under foot; and in the evening they stretch long, broad and deepening before us. But the morning shadows soon fade away; while those of evening, stretch forward into night, and mingle with the coming darkness." The depth and beauty of this thought must strike the most careless observer.

The principal defect in his poetry as we before remarked, is, its small quantity. One small volume containing all his pieces both original and translated; and we are not certain that the author, who is thus chary of his intellectual wealth, should any more be pardoned than the miser, who clings to his glittering hoard; the loss of the public in the first case being much greater than in the last, since the hoard of the miser must be left behind him; but the riches of the poet perish with his own existence.

The pieces contained in this little volume are of a three-fold character: "The Voices of the Night," Earlier Pieces, and Translations principally from the Spanish and German. Our space is so limited that we will only be enabled to give a few extracts from the former of these, which contain the most finished and perfect of his original pieces, although some of the translations possess a very high order of merit; the "Coplas de Maurique" being one of the most beautiful and touching productions in any language.

"The Voices of the Night" are introduced by a poetical "Prelude," which is as fair a specimen of the author's style, as any thing he has written; of course it will lose much by being given in fragments; but the reader must make allowances for this. After an exordium of considerable power, he thus continues—

"And dreams of that which cannot die,
Bright visions came to me,
As, lapped in thought, I used to lie
And gaze into the Summer sky
When the sailing clouds went by Like ships upon the sea.

2.

Dreams that the soul of youth engage
Ere Fancy has been quelled—
Old legends of the monkish page,
Traditions of the Saint and Sage,
Tales that have all the rhyme of age
And chronicles of eld.

3.

And falling on my weary brain,
Like a fast falling shower,
The dreams of youth came back again;
Low lisping of the Summer rain,
Dropping on the ripened grain,
As once upon the flower.

4.

Visions of childhood, stay, O stay;
Ye were so sweet and wild,
And distant voices seemed to say
'It cannot be they pass away,
Other themes demand thy lay,
Thou art no more a child.

5.

Learn that henceforth thy song shall be,
Not mountains capped with snow,
Nor forests sounding like the sea,
Nor rivers flowing ceaselessly,
Where the woodlands bend to see
The bending heavens below.

G.

Look then into thy heart, and write ;
 Yes, into Life's deep stream,
 All forms of sorrow and delight—
 All solemn Voices of the Night,
 That can soothe thee or affright ;
 Be these, henceforth, thy theme.' "

Is not the true poetic inspiration stamped upon these verses, deeply and indelibly ? Do they not steal into our minds like "the memory of a dream which now is sad, because it hath been sweet ?" And is not the prelude of itself sufficient to stamp him as a poet, even had he written no other line ? Unlike many poets who sacrifice sense to sound, and whose only object is to write verses, our author makes poetry a means, and not an end ; makes it the vehicle of thoughts too subtle or refined for prose, and for a philosophy noble and exalting ; where can a nobler philosophy be found than that contained in the "Psalm of Life," or "what the heart of the young man said to the Psalmist ?"

"Tell me not, in mournful numbers,
 Life is but an idle dream !
 For the soul is dead that slumbers ;
 And things are not what they seem.

Life is real ! Life is earnest !
 And the grave is not its goal ;
 Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
 Was not written of the soul.

Art is long, and time is fleeting,
 And our hearts, though stout and brave,
 Still, like muffled drums, are beating
 Funeral marches to the grave.

Trust no future, howe'er pleasant !
 Let the dead-past bury its dead !
 Act—act in the living Present !
 Heart within, and God o'erhead !"

We only wish that our space permitted us to give the whole ; since it is one of the richest legacies of advice that genius ever bequeathed to those seeking to follow in its footsteps ; teaching that man has only to perform his duties fully and faithfully, to insure his reward. Of a similar character is the piece bearing the title, the "Light of the Stars." We can only give the concluding stanzas :

"And thou, too, whosoe'er thou art,
 That readest this brief psalm,
 As one by one thy hopes depart,
 Be resolute and calm.

O fear not in a world like this,
 And thou shalt know ere long,
 Know how sublime a thing it is
 To suffer and be strong."

One striking characteristic of our author is the vein of sadness which runs through all his writings ; even those speaking hope and comfort to the weary bear the same impress of melancholy tenderness. And this arises, if we judge him aright, not from the sickly sentiment of a morbid mind, but from the peculiar nature of the scholar and poet, who, shunning the noise and glare of this "working-day world," holds communion with the gifted spirits of the Present and the Past, and delves with them into the hidden mines of thought and action, over which sweeps, with its mighty roar, the current of life.

Such is the spirit which pervades the song of the "Reaper and the Flowers," which we doubt not is familiar to many of our readers. It seeks to rob Death of its terrors, and strews the flowers of poesy even upon the grave. But we find that our space admonishes us to be brief. Passing by with regret the "Footsteps of the Angels," which is as beautiful as its title, and many others equally imbued with feeling and true poetry, we can merely give a parting extract from the "Beleaguered City," embodying a German legend, and affixing a moral of his own :

"I have read, in some old marvellous tale,
 A legend strange and vague,
 That a midnight host of spectres pale
 Beleaguered the walls of Prague.

Beside the Moldan's rushing stream,
 With the wan moon over head,
 There stood, as in an awful dream,
 An army of the dead.

White as a sea-fog, landward bound,
 The spectral camp was seen,
 And, with a sorrowful, deep sound,
 The river flowed between.

I have read in the marvellous heart of man—
 That strange and mystic scroll—
 That an army of phantoms vast and wan,
 Beleaguer the human soul.

Encamped beside Life's rushing stream,
 In Fancy's misty light—
 Gigantic shapes and shadows gleam
 Portentous through the night.

Upon its midnight battle ground
 The spectral host is seen,
 And with a sorrowful deep sound,
 Flows the river of Life between.

And when the solemn and deep church bell
 Entreats the soul to pray,
 The midnight phantoms feel the spell,
 The shadows sweep away.

Down the broad vale of tears afar
 The spectral host is fled ;
 Faith shineth as a morning star,
 Our ghastly fears are dead."

We feel sensibly that these extracts do not convey a full impression of the merits of the poet ; since, in pieces as perfectly constructed as his, the omission even of one line often breaks the arrangement, and destroys the impression, which the connected whole would produce. We would therefore advise all those who wish to enjoy true poetry, to procure the "Voices of the Night," and read and judge for themselves. If our hurried and imperfect review shall accomplish this end, our object will be effected, since we only desire to introduce him to the Southern public. His own merits will accomplish the rest. Genius never yet failed to reap the harvest it has sown. The seeds may fall unnoticed and for a space be forgotten; but in the fulness of time, they will germinate in darkness, and produce fruit of which future generations will make their repast. Let us then recognize the poet while he abides among us. Let us award him our meed of sympathy and admiration, and not hoard it up, to be inscribed on the tablet which records his departure from among us; and, as the waters gushed from the rock, when smitten by the rod of the Hebrew prophet, so will his spirit, gladdened by the approval of his race, pour forth its hidden treasures of thought and feeling to enrich the literature of our common country.

SIR: The following tale I cut from a country newspaper a great many years ago; considering it at that time, as I do now, very interesting, and particularly worth preserving. My object in sending it to you, is to ask if you will not republish it in your Messenger.

COROLINN: A PERSIAN TALE.

CHAPTER I.

"Here," said I, "here once flourished an opulent city; here was once the seat of a powerful empire."—Volney.

The sun had passed the meridian; and the shadows of the rocky peaks of the Hetzerdera, or the summit of the thousand mountains, as they have been called in the glowing poetical language of Ferdosi, had begun to stretch themselves over one of the most rich and beautiful districts in Persia—the plains of Persepolis and Schiras. The clouds which in rude masses were piled above the Hetzerdera, were touched, on their margin, with crimson, and purple, and gold; and while they showed, in bold relief, against the spotless, blue sky, they were, in all their brilliancy and magnificence, reflected from the smooth, lilly-sprinkled Bendemir. The fragrance of the orange groves came over the senses, in all their sweetness; and the ripe, tempting blush of the delicious peach of Persia, was mingled in the same garden with the scarlet blossoms of the pomegranate.

The towering and majestic columns of ruined Persepolis raised their proud heads in the midst of silence and desolation. What a place for moralizing! Persia's proud monarchs,—where were they? Cyrus, the man destined by Heaven to humble Babylon—Cambyses, who closed the long line of the Pharaohs, and caused the sun of Egyptian glory to set in desolation and blood, had here marshalled their legions—here displayed their unbounded magnificence and power:—but now perhaps the very whirlwind, which is sweeping through the columns of that stupendous temple, is sporting with their dust, and mingling it with that of their meanest and veriest slaves. Here, too, Schiras lifts its towers, spreads its beautiful gardens, and from its minaret is heard the follower of Ali, calling the faithful to prayer. But the bustle of Schiras is hushed; its streets are deserted; its crowds have poured forth from its gates; and the prancing of Persian steeds, the glancing of scimeters, and the clouds of smoke, plainly designate the course pursued by the immense cavalcade. Schiras was indeed that day empty. All who could possibly join the throng, had willingly assisted to swell the tide of human beings that Schiras had that day poured forth to greet the triumphant entry of Abbas Mirza, the son of the reigning Shah, who had been appointed governor of the province, and who, in addition to the usual parade on such occasions, had resolved to make a magnificent entry, graced with the splendor and renown he acquired by his successful termination of the Afghanistan war. The immense crowd had slowly made their way near the foot of the first range of the Hetzerdera; and, within view of that sublime and terrific pass, which forms almost the only opening through the mountains, whence the eye catches the first glimpse of the beautiful plain of Schiras, were waiting under a burning sun, with breathless impatience, the approach of the prince. In the throng, and jostled by soldiers, and moolah, Emir and Saracen, mingled with Armenian merchants and dancing girls from Ispahan,—was to be seen a solitary Englishman, mounted on a spirited Persian charger, and accompanied by a single attendant, whose turban and attaghan sufficiently showed his Asiatic origin. Murmurs of impatience and dissatisfaction had begun to buzz through the multitude, when a band of Persian cavalry approached, descending the pathway, and instantly hushed all symptoms of disapprobation. These heralds of the approach of the prince were far more richly and splendidly dressed than any thing which Francis Everington had seen, accustomed, as he in some measure had been, to the displays of oriental magnificence.

Francis Everington was a young Englishman, who had accompanied Mr. Morlei, in his embassy to Persia; but who had been left sick at Ispahan, when the embassy left that country, and was now with his faithful attendant, Hamors, on his way to Bassorah on the Persian gulf, with the intention of obtaining a passage to India, and thence to Europe. He had taken a position beneath a cluster of orange trees, which served, in some measure, to shade him from the intense heat of the sun, on a small eminence, whence he had a fine view of the mountain pass, the descending cavalry and the multitude by which he was surrounded. He had stationed himself too, fortunately, at the point where the prince was to pass, at whose feet, with the ready submission of Eastern slaves, all were now anxiously waiting to prostrate themselves.

The attention of the living mass of human beings had been so much engrossed by the party which were considered as the harbingers of the prince, that Everington and his servant were scarcely noticed. They were alone, when a Circassian merchant, having a young woman in his company, was seen making his way through the crowd, and approaching the orange trees. The dress of the man sufficiently indicated to the eye of Everington his rank and wealth; had either been doubtful, a single glance at his companion would have instantly satisfied him. The rich embroidered velvet pantaloons, worn by the Persian ladies—the splendid muslin robe—the shelega, or girdle, by which it was confined—the turban, fastened over a profusion of the finest locks, by diamond buttons—and the rich Cashmerian shawl, which was thrown carelessly over her head, and served, when necessary, the purpose of a veil,—all demonstrated that a person of no ordinary rank was before him.

“That is the rich merchant, Herman; and that female is his daughter, Corolinn, the most beautiful girl ever seen in Persia,” said Hamors to Everington, as the strangers came up.

With the instinctive politeness which characterized Everington, he removed from his station beneath the orange trees, that the young lady and her father might have the benefit of the shade. The young lady accepted the offer, but the father declined, and motioned to Everington to resume his station, which thus brought him in immediate contact with the fair Circassian.

A glance at the young lady showed that she was tall and elegantly formed; and the exact symmetry of her person, was shown by the dress which Persian ladies know so well how to arrange. Partly overcome by the fatigue of the ride, and partly by the excessive heat of the day, she no sooner found herself screened from the sun by the orange bower, than she proceeded to divest herself of her head dress. Everington had the happiness of seeing the beautiful creature unveiled, and in all her loveliness. Never had our young Englishman beheld such a vision of beauty; and while he inwardly admitted the truth of Hamors' assertion, he cursed the custom and the fate that doomed such a lovely creature to be offered in the market to minister to Persian vanity and lust. It was evident, as had been hinted by Hamors, that she was intended by her father for the harem of the prince, should she be fortunate enough to attract his notice. No sooner was her splendid turban removed, than her curling tresses, thickly sprinkled with pearls and gems, and unconfined, except by a single clasp of brilliants, flowed around her neck and bosom in all their unrestrained luxuriance. She had not alighted from her high spirited and snow white steed, which, with proudly arching neck, and pointed ears, seemed justly proud of his burden; but with a countenance in which lofty feeling was mingled with conscious purity and virgin innocence, she sat, hardly sensible of the interest she excited, and, like the goddess of beauty, an object worthy of the involuntary homage paid by all around her.

The troop of cavalry had now reached the foot of the mountain, where they were received with shouts by the assembled multitude. They announced that the prince might be expected in half an hour, and they, as harbingers of his approach, were ordered to make the necessary arrangements for his reception. They therefore speedily commenced dividing the multitude into two divisions, which lined the road for a great distance on both sides. In spite of some grumbling and menaces on the part of the soldiers, at the obstinacy of the infidel, as they termed Everington, he refused to quit his station, and maintained his position beneath the orange trees; and by the side of the enchanting Corolinn, who had been joined on the advance of the troops by her father. Scarce had these preparatory measures been taken, when a discharge of artillery from the mountain announced that Abbas Mirza was at hand. Soon the advance guard appeared winding over the rocky crest of the pass, and in martial order slowly descending to the plain. They were splendidly attired, and mounted on black horses; the long horse tails of their caps streaming in the wind, and their scimitars flashing like lightning in the bright rays of the sun. Then came twenty elephants, the first of the trophies of his victories over the rebellious Afghans. These moved in single file down the pass, caparisoned as they were when the fortune of war placed them in the possession of the Persian prince.

Following these came a train of two thousand captives, the flower of the Afghanistan army, men who had escaped the hard-fought but decisive battle which had sealed their fate. They were separated into divisions, by detachments of the cavalry; and though bound, and bare headed, they showed no marks of cowardly dejection, but bore the undaunted air of men, brave and robust, but unfortunate indeed, and conscious that the cause in which they were suffering was just. One hundred of the bravest of their number had been selected and put to death, as examples to those who might hereafter engage in such projects; and those were reserved to serve as slaves of the victor in carrying on those works of improvement he had already projected. Then came a train of two hundred Afghan maidens, who had been torn from the happy hills and vallies of their native homes, to swell the train of the conquerors, and in all the budding beauty of youth, destined to increase the captor's wealth by their sale, or minister to the licentious appetites of their mussulmen, and inhuman masters. They were unveiled, and as the beautiful train passed the place where young Corolinn was sitting, a sigh swelled her gentle bosom, and Everington saw a tear trembling on the silken lashes of her dark eyes, as she gazed with interest on their saddened features.

"Alas!" thought Everington, as he looked with admiration on the lovely girl, "how little difference is there between their doom and that to which you are destined."

Next came a train of five hundred led horses attended by a slave, and their rich caparisons, their long waving manes and tails, their proud walk and curving necks, were a full proof of their value, and of the estimation in which they were held. Then came the imperial flag of the empire, borne by the king's standard bearer, its broad folds of silk decorated with the arms of Nadi Shah. This splendid memento of Persian greatness was always guarded by a chosen body of nobles, who had sworn on the Koran to preserve it or perish. The prince's band of music next followed in the procession, and over the sweet notes of flute and tabor, were heard, at intervals, the spirit-stirring notes of the Abyssinian trumpet.

Amidst the discharge of cannon, and shouts of the multitude, next appeared the Prince Abbas Mirza himself, dressed in the most rich and splendid manner,—his apparel glittering with gold and diamonds—his beautiful milk-white steed richly caparisoned, and impatiently spurning the ground, over which the pace of the procession compelled him to move at so slow a rate. The prince appeared to be not far from thirty; of fine and commanding figure, and an exterior which denoted the successor to the crown of Persia. He managed his horse without the least effort—and exhibited in every movement that grace and ease for which the Persian in Asia, like the Frenchman in Europe, is distinguished. Then came, borne in closely covered palanquins, on the shoulders of black eunuchs, and surrounded by a guard of the same unfortunate race, the favorite wives and concubines of the prince, those that constituted his harem, but were now, as always, effectually secluded from the gaze of those around. Then came another detachment of guards, and the procession was closed by an immense rabble of all classes.

As heavy to me, as 'tis odious; but
The mistress which I serve, quickens what's dead,
And makes my labors pleasures.—Shakspeare.

Two hours had already elapsed since the signal which announced the appearance of the prince was given, yet he had scarcely reached the plain, and to the eye of the observer there was no end to the throng that continued to pour down the defile. When Abbas Mirza appeared among his new subjects, loud and repeated shouts rent the air—the most extravagant demonstrations of joy were exhibited as he passed along the avenue which had been kept clear for the procession; the moolahs invoked the blessing of Ali and the Prophet upon him, not forgetting a few imprecations upon the followers of Omar, and the accursed infidels.

As the prince slowly passed, the multitude fell on their faces. Not so with Everington; he had dismounted from his horse as a proper tribute of respect to the prince, but when he saw the crowd prostrating themselves, and ready to lick the dust, he flung his arms over the neck of his steed, and remained standing, notwithstanding the entreaties of Hamors, who pulled his master's coat and requested him at least to comply so far as to kneel. With a feeling which partly belonged to his spirit as an Englishman, and partly to his curiosity to see as much of the proceedings as possible, he replied, "that no orders had been issued to that effect, and therefore he should act his pleasure."

At this moment, Everington cast his eyes on the fair Circassian, and saw with surprise that she had imitated his example, and was standing by the side of her horse, from which her father assisted her to alight. Accustomed however to pay obedience to her father's command, she kneeled, but it was not until the position of Everington had drawn the eyes of the prince and his guard upon them.

"You are lost forever," said the terrified Hamors, in an under-tone, when he heard one of the officers whisper to the Cadi, "see that infidel dog; shall I not give his carcass to the ravens?"

The Cadi hesitated a moment, then in an answer which was inaudible to Hamors, appeared to postpone the punishment of the temerity which had dared to offer such an insult to the prince. Perhaps Everington was the more insensible to the danger that threatened himself, from the circumstance of his attention being drawn at that moment to his fair companion.

She was in the act of kneeling, at the moment that the boldness of Everington had attracted the notice of Abbas Mirza, but by some accident the veil which she had resumed, occasioned by her haste to obey the orders of her parent, fell off, and exhibited to the charmed and fascinated eyes of the prince, all that blushing beauty which had enraptured Everington. He involuntarily paused for a moment, while she hastened to replace the veil, and escape from the gaze to which she saw she was subjected. The prince ordered her father to approach. Hardly understanding the nature of the command, he arose and advanced a few steps, and seeing the eye of Mirza was still fixed upon him, again dropped on his knees.

"Rise," said the prince, in a gracious manner, "I wish to speak with you."

Herman obeyed.

"Is that beautiful maiden your daughter?"

Herman answered in the affirmative. The prince spoke a few words to a young and gallant looking officer near him; and then, directing an attendant to bestow a purse of gold on Herman, passed on. During the interview, every nerve of Everington trembled with agitation; and ere his heart had acknowledged the interest he felt in the lovely girl near him, he found himself cursing the ill luck which had thus given him so powerful a rival. The procession moved on towards Schiras, and the multitude followed in the rear, in the same tumultuous and irregular manner which characterized their march from the city. Everington assisted Corolinn in mounting her horse, and as he did so, pressed one of the fairest, softest hands he had ever seen to his lips, and the slight tremor of her hand convinced him that she understood the language it was intended to convey.

It was with considerable difficulty that Everington and his attendant managed to keep near the merchant and his fair daughter; although she seemed evidently to wish to remain near them. When they reached the gate of the city where they were to separate, Everington, who was at her side, saw her lift the veil unnoticed by her father, and the sweet smile which accompanied her motioned farewell caused his blood to flash over him quick as the electric stream. He bowed—she reached forth her hand, and pressed his with ardor; he hastily obeyed the signal of Hamors to retire.

"By heavens," said Everington to Hamors, as they left the procession, "that young Corolinn is one of the most charming creatures I ever saw; she is one of your Peris descended from paradise to enchant and bless mankind."

"So thinks Abbas Mirza," answered Hamors, with as much coolness as if he had not mentioned a subject nearest to the heart of Everington; "and unless I am much mistaken, she is soon to add another to the beauties he has already collected in the harem."

"Against her will, she shall never become his," said Everington with vehemence; "I would tear her from him by force, rather than see that beautiful girl become his victim."

"Hush, for Ali's sake!" said Hamors; "if you are overheard, it will be death to us both. You may depend on being closely watched; your offence at the foot of the Hetzerdera will be sufficient to condemn you if you should be guilty of the smallest action here that could be construed into a crime."

"Hamors," replied Everington, "I fear not for myself; I defy the power of Mirza; but I cannot rest easy until I learn the destination of Corolinn: we are now at the gate of our mansion, do you return to the town, and if possible learn the residence of Herman and his daughter. Get near her if you can;" and taking a fine brilliant from his finger, he added—"give her this ring; the motto, 'I will never forsake,' will announce to her my determination."

"My dear master," said Hamors as he took the ring, "if you value your liberty, if you value your life, listen for once to me—forget that Corolinn exists; give up all hopes of her becoming yours, if you have for a moment entertained that idea. I heard the prince give orders to the Cadi to provide for Herman and his daughter, and to attempt to gain her from him will be certain destruction."

"She shall be taken from him," answered Everington firmly, "unless she chooses to remain with him; and much am I mistaken if she would not prefer the desert and liberty, to being the slave or wife of Abbas Mirza."

Hamors departed, and Everington, highly displeased with that rule of Persian etiquette, which prevents a lady from allowing herself to be addressed in public, and had thus prevented an explanation he so much desired, threw himself upon the carpet to await, with the anxiety and impatience of a lover, the return of his servant.

He came at last, but had been unsuccessful. He had indeed learned from a friend, that by direction of the prince, Herman and his daughter had been conducted to a palace, though what one he could not learn, and that the prince had openly avowed his admiration of the beautiful Corolinn, and his intention, at no distant day, to make her his bride.

"You have indeed been unfortunate," said Everington, striving to restrain his impatience, "but she must be found."

"She shall be found," was the reply of Hamors.

"Hamors, I do not question your fidelity," said Everington, who thought he discovered in his servant's voice, a fear that he was deemed unfaithful.

"While life remains I will serve you," said the attached and faithful Hamors; "and perhaps I may this night be able to aid you in your wishes. The prince gives to night a splendid entertainment at the palace of the king; I have some skill on the kanoon, I will endeavor to obtain admittance as a musician, and see if I cannot discover the object of your anxiety."

"Stay," said Everington, "we will change situations; I will be your servant, and accompany you; and trust to my skill to make me welcome."

"Allah forbid!" exclaimed Hamors, "you will certainly be discovered, and then your fate will be inevitable."

"You remonstrate in vain," said Everington, "my resolution is taken, and we have not a moment to lose in making our preparations."

These were soon completed, and in the guise of Persian wandering minstrels, they soon left their mansion, and mingled with the crowd that were hastening to catch a glimpse of the imposing and gorgeous spectacle. Everington had spent so much of his life in the East, that he was familiar with the Persian language and music; and he trusted to the tact and experience of Hamors to extricate himself from difficulty, should any occur. They were not long in reaching the palace; and passing the double line of guards, were admitted into the splendid apartment. The scene which now burst upon him had the overwhelming effect of enchantment. The gilded collonades—the glittering lamps—the numberless mirrors, that threw back, in redoubled brilliancy, sparkling lights and beautiful forms that were mingling in the endless maze—and the crowd of moolahs and Emirs, with their waving plumes and glittering cimatars, attendants upon the prince, together with the uncertainty he felt in regard to his success, and the certainty of death, should he, the infidel, be detected in that retreat of the faithful, almost made Everington's head dizzy, and he half repented his hazardous undertaking. With as much confidence, however, as he could assume, he and his servant mingled with the throng, and slowly made their way through the first to the second room of state, where the prince was receiving the homage of the new dignitaries of his government, and the salutations of all those whose situations or wealth entitled them to enter the palace. Everington arrived at the moment these ceremonies closed, and the assembled multitude had begun to indulge in the sports and festivities which the prince had prepared for the occasion. The wide folding doors which opened on the gardens of the palace, were, as they entered, thrown wide open.

Soft strains of music were heard, and the lute and syrinda broke the spell which seemed to enchain the faculties of all present. Roses were strewn over the rich Persian carpets, and the very air was perfumed—hundreds of the most bright and beautiful of Schiras were gliding to and fro—parties of beautiful dancing girls from India, brought to swell the train of the prince, their swelling bosoms scarcely veiled, their white feet glancing in the brilliant light of the lamps, and their robes hung round with small silver bells, were mingling in the voluptuous dance—around, reclined on sofas, splendidly dressed in the robes and shawls of the Cashmere, their turbans sparkling with diamonds and pearls, were to be seen the loveliest of women, and at their feet their adorers, busy in pointing out the most striking parts of the animated scene. The musicians moved through the apartments, as fancy or inclination prompted; now called to strike the lively kitar, or tabor, to a company, whose feet were moving in the gay mazes of the dance; in another part, the soft kanoon might be heard, as some impassioned lover poured forth his soul in his song, and drew tears from the breathless listeners. But while the talents of Everington and his attendant were frequently put in requisition, he in vain sought among the sparkling eyes and periforms which made the palace seem a second paradise of the faithful, the object of his wishes. The superior tones of his lute made him welcome wherever he presented himself; but his wanderings were frequently checked to breathe forth some of those melting airs, which never fail to enchant the soul, and 'lap it in elysium.' The throne, which had been placed at one extremity of the apartment, had been vacated; the cushions made of the richest silks, and filled with down from the cygnet of the Ganges, were not now pressed by their princely owner; he had left his marble steps and ivory chair, to mingle in the sweet confusion, to catch at a less distance the bright glance of beauty, and in the thoughtless pleasure and hilarity of a subject, forget, for a moment, the cares of government.

Everington passed on to the doors which led to the gardens of the prince. The cool evening air was freighted with fragrance from groves of myrtle and acacia, and perfumes from the cedar, the pomegranate and the orange. The musk-rose of the Bendemir too, lent its blossoms and its fragrance, and the soft south wind came over the fevered brow and anxious spirit of Everington with balmy effect. The moon was shining bright on kiosk and minaret; martial music was heard from the camp; and nearer the undefined bounds of the city and palace were mingled with the tripping of light feet—the melting strains of music—and the light hearted laughter of beings that seemed to have never known care.

Wearied with the fatigues of the day and the exertions of the evening, and a prey to a feverish anxiety, Everington and his attendant Hamors, after enjoying the beauties of the evening for a short time, entered an acacia bower, and seated themselves on one of the raised and moss-covered banks. Hamors took his kitar and touched the strings to so sweet and lively a prelude that a number was soon collected around them. Soon came a party of three or four, whose unconstrained and graceful movements, the richness of their robes, and the precious stones which glittered in their turbans, plainly denoted to be individuals of no ordinary rank. Attracted by the music, they approached; they paused; and pleased, they seated themselves. There was one young lady, who, after listening some time to the praises bestowed upon the gay and lively serenade of Hamors, inquired if there was not one who could strike the strings to a sadder note, some tale of hopeless, helpless love; and her voice had something in it which showed that such a theme would be far more congenial to her feelings.

The lady who made this request was seated on a rich Indian shawl which her attendants had spread for her, and at her feet was the person evidently her lover. The ends of the silver-woven turban which encircled his head, hung gracefully behind his shoulders; a cimetar, the handle of which was studded with gems, was suspended at his side; and, as the dancing moonlight fell upon his head, the diamond crescent which ornamented the front of his turban, revealed to Everington, the Prince, Abbas Mirza, and the person of the female could no longer be doubtful. Everington did not wait a second invitation from the lady to perform that which lay nearest to his heart; but removing himself nearer to her feet, touched the strings of the lute to a sweet and simple air which he learned at Delhi. His voice slightly faltered as he sung the last stanza, in which this noble youth replies to the command of the weeping maiden, to forget her for ever, as heaven had forbid their union:

Forget thee!—bid the white wing'd dove
Forsake the lov'd one's nest,—
Roll back the sun, as slow he sinks
To grace the gorgeous west.
Bid spring's sweet flowers and golden fruit
To gem the leafless grove—
All may be done, ere my fond heart
Shall once forget thee, love.

There was a deep and breathless silence, as with a voice that trembled with emotion, he sung the air; and when he closed, there was a general murmur of approbation.

"By the head of Ali, that musician must have felt what he has described, and should be rewarded by us," said the Prince, as he flung Everington a piece of gold.

The lady said nothing, but as it was a custom for them to reward the minstrel, she took out some gold, and as Everington kneeled before her, placed it in his hand, repeating at the same time, in a low but emphatic manner, the last words which had just fallen from his lips.

There was a slight agitation of her hand as he touched it; there was that same witching melody in her voice which accompanied the farewell at the gate, which was enough; and Everington felt as though the sun had suddenly burst forth from the midst of clouds and storms. Danger, indeed, there was: difficulties to be overcome; yet who, such bright eyes beaming, and such sweet tones encouraging, would have thought of dangers and difficulties? Everington could not, while the delicious tone, that the beautiful Corolinn was faithful, was sounding in his ears. Hamors now struck up a sprightly lay, and the prince and his companions, with their attendants, left the bower; and as they did so, a light breeze wafted aside the veil, and in the moonlight, Everington saw that the eyes of the maiden were turned upon him with such an appealing glance of tenderness, that had a doubt of her feelings existed before, that look would have removed them all. Everington replied by placing his hand on his heart; and after the prince had departed, soon followed to the palace. Here, after indulging a little longer in the mirth and festivities, he listened to the music, which, from the gardens, the banks of the Bendemir, and the city, rose as if by magic, and mingled in the stillness of the night, like strains of the houris, in the mussulman paradise. Everington and Hamors left the palace in the same way they had entered it, passed the guards without being discovered, and reached their lodgings in safety.

CHAPTER III.

The course of true love never did run smooth.

Shakspeare.

The next day, and the next, passed away without Everington's being able to hear any thing from a person, in whose fate he was so deeply interested. The merchant too was invisible; and though Hamors faithfully watched all comers and goers to the palace, nothing of them was to be seen. He indeed learned from some, in the train of the prince, that in order more strongly to cement the friendship which existed between the prince and his new subjects of Schiras, he had declared to select from the most beautiful of their women another one to add to his harem; and report, now as before, fixed upon the daughter of the Circassian merchant as the happy individual who was to be thus honored. It was further stated that the marriage ceremony would be performed in a few days, and with all imaginable splendor.

To Everington, who had strong reason for believing that rumor was not in this instance the liar which it so often is, and with so much justice represented to be, this intelligence, though not unexpected, was gall and wormwood. If it was what he had feared, still until now hope had whispered that the fears he felt arose from the dread of a rival, and the intensity of his affections for the beautiful Corolinn. He spent the day in a thousand wild and useless projects. In disguise, during the moonlight evenings, he examined, as he dared, the pile of buildings in which fancy pictured his loved one to be a prisoner. He gazed on the high walls which surrounded the palace and gardens of the prince, but was unable to catch a glimpse of her he so much wished to see. Everington recollected that the garden in which the entertainment had been given reached to the walls of the city, and that they were washed by the Bendemir. Love is fruitful in expedients. The thought occurred to him that some spot might be found where he could, from the river, enter the gardens, and though the enterprise might be fraught with hazard, he determined on making the attempt. Hamors procured a light boat, and in it, when night came on, disguised as they were on the evening of the entertainment, they mingled with the numerous parties, which in their fanciful water craft, were enjoying all the glories of an oriental evening. The air was balmy, music came over the waters—the light dipping of the numerous oars fell upon the ear with measured and soothing effect—crowds were clustered on the covered banks of the river—nightingales were emulating the sweet tones of the Persian lute and sy-rinda; the fire-fly was darting amidst the thick-woven and deep green foliage of the pomegranate and Indian fig tree; and from the garden of the prince came the rich odors of the jessamine, citron and rose.

Everington and Hamors floated along through the delightful scene, the former too deeply intent on another object to enjoy fully the witcheries of the present. The walls next the water were carefully and anxiously examined; but even the searching eye of Everington could discover no place where access appeared within the limits of possibility. Sometimes, mingled with the fragrance which the light evening breeze wafted from the gardens, came the melting sounds of distant music—gay and laughing voices—and once Everington started, as tones, which he was willing to swear were those of the charming Corolinn, and which sent the blood thrilling to his fingers' ends, were heard warbling one of those sweet and pathetic airs, for which the maidens of her own country were so celebrated. They were about to relinquish their attempt as hopeless; the river was washing the last angle of the wall; the gay company had begun to disperse, and Everington was about to give orders for their return, when he happened to see that from the branches of a pomegranate which rose above the wall on the inner side, a vine, of that kind which produces the rich wine of Schiras, had spread its tendrils upon the wall, and loaded with fruit, had descended till its clusters hung at the very water's edge.

"What think you," said Everington, as he turned the light machine in which they were floating, so as to bring them close to the wall; "what think you Hamors, of making a ladder of these vines, with which to scale the wall! Is it practicable?"

"Perfectly so," answered the slave, as he grasped one of the vines and drew the boat to the wall; "but would it not be advisable to wait until the moon has set, as at this time we shall be more likely to be observed in our attempt than then?"

"True," replied Everington, "but you will remember, that by waiting we shall diminish the chance of meeting those we wish to see. Now is the hour, but it will soon be past."

"It is enough," said Hamors; and in a moment the light skiff was secured to one of the vines; thus, should it be necessary, affording the means of escape. An angle of the wall screened them, in some measure, by intercepting the light of the moon, and in a few moments, Everington, followed by Hamors, stood in safety, on the top of the wall, a distance of thirty feet from the water. On the inside, the descent was attended with little or no difficulty, and carefully reconnoitering the ground, Everington advanced. It was not long before he found himself in the vicinity of the very bower where he had met the young Corolinn and the prince on the night of the festival. Everington had already passed several groups of gay and laughing hours, but she whom he most wished to encounter, was not, he was confident, among them.

As he and his servant cautiously and silently approached the secluded and beautiful retreat, they suddenly heard voices, and listening a moment, perceived they were females conversing lowly but earnestly. The quicker ear of Everington instantly detected the silver-toned voice of Corolinn, and his heart fluttered to think he was so near the lovely object of his adoration. In a whisper to Hamors, he directed him to remain where he was, while he ventured to approach near enough to discover how many, and what persons were there, and how employed.

If danger was approaching, Hamors was to communicate the intelligence by a shrill whistle. Everington then, with noiseless step, approached the bower, and to his joy saw that the beautiful Corolinn was reclining on the very couch which she had occupied when he performed the part of a minstrel at her feet; a place now filled by a young woman who was evidently her attendant. Near her was one of the richest sofas of Ispahan, which the prince, on her happening to mention the pleasure she took in visiting that place, had ordered, without her knowledge, to be placed there, and certainly it could not have been destined to support a lovelier burden. Her hair was loosened from the diamond clasp, and flowing in rich curling tresses around her beautiful and polished neck. She held in her hand a cluster of the fragrant white roses, brought from the banks of the Nerbuddah; and was, while conversing, slowly scattering the pure leaves on the earth around her.

"So perish our sweetest, dearest hopes," said she with a sigh; "to-morrow, Myrtilde, you say the prince has determined this hateful ceremony shall be performed, and the sacrifice completed!"

"Not to-morrow, madam, but the day after," replied the attendant.

"One more day of happy freedom is then mine," said Corolinn; "if I must become the victim, let the sacrifice be delayed to the latest hour possible."

"It can be delayed no longer," said the servant; "you remember the last words of Abbas Mirza, this morning?"

"I remember them too well," replied the young Circassian; "O that I could see the Frank once more before I am lost to all hope of happiness!"

Everington was on the point of throwing himself at her feet, but prudence prevented and he listened.

"Alas, my dear mistress!" was the answer of the attendant, "if you should, he could not help you; and he might, instead of saving you, only involve himself in ruin."

"Allah forbid that I should bring destruction upon him," said the beautiful girl, adding in a voice that trembled with deep emotion, "perhaps he thinks not of me; I will perish rather than be to him the cause of evil, or the source of one moment's misery."

Everington waited no longer, he left his retreat, and presenting himself before them, pronounced the name of Corolinn. The beautiful girl sprang from her seat and exclaimed—"Allah be praised!" and in an instant was clasped to Everington's bosom.

When the first wild and unchecked gush of transport was over, the danger to which the person she so tenderly loved was exposed, rushed upon her mind, and throwing herself on her knees before him, she bathed his hand with tears.

"Fly, fly!" said the lovely creature, in the low, deep tones of passionate agitation; "fly before ruin overtakes you; before it overtakes us both—fly and be happy beyond the reach of a tyrant!"

"When I have seen you safe—when I have seen you freed from the bondage which has been imposed on you—when I have heard my destiny from your own lips, and know whether you will fly with me, and not before," said Everington, as he raised Corolinn from the earth, and with her seated himself upon the sofa.

The beautiful Corolinn was before him; his arm was around her slender waist; he felt the deep, quick throbbings of her heart as she reclined upon his bosom; it was a moment of almost delirious ecstasy; and the fervent kiss that he imprinted on her unpolluted lip, was coined in the mint of pure and hallowed affection.

"I fly with you!" replied the blushing girl; "Oh, no, I cannot; would to heaven I could; but the attempt would be the destruction of us both: go and leave me to my fate, and may the blessing of the Prophet attend you!"

"With you, but not without," replied Everington firmly.

At that moment the whistle of Hamors was heard, and the ear of Everington detected voices of men at a distance.

"The guards are on their rounds—fly, or we are lost for ever—fly, and leave me to my fate!" exclaimed the agitated girl, as she flung her white arms around his neck.

"Will you meet me at this place to-morrow evening?" inquired Everington, who was warned by the repeated summons of his servant that he had not a moment to lose.

"I will meet you," was the hurried answer of the maiden; "I will meet you, though it can avail nothing."

The young lady who was in attendance, and who, on perceiving that it was Everington, had retired to a little distance from the lovers, now approached.

"My dear mistress, we must be gone," she said, as she threw the Cashmere around Corolinn; and as the young Circassian, leaning on the arm of her maid, left the bower in one direction, Everington darted into a thicket of shrubbery by another. Here he remained until the guards had passed, when he joined Hamora, and together they reached their boat in safety.

CHAPTER IV.

So light to the croupe the fair lady he swung,
So light to the saddle before her he sprung;
"She's won! we are gone, over bank, bush and seaur,
They will have fleet steeds that follow," quoth young Loch-invar. Scott.

The next day was spent by Everington in making the necessary preparations for flight. Horses were procured, and every thing was arranged long before the evening came on. It was the intention of Everington to gain, if possible, the passes of the Hetzerdera before morning with his prize, and then secrete themselves or proceed as circumstances should dictate. Among the rude but hospitable natives of these mountains, he knew he could have time to determine on his further course. He was the more confirmed in his plan, because Hamors had spent some years in that region when young, and was well acquainted, not only with the Kurdistan dialect spoken there, but was familiar with the localities of that mountain region; and because from that point he could, with equal ease, pursue his route to Bag-dat or Tefish.

Evening came and found every thing prepared for flight. As the last rays of the setting sun gilded the peaks of the Hetzerdera, Everington and Hamors placed their steeds in a thick grove of mangoes, at a considerable distance from the city, and but a short space from the river—down which, should they succeed in escaping from the gardens, they knew it would be necessary to float. They procured the little skiff which they had used the evening previous, and as the moon began to decline and mark the hour appointed, Everington and his servant found themselves at the place of ascent. The boat was again secured, and again they successfully ascended the wall. Every thing around them bore the same appearance of festivity and joyousness which it had done the evening before. The palace was illuminated—lamps glittered in every recess to which the moonbeams could not penetrate—gay and beautiful forms, the tenants of the harem, were gliding about; their steps followed at a distance by the black eunuchs, who had them in charge—music lent its witchery; and while the adventurer carefully threaded his way through the most unfrequented walks, and at intervals caught glimpses of the majestic domes of the palace—while he listened to the sweet notes of music, the air freighted with the fragrance of a thousand flowers, he felt that the splendid scenes of oriental romance were not altogether fabulous.

Silently they approached the bower, and Everington breathed more freely, when he saw two female forms, the airy gracefulness of one of which he could not mistake, enter beneath the shadows of the orange and acacias, whose branches met and mingled over the opposite entrance. He was not mistaken, for in a moment the beautiful Corolinn was in his arms and clasped to his bosom.

"Thank Heaven! we have met, I trust, never again to separate," said Everington, as he affectionately kissed the blushing girl.

"We have met," said the lovely maiden in a voice which trembled with deep feeling; "we have met, but it is that I may warn you of your danger, bid you farewell, and be miserable."

"Corolinn," said Everington, "if you love me, think not that any danger threatens me; think of the fate that awaits you, if you remain where you are."

"Gracious Allah protect me!" exclaimed the beautiful girl, as a sense of her helpless situation flashed over her mind, and she instinctively clung to the arm of the person she loved, and from whom—she scarcely knew how—she looked for protection and safety.

"We are losing the precious time," said Everington, taking the fearful and half-reluctant Corolinn in his arms; with his lovely burden he led the way to the wall, followed by their two attendants. Without difficulty they ascended to the summit, whence, without delay, Everington descended to the boat, into which Hamors lowered the girls, and having witnessed their safety, followed himself.

Loosing the boat from its grape-vine fastenings, they floated down the river, passing numbers both on the waters and on the shores, who were enjoying the beautiful evening; and Hamors, to prevent notice, mingled the music of his flute with that, which from the shores echoed over the waters, on which the last rays of the moonbeams were lingering. Gradually the music died away; the sweet song of the nightingale from the rose-bordered margin of the river, seemed to swell higher and clearer; and when the moon sunk behind the western mountains, and the stars began to glitter in the deep blue sky, the boats sought the shores; and though many spent the night in the gardens that bordered the river, yet that was soon deserted, and Everington and his fair Corolinn, with their attendants, were soon floating on in silence and alone.

Corolinn reclined on the bosom of Everington; her hand was clasped in his, and he saw that tears were trembling in her dark eye.

"My dear girl," said he, "come, cheer up your spirits; the danger is past, heaven will bless us, and we shall be happy."

"Allah grant that the danger may be passed," replied Corolinn; "but I tremble when I think what awaits us if we are overtaken in our flight—for myself I care not, I can die, and will die sooner than submit to the fate to which I am destined by the prince—but for you——"

"O think not of me," replied Everington, interrupting her; "I do not intend to be overtaken;

and if we are, do not think that I shall forsake you; I can at least die for you."

"This morning," said the blushing maiden, "the prince came to me, took my hand, and requested me to walk with him in the garden. I could not do otherwise than comply. 'Why so dejected?' said he, as we turned into a walk that led us from the observation of the attendants; 'why so dejected on the eve of an event which I had reason to believe would have filled you with pleasure?' 'Gracious prince,' I answered, 'I am unworthy of the honor you design me; forgive me when I say that splendor and royalty have no charms for me. Let me entreat you to forget me, and in some of these noble Persian families, seek a bride worthy of yourself, and your destiny.' The prince looked at me sternly and fixedly for a moment, and I trembled beneath his glance. 'By the sword of Ali, I see how it is,' he exclaimed fiercely; 'that rascally Frank, that accursed infidel, has been beforehand with me in the winning of your affection; but know that Abbas Mirza is not thus to be thwarted in his wishes, and were it not that I have promised to delay until to-morrow, the ceremony that makes you mine, should take place within an hour.' As he pronounced these words, he laid his hand on his cimeter, and swore by the prophet, should he discover any thing on your part to justify the act, no punishment should be too severe for the presumption of an accursed infidel. I threw myself on my knees before him, and with tears begged him not to drive me to desperation—told him that I could never give him my heart, could never love him, and entreated him to forget me. 'Sweet girl,' said he, 'talk not to me of forgetfulness. I shall not try to forget you; these feelings of yours, you must forget; this reluctance you must overcome, and consent in the splendor of my court, to shine the brightest star in the heaven of India, the most brilliant gem in the diadem of Persia's prince.' I perceived that it was in vain to remonstrate; and as at that moment he was called by a slave, I was left to reflect on the ominous manner in which he repeated, as he left me, the words—'remember to-morrow!'"

The boat had now floated down the current to the place where the horses were secreted; and, running the little bark on the shore, they ascended the bank and soon found themselves seated on spirited chargers, and while Hamors led the way across the plain of Schiras, Everington rode by the side of the fair Circassian; who had, as the distance between them and the city increased, gradually recovered her spirits. With the fleetness of the wind, they were lessening the distance that separated them from the mountains; and as they approached the long sweeping range which bounded the plain on the west, the hope, that in its almost inaccessible gorges and defiles, they should be able to elude the pursuit which they feared, filled them with joy.

They had reached the mountains, and ascended the first range of hills, as the day broke, and revealed to them, in all its beauty, the city and plain they had left. The rising sun threw its glories over the ruins of Persepolis, and the dark shows of the massive columns that still remained standing, stretched like giants over the plain. Beyond, the smooth flowing Bendimir, glittered, like a silver thread, amidst gardens, and mosques, and groves, and palaces. The minarets of Schiras were visible, and the blue mountains which bounded the plain to the east, had their uneven outlines marked in the first gush of the sunbeams. Seated on a velvet moss-covered bank, beneath a huge mango tree, in a little dell, overshadowed with fragrant myrtle, the party reposed themselves; while Hamors produced some wine and fruits which he had provided, and thus formed that refreshment which their rapid ride had rendered so desirable, particularly to the ladies.

After they had finished their repast, they were congratulating themselves on the success which had attended their efforts to escape, when Everington observed the attention of Hamors fixed with anxiety on some object barely visible on the plain, in the direction of Schiras. Everington waited a moment, until he caught the eye of Hamors, when beckoning him to follow, he rose and walked a short distance, to a place where the opportunity for observation would be fairer, and where no alarm would be given to Corolinn.

"What see you that has thus rivetted your attention?" asked Everington when they were alone.

"That which, if it were possible my suspicions could be correct, would bode us no good," answered Hamors; "unless I am much deceived, there is a party of horsemen yonder; that cloud of dust indicates a rapid movement, and it is, I think, in this direction."

"Your eyes are better than mine, if you can make a party of horsemen out of that speck," said Everington; "but be it what it may, perhaps we had better be moving, as our horses by this time must be sufficiently breathed."

Corolinn and her attendant were now busily engaged in picking some of the wild berries of the mountain, and admiring the beautiful scenery below and above them; but they immediately obeyed the summons of Hamors, and the whole party were under way towards the second and loftier range of the mountain. After a ride of an hour, through a ravine that shut from their view the plain, they emerged on a kind of table land, from which they were able to view the course they had traversed, and they now found that the conjectures of Hamors were correct, as a dozen horsemen at least were plainly to be seen rapidly following the same track over the plain that had been pursued by themselves. Corolinn was not yet apprised of the apprehended danger; but to add to the fears of Everington, he saw from the signs of fatigue that she exhibited, although she complained not, that her delicate frame was unequal to the exertion which would, in all probability, be required to make their escape. It was impossible to conceal the danger longer from her, for her quick glance over the plain, at once saw the party, and comprehended their object.

"Everington," said she, while her blanched cheek told the agony of her feelings, "we are pursued; it is not yet too late for you to save yourself—leave me, and hasten to place that barrier of mountains between you and certain destruction."

"I regret, my dear Corolinn," replied Everington, "that you should have such a despicable opinion of me, as to suppose that I would forsake you now; no, my love, Abbas Mirza cannot make me shrink from my purposes of saving you, or perishing in the attempt."

"Let us not despair," said Hamors, "we are not as yet certain that these men are in pursuit of us; and if they are, I trust we shall find some way to evade them."

The horsemen were so near that they could be distinctly counted; and their polished arms glittering in the sun, and the long white horse-hair that waved from their caps, indicated that they belonged to the household troops of the prince, thus dispersing every doubt as to their object and destination. The fugitives now pressed forward with all the speed possible, but it was evident that Corolinn's strength was unequal to the task before them. Although she used every exertion to keep up her spirits, it was in vain; and the fatigue of another hour's riding, made it necessary that they should again halt.

"What can be done?" said Everington to Hamors; "can we not find some place where we may deviate from the usual route, and thus shun our pursuers, or be enabled to choose our own ground for our defence?"

"I have thought of such a plan myself," replied the faithful Hamors; "there is such a spot a little before us, but if we choose it and are overtaken, we must die or be captured: there is no leaving it."

"Do not hesitate," said the half fainting Corolinn; "in this course we must be overtaken; in that we may escape."

ACCIDENTS OF AUTHORSHIP.

Lady Mary Wortley Montague, is a remarkable instance of an author nearly lost to the world. She is only known to posterity (says D'Israeli) by a chance publication, for such were her famous Turkish letters; the manuscript of which her family once purchased with an intention to suppress, but they were frustrated by a transcript. The more recent letters were reluctantly extracted out of the family trunks, and surrendered in exchange for certain family documents which had fallen into the hands of a bookseller. Had it depended on her relatives, the name of Lady Mary had only reached us in the satires of Pope.

A TWILIGHT REVERIE.

BY JAMES CRANE, M. D.

Twilight again ! Its wavy shadows are descending around me, like the mountain mists in lowly vales. They are gathering thickly ; and methinks I see them rolling hither and thither with an undulating motion. How noiseless ! Those gleamings which but now were shooting up the West, are fainter and more dim ; and day is lapsing into night. See how the light and the shadows meet and mingle ! There they shoot again, those rays, glancing far away into the dark immensity. How wonderful !

This is the hour for reflection ; for all is hushed and silent as the movements of pleasing thoughts within the soul. All is still, save the beatings of the human heart. That throbs wildly, and we hope it ever will, at this hour, until the Master calleth us away to the splendors of a better world. These moments are happy resting-places for the troubled spirit. When a deadly quiet settles around us—and the tumult of the world is hushed—and the passions are lulled to their silent rest—'tis sweet to commit the soul to its own way,—to its contemplative wanderings. Unencumbered with this mortal vestment, and powerful in its own capacities, it holds high converse with the spirits of the invisible world—with beings palpable to its own perceptions. How tender are its musings ! how beautiful its reveries ! how delightful its communings with those "spiritual creatures," who "keep watch over the elements, and preside over the destinies of men !" How sublime are its aspirations, when, beyond the clouds—beyond the stars—beyond the limits of this mortal vision, onward it pursues its flight, and would fain pierce into the mysteries of the Eternity to come—of the Eternity which hath gone by ! Oh ! for a language—a power wherewith to embody these workings of the spirit, which are an ecstasy of delight—an excess of life. But the reflecting and imaginative mind well comprehends, and can with congenial sympathy, enter into these mysterious musings. There is a language comprehended by the spiritual senses, although it baffles all mortal power of expression. It requires not the tongue to give intelligibility to its meaning. There is a language of the stars—a language of the flowers : there is a voice in the night-wind—and in the "trumpet-blowing cataract :" there is a breathing poetry throughout this beautiful world—and in the mighty silence of the limitless space.

At this hour, such have been my reveries, these threescore years. Up to this old age, have I "reverenced the dreams of my youth." All its fair visions have gone with me through life, and now they bless me. Time has dealt kindly with me, and has gently besprinkled my brow with his frosts. Come with me then, and give one hour to idleness.

Let us wander far up the stream of Time again, and look upon the innocence—the simplicity—the purity of our departed childhood : for to the old, this power is specially given. This earth was made for youth, and was fashioned for its spirit to revel in, and in its splendors ever to delight. The spirit of beauty haunts the young soul like a presence—therefore, is creation fair. Mysterious musings hang about the spirit of our childhood—therefore, is creation wondrous. Come, and away with me then to the childhood's land, and let us take upon ourselves once more its tender sensibilities to Nature—its simple affection for her charms.

Nature was our mother there, and under her guidance, like children, we were led away from the world of man. Free as the air of heaven, she conducted us in our roving, and poured fresh beauties on the soul. Into our ears there glided most tender instruction, and all around our daily paths, she strewed the emblems of virtue and of wisdom. She was ever speaking to us ; and her language was understood. We wandered often in the groves and in the quiet woods. These were her temples ; and she held therein continual worship. A majestic presence was brooding there—a viewless being : and we stood in amazement—and fear came upon us, like an oppression—and we listened to deep sounds "manifold and wondrous." Solemnly they came from out the silence and the gloom, shedding a reverence and a sanctity upon the soul. Spirits were passing us in our wonderment, speaking in voices of the winds, and in murmurings of the waters—and sweet incense rose around us, and this was the breath of flowers. We stood upon holy ground, and while we worshipped, our young "hearts burned with us." This was Nature's lesson—and thus was the spirit taught to know there was a Power on high, wonderful to create and keep all things in love.

In the evening time, she also led us forth—at the blessed, quiet hour, when all the world is going to its rest. The vales were sleeping in repose—the birds and beasts were moving to their homes—the sun was sinking behind the West—and all the sounds of earth were hushed in reverence for the coming hour. The winds were quiet in their caves, and the gorgeous clouds, which hastened to the mountain tops, stopped suddenly—and there around the West they hung, bound by the solemn spell. Even man was rested from his troublous cares, and was still awhile, and came up with us in company to know yet once again, under what tender influences his childhood passed away. 'Twas quiet there—a Sabbath quiet, which moved far in and brooded on the soul, stirring all its depths to solemn musings. All our thoughts were holy thoughts, coming up from purest fountains ; and, though unwhispered here, were heard in heaven. We wept, and tears, fast tears, came from their resting-places—and on the bended knee, we breathed out thanks and prayers : for 'twas too much beauty for simple hearts to stand and gaze upon, unmoved. The adoration of that childhood's hour was worship most acceptable, and went forth up to the throne of God. And this was Nature's teaching too : and thus the spirit early learned to worship the Most High.

It was not at the twilight hour alone, nor in the quiet woods, that enchantments grew upon us, and "truths awoke to perish never." There too were solemn sounds when darkness came abroad—sounds coming to us from the far-off depths of space : and moving in upon us through the silence, with a grandeur all their own ; they spoke to us of the majesty of God. And there were gentler sounds than these—sweet murmurings poured out upon the bosom of the night ; and coming to us on the moonlight's ray, the word they spoke was "peace." At all time—in all seasons : from the green fields, and from the flowing streams : in the blushing morn, and in the deep blue ocean of the sky : from humble flowers—from every thing—their came a voice, "strong in its sweetness, the spirit to enthral."

Thus did Nature lead us with her maternal smiles ; and under such influences did we sojourn in that bright and happy land. Our spirits were purer there. They were not tainted by any unhallowed influence coming from the world. We worshipped the ideal ; and the beauty of our being was ever lingering near us. It was enough to gaze upon the brightness which shone everywhere around us, and to pry into the very life of things.

Happy those early days when I
Shrined in my angel infancy !
Ere I understood this place
Appointed for my second race :
Or taught my soul to fancy aught,
But a white celestial thought.
When on some gilded cloud or flower,
My gazing soul would dwell an hour,
And in those weaker glories, spy
Some shadows of Eternity—
Ere I had taught myself to wound
My conscience with a sinful sound :
Or had the black art to dispense
A several sin to every sense :
But felt through all this fleshly dress,
Bright shoots of Everlastingness.

Henry Vaughan.

And happy that one, who has preserved these feelings in his heart, beautiful in all their simplicity and freshness ! Such a man lives in a charmed existence. He is not chained down to things of time and sense. In his soul are mirrored the semblances of beauty in the world without. He turns to the world within, and makes his dwelling-place with the images of the true, the beautiful, the sublime. His ear is always sensitive to the silent lessons which all things communicate. His eye is always open to behold the perfection of this creation, and to look upon the evidences of a spirit of power and benevolence and love, which pervade it. A religion is ever around him and within him. The world is the temple of his worship, and in its silent places, he bends and gives the homage of a grateful heart to the great Architect of the universe—to the Dispenser of bounties which are ever varying and ever numerous. His devotions know no method or fixed seasons, but are ever fervent, and lively, and constant. In the volume of Nature, he beholds the perfections and attributes of the Deity ; and through Nature, he beholds her God. His life is a continual worship of God in his attributes, and his pleasures are but foreshadowings of a more perfect happiness in another and a better world.

With this twilight hour are associated also the home of my infancy, and the companions of my boyhood. They come before me with a thousand delicious reminiscences. In those seasons of quiet which then attend me : when the silence seems a solemnity too holy to be broken, the gentle waters of the soul are stirred—fondest memories are again awakened—and sweet sounds of happy voices vibrate tremblingly on my ear again.

Listen to the shouts of those happy children ! They are there in the far-off past, gamboling and frolicing in the gladsomeness of their hearts, over the sunny fields which stretch around the homestead. How beautiful those bright-eyed creatures in their playful innocence !

There is the mother too—her heart beating with joy and love—gazing on their sports and happiness. As that shadow is crossing her brow, what hopes and fears is she telling for their coming years ? A mother's heart can only know.

The sun has gone down, and "all the home-faces are met by the blaze." Those merry shouts are hushed. Those wild, joyous creatures, who seemed as if restless forever—with the loved and cherished mother, and venerated father—are circled together in solemnity to worship God. Those bright, fair beings are clustered around the sire, as he repeats

"Those strains that once did sweet in Zion glide."

Surely some angels were hovering over that blessed scene. But where is now that praying father—that tender mother ? They are gone to the "spirit-land." And those merry children, where are they ? Gone too—

They are all gone into a world of light,
And I, alone, sit lingering here :
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth cheer.

It glows and glitters in my cloudy breast,
Like stars upon some gloomy grove :
Or those faint beams in which the bill is drest,
After the sun's remove.

I see them walking in air of glory !
Whose light doth trample on my days :
My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,
Were glimmerings and decays.

Oh! holy hope and high humility!

High as the heavens above!

These are your walks, and you've showed them me,
To kindle my cold love.—Henry Vaughan.

Twilight reminds me of the feebleness and dimness of my old age. The circle of human life will be soon completed. Its two extremes—the first and second childhood—will soon glide into each other.

Far down the vale of years, on the desolate shores of Time, behold a bending form, venerable in its infirmity. In the misty twilight of his existence, he is wandering there, awaiting the summons, which shall call him to the boundless Ocean before him—the Ocean of Eternity. In the infancy of his years, life to him stretched itself far away into the coming future. In his manhood, he stood upon an elevated midway, between the extremes of life; while, behind him, lay the path of years in which he had strayed; and before, was expanded a part of that same future, beautified and brilliant with the illusive enchantments of Hope. But the future has now become the past—the proud strength of manhood has passed into the trembling feebleness of age—and he stands on that solemn shore, the dim shadow of his former self; while, in his ear, is ever sounding the murmuring of the ocean-wave, as it comes gliding and rippling at his feet.

And now, reader, farewell! And when death comes slowly on, may good spirits attend us, with power "to rob the spectre of its terror, and the grave of its sting: So that, all gently and unconscious to ourselves, life may glide into the great ocean where the shadows lie; and our spirits, without guile, may be severed from their mansions, without pain."

ESSAYS FOR SUMMER HOURS, by Charles Lanman. Boston: Hilliard, Gray & Co. London: Wiley and Putnam. 12 mo. pp 250.

This well printed, and handsome little volume, embraces a series of eighteen essays; the most of them founded in American scenery and associations. Some of the topics are furnished by the West, the native place of the young author; he has certainly done justice to the fresh scenes that are spread out in that interesting portion of the country. The talent of the writer is descriptive; he has painted, with remarkable fidelity and beauty, some of the most striking points of Western life. His language is chaste and well selected; and many of the moral reflections, growing out of the several subjects which he has selected for his essays, are expressed in an exceedingly interesting and even touching manner. We would especially commend to the attention of the reader, the essay, entitled 'the Old Indian,' and 'Thoughts on Literature.' Upon this latter topic, the author speaks boldly, and records sentiments which will find a response in the hearts of many. We cannot forbear alluding to the field which is spread out for the exercise of literary ability in the actual condition of our own country. In our national scenery, in our forests and lakes, our rivers and mountains, all impressed with the seal of magnitude, as well as in the peculiar circumstances connected with the aboriginal population of the country; and the causes which have marked its advance, there are ample materials for the richest productions of genius; and it only requires the right mind to work them up into splendid and lasting fabrics. We fain would hope that some genius of that sort might arise, who could impress upon our own country the same influence that has been stamped upon the soil of Europe by its master minds in this department of literature. We hope the author of the Essays may realize his fondest wishes by its publication.

MAMMALOGY: Second Book of Natural History. Prepared for the use of Schools and Colleges, by W. S. W. Ruschenberger, Surgeon U. S. Navy. From the text of Milne Edwards and Achille Comte, Professors of Natural History in the Colleges of Henry IV and Charlemagne. Philadelphia: Turner & Fisher.

The high commendations which we passed upon Dr. Ruschenberger's Physiology, or his First Book of Natural History, have been more than sustained by the schoolmaster. Though published but two or three months ago, such has been the demand for it in the school room, that it has already reached the 4th edition. The public have now the second number of Ruschenberger's series, which when completed will reach seven. This, owing to the subject, is less interesting to the general student, than the First Book is; though the subjects are well treated and clearly illustrated, and the author has acquitted himself with great credit. They are both excellent and useful school books. We commend them to all teachers in general—and in particular to Mr. Garnett, the Hercules of Education in Virginia.

BARNABY RUDGE, by Charles Dickens. (Box) author of the "Old Curiosity Shop," "Pickwick," "Oliver Twist," &c., &c., with numerous illustrations by Cattermole, Brown, and Gibson. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard, 1842.

Barnaby Rudge is an idiot boy who figured in the Gordon riots—alias, the 'no popery riots,' as they are sometimes called, of 1790. The object of the author in writing this book is to be discovered, he tells the reader, by perusal, which can by no means be said of all books. This is too often a secret which authors treasure up in their own hearts. But as 'Box' has indicated the mode by which his secret may be discovered, we do not feel inclined to 'peach,' but rather to let all enjoy the pleasure of reading and finding out for themselves. The illustrations are excellent—not so good though as those of its predecessors—one can almost read the book through, and get the gist of the story from them alone. Dickens is the most popular writer of the day—and Barnaby Rudge helps to sustain this character. The work is to be had at the bookstore of Messrs. Randolph & Co.

DEVOTIONAL MELODIES, by Charles M. F. Deems, A. B. Raleigh, N. C. Published by Thomas Jefferson Lemoy, 1841.

The Raleigh publishers have carried to its utmost stretch, the art of printing books, with 'rivers of margin and streams of matter'—the present volume, a duodecimo, being equal to less than four pages of the Messenger. The object of the author is to give devotional words to the most popular airs; and, in this he has succeeded. Nor is the idea, a bad one. He has given twenty hymns, breathing the spirit of true devotion, and set to such airs as 'Bonnie Doon'—

'Woodman, Spare that Tree'—'Oft in the Stilly Night'—'Angel's Whisper,' and the like. We should be glad to see the collection extended.

NAPOLÉON'S EXPEDITION TO RUSSIA, by Comte de Segur, in two volumes. New-York: Harper & Brothers, 1841.

These two make volumes 141-2 of the Family Library. The horrors of war were never exhibited in such a light and to such an extent as they were in this campaign. The 'Grand Army' amounted to nearly half a million of men—among whom were the élite of chivalry, and the most veteran-like soldiers of Europe. These volumes recount with great minuteness the glorious pomp and circumstance of this mighty host—its marches—its prowess—its entry with gloomy triumph into Moscow—the conflagration—its struggles against the violence of enemies, and the fury of the elements. They draw the most vivid picture of privations and suffering that the world ever saw. The two volumes compressed to half their present size, would have been a more valuable and useful publication. They may be bought at the bookstore of Messrs. Randolph & Co.

BALLADS AND OTHER POEMS, by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow: Author of "Voices of the Night," "Hyperion," &c., Second Edition. Cambridge: published by John Owen—1842.

Among the auspicious signs of the times in regard to American literature, is the popularity of Professor Longfellow's poetry. It has been so long a matter of course to regard poems as unsaleable in this country, and the poet's audience as a mere straggling band upon the outskirts of the reading world, that it is truly delightful to be able to point to the sixth edition of a volume of American verse, demanded in the course of a few months, by the eager application of the public. It is cheering to hail the efforts of a bard, whose every production interests a large class of the community and whose poems are no sooner published than they are called for at the bookstores as frequently, and with as little delay, as the new number of a popular story. Such was the case when the "Voices of the Night" appeared; and the beautiful volume before us has, thus far, met with equal, if not greater success. It consists of a delightful preface, in which there is no little poetry, delineating in a graphic and glowing manner, some of the phases of life in Sweden. This is an admirable introduction to the longest poem in the volume, which is a translation of a celebrated work of Bishop Tegnér, the greatest of Swedish poets. It is entitled the "Children of the Lord's Supper," and abounds with holy sentiment and fine imagery. The rest of the volume is made up of Ballads, Translations from the German and Danish, and several original poems. Our readers are doubtless familiar with "The Skeleton in Armor," and "The Wreck of the Hesperus." We consider these alone sufficient to refute the charge of an English writer, that our literature can boast no good ballads. The subjects and style of these poems are such as to insure them a long life and countless readers. The metre and metaphors are alike felicitous.

"She was a Prince's child,
I but a Viking wild,
And though she blushed and smiled,
I was discarded!
*Should not the dove so white
Follow the sea-mew's flight,
Why did they leave, that night,
Her nest unguarded?*

* * *
There lived we many years;
Time dried the maiden's tears;
She had forgot her fears,
She was a mother:

Death closed her mild blue eyes,
Under that tower she lies;
Ne'er shall the sun arise
On such another!
Still grew my bosom then,
Still as a stagnant fen,
Hateful to me were men,
The sunlight hateful;
In the vast forest here,
Clad in my warlike gear,
Fell I upon my spear,
O, death was grateful!"

The description of the wreck in the next ballad is vivid and touching in the highest degree. How striking are the comparisons in this verse;

She struck where the white and fleecy waves
Looked soft as carded wool,
But the cruel rocks, they gored her side,
Like the horns of an angry bull.

"To the River Charles," is as sweet and pleasant a string of verses as we have read for many a day. They breathe a heartfelt tone that wins sympathy at once. Here is a noble stanza:

Friends my soul with joy remembers!
How like quivering flames they start,
When I fan the living embers
On the hearth-stone of my heart!

The concluding poem, we consider as one of the author's happiest efforts. It is impressive both in thought and manner, and awakens those deep feelings which spring only at the call of the true poet.

Longfellow understands better than any American poet the force of genuine simplicity. There is nothing obscure in the language he employs, no confusion in his images: the sentiment is imparted with perfect clearness; and yet, how completely the ear and mind are satisfied. There is a concentration about these poems in which lies one great cause of their attractiveness. The artistical form, the polished manner in which they are presented, highly gratifies every reader of refined taste. They linger in the memory, while more elaborate poetry is forgotten. Few recent poems are more frequently quoted in conversation, than the Psalms of Life. We are under no small obligations to Longfellow for embodying so many cheering views of existence in such musical numbers. They rise to the lips in moments of despondency like the encouraging words of a friend; and we are confident have endeared the author to thousands of the good and fair, who will unite with us in cordially welcoming these new gems, and bidding the poet "God speed" in his every future effort.

NEW HAMPSHIRE BOOK. It is about six years since the first volume of the "Boston Book" appeared. The idea of thus presenting specimens of local literature soon became popular. The "New-York Book," was published and succeeded by the "Philadelphia, Baltimore, Rhode Island, and Portland, Books." "The New Hampshire Book" is an honorable addition to the number. That state gave birth among others, to Daniel Webster, Buckminster, the Peabodies, and other distinguished men, who figure to advantage in this elegant compilation. Our friend James T. Fields, too, we are happy to see appearing among the poets of the Granite State. The editors of the New Hampshire Book have performed their duty with taste and ability.

KRUMMACHER'S FABLES. This celebrated work has been ably translated by Professor Agnew, and published by Hooker and Agnew, of Philadelphia, in very neat style. It inculcates moral and religious truth in a very pleasing form, and like "Pilgrim's Progress" is calculated to charm and instruct both the youth and adult.

LOCKHART'S SPANISH BALLADS. Messrs. Wiley and Putnam of New-York have just published, in elegant style, this celebrated work. The volume before us is a reprint from the last London edition; and contains in addition to the quaint poems themselves, an Introductory Essay on the Ancient Ballads of Spain, and an Analytical Account, with Specimens of the Romance of the Cid. This work revives, in a way pleasing many, the chivalrous associations connected with Spanish history, and particularly all that relates to the occupation and subjugation of the Moors. As to the ballads themselves, it has been truly said that all is truth, nature and simplicity in the Spanish Romances. They are in fact little more than simple metrical narrations of events. These antique, racy effusions are nature's genuine offspring. They may be said to "form a connecting link between poetry and prose; scarcely rising above the latter in the display of fancy and imagination, and yet retaining the form, and in some respects the distinctive character of the former." The period commemorated in these poems, the knightly adventures they celebrate, and a certain antiquated simplicity, render them attractive in their English dress. Now and then occurs a touch of description which is quite graphic, for instance:

Upon the forehead of the bull the horns stand close and near,
From out the broad and wrinkled skull, like daggers they appear;
His neck is massy, like the trunk of some old knotted tree.
Whereon the monster's shaggy mane, like billows curled, ye see.

The petition of a mother about to be murdered is expressed with the directness that marks all the speeches of the characters who figure in these poems:

When she had made her orison, up from her knees she rose,—
Be kind, Alarcos, to our babes, and pray for my repose;
And now give me my boy once more upon my breast to hold,
That he may drink one farewell drink before my breast be cold.

There are some bloody tales chronicled in these ballads, but here also, no attempt is made to add to the effect by exaggerated comment. The narration has an air of truth in the midst of the horrors so quietly unfolded. As an example, take the conduct of a father whose sons have been beheaded by his enemy:

He took their heads up one by one, he kissed them o'er and o'er,
And aye he saw the tears run down,—I wot that grief was sore.
He closed the lids of their dead eyes all with his fingers frail,
And handled all their bloody curls, and kissed their lips so pale.

There is a primitive beauty in these translations which will interest the curious reader; and the handsome style in which the work is executed will make an ornament to the library.

FAMILY LIBRARY. No. 140. This work will add to the value and interest of the admirable series of which it forms a part. It is a translation of Fenelon's Lives of the Ancient Philosophers. Every reader of Telemachus needs not be told of the agreeable style and pure morality which distinguishes the writings of the Archbishop of Cambray. In the work, we have finely drawn sketches of the principal philosophers of antiquity, the events of their lives, their personal characteristics, and the leading traits of their several systems. A great amount of valuable information is conveyed in a limited space.

THE JACQUIRE. Such is the title of James' new novel just published by the Harpers. It partakes of the qualities which characterize this prolific author. Many a graphic picture of manners and historical events, many a stirring scene and quiet sentiment, diversify these pages. The scene of the story is France; the time, the fourteenth century. The lovers of fine historical fiction will greet these neat volumes with pleasure.

WEALTH AND WORTH. Harper & Brothers. To every American mind that has not fallen into the lamentably prevalent error of nurturing a distaste for the productions, the beauties, and superiorities of our own young land, the very first lines of the prefatory advertisement of this spirited little work, will command for it, attention. The author remarks, in alluding to the fact of our current literature being principally of English origin, that "To infuse an earnest, independent American spirit, uncontaminated by intolerance towards other governments and nations—to encourage a taste for gratifications of the intellect in preference to those of the senses, without forgetting the superior importance of the inculcation of those principles of action, which a reverential faith in the divine origin of the christian code of morals enforces—such will be the paramount objects regarded in the preparation of this series of tales." Should it not be a subject of sincere regret to the lovers of native talent, that while Great Britain, France and Germany, are deluging America with a flood of literature, etc., with as noble materials, and possessing elements of greatness as rich and varied, (though unfortunately inactive,) closes her cornucopia of knowledge, and, like an unnatural mother, who forsakes her own offspring, leaves the grain to which she has given birth, to perish through her chilling neglect? In promoting the perusal of such works as Wealth and Worth, this blemishing cloud will gradually disappear, and be succeeded by that enlightening halo which an appreciating love for native scenes, associations and productions, throws around the heart; and the existence of which is necessary to nurture the dormant or unmaturing abilities of our authors.

The truthfulness and delicacy with which every character in Wealth and Worth is delineated—the perfect purity of style that characterizes the whole work—the spirit of quiet patriotism by which it is pervaded—and the holy and winning tone of piety that speaks from every page, prove how well the mental and moral qualities of the author are adapted to the task he has undertaken. While the tale abounds in stirring scenes and thrilling incidents, the bright thoughts of the poet are interwoven with the philosopher's calm view of life, and the sage reflections of the moralist. In spite of the deep interest of the plot, its healthy tone is calculated to correct that morbid appetite for highly wrought fictions which is almost inseparable from youth and enthusiasm; this alone should render the work invaluable; for the pernicious influence of this fascinating species of productions, resembles the effects of the honey gathered from the flowers of the rhododendron; it creates a madness in those who taste it, and causes them to look upon nature through a distorted medium, and to behold surrounding objects in a false and meretricious light. When such works are withdrawn from the hands of the young, to substitute a volume like Wealth and Worth, is to perform what the author of Philip Van Artavelde calls the "hard task of moulding denial to a pleasing shape."

WREATHS AND BRANCHES, for the Church, by a young lady. Boston: James B. Dow, publisher, 1842.

This is a neat little volume, readable enough, without any thing remarkable about it. It is a suitable present of the season for Christians to their young friends.

TO THE RIVER NIAGARA.

River of emerald, world-attractive stream !
Brightest of links in that eternal chain
Which binds the West to the far distant main ;
Did ever poet, in his wildest dream,
See, hear or fancy aught more soft, more fair,
More grand or terrible, than found in thee ?
First, gently moving, full, majestic, free,
Girdling broad islands with maternal care—
Then sweeping onward with increasing tide—
Next, madly plunging, in rough, headlong race—
And lo, the cataracts ! On either side,
"A hell of waters" which no pen can trace !
Thence, raging, whirling, till, "with sweet delay,"
On old Ontario's breast, thou dy'st away.

ANCIENT AND MODERN ELOQUENCE.

The subject of eloquence is one of peculiar interest to the American citizen. In a Republic, popular eloquence is a powerful engine by which the political aspirant works his way to office and distinction. Cicero, in his notice of the distinguished orators who preceded him in the Roman Republic, says, there was not one who did not rise to the highest stations in the government. Recent events too, have conspired to throw a peculiar interest around this subject. We have but lately seen the whole length and breadth of our land, one great arena for the conflicts of oratory. The presidential campaign of 1840 will long be remembered by those who witnessed it. It is not saying too much to affirm, that it has fixed a new era in our country's annals, and perhaps turned over a new leaf even in the world's history. Henceforth, when the public mind shall be deeply agitated and parties not geographically divided, we may calculate on the recurrence of similar scenes. Eloquence will probably exercise a greater influence hereafter than it has hitherto done. Our country seems fast approaching to that peculiar state which called forth the unrivalled efforts of Grecian oratory. We seem destined to enact Greece, if I may so say, on a gigantic scale; and therefore without further introduction, I shall proceed at once to an investigation of my subject.

The eloquence of the Greeks is one of the most curious subjects connected with their interesting history. It has generally been considered far superior to that of modern times. Mr. Hume has deliberately pronounced the orations of Demosthenes as the models, which, of all human productions, approach nearest to perfection. Others have asserted that the mighty eloquence which once shook whole democracies, can no more return than the shout of Stentor, or the blast of the dread horn of Fontarabia. We are told by Cicero, that when Demosthenes was to speak, men flocked to Athens from the remote parts of Greece, as if to witness the most splendid spectacle which could be exhibited; whereas, in London, says Hume, men saunter in the court of requests, whilst the most important debates are going on in the two houses; that the eloquence of the best speaker does not compensate for the loss of a dinner; and that even when old Cibber was to act, more curiosity was excited, than when the prime minister was to defend himself against a motion for removal or impeachment. Mr. Hume thinks, that both Demosthenes and Cicero attempted flights successfully, which would be ridiculous in modern speakers, because they could not sustain them. He instances the Apoptrophe of Demosthenes, to the manes of the heroes who fought at Marathon, Plataea, &c., whilst justifying the battle of Cheronæa;* and the bold figure of Cicero, when he represents the rocks and mountains as moved with horror at the bare recital of the enormities of Verres.† Suitable too, to this

* This splendid passage, which, for more than two thousand years, has been deemed the greatest effort of oratorical power, was suggested by a stroke of eloquence scarcely less grand and beautiful, and almost as bold, from his antagonist, Æschines, who, in his speech against Ctesephon, calls up the illustrious dead of Athens, and placing them around him, bids his hearers listen to the groans that the crowning of the man (Demosthenes), who had conspired with barbarians, draws from the tombs of those who fell at Marathon and Plataea.

† Perhaps after all, Mr. Hume himself has given a specimen of Whitfield's pulpit eloquence, fully as bold as any thing which is to be found in ancient oratory, and which coming at the close of the sermon, accompanied with the most animated and perfect action, he assures us surpassed any thing he ever saw or heard in the pulpit. Whitfield after a solemn pause thus exclaimed—"The attendant angel is just about to leave the threshold and ascend to heaven; and shall he ascend and not bear with him the news of one sinner among all this multitude, reclaimed from the error of his ways?" Then he lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, stamped with his foot, and with gushing tears, cried aloud—"Stop Gabriel!—stop Gabriel!—stop, ere you enter the sacred portals, and yet carry with you the tidings of one sinner converted to God!" Then turning to his hearers in the most simple but energetic language, he described a Saviour's dying love. The effect was electrical; the assembly melted into tears.

Similar to the above specimen, but not so bold, is the celebrated passage from Massillon, which Voltaire, in the article on Eloquence in the Encyclopædia Française, pronounces a chef d'œuvre, equal to any thing which ancient or modern times can boast. He says, that in the delivery vehemence of thought and expression, was the vehemence of action. The Supplisio pedis, the stamping of the foot; Percussio frontis et pectoris, striking of the forehead and chest, were all usual, and considered but moderate gestures; whereas, at present they are almost banished, except from the theatre.

Some critics, in view of these facts, have maintained that a superior genius and energy characterized the ancient republics. Others maintain, that the genius of the moderns is fully equal to that of the ancients; that we are physically and mentally equal to both the Greeks and Romans; and that all the difference between ancient and modern eloquence can be explained by reference to the difference of circumstances under which they have been respectively developed.

Many who maintain this latter opinion, say, that of it, the whole assembly involuntarily started from their seats, with such murmurs of surprise and acclamation, as, for a moment, to disconcert the speaker. The subject of the sermon was the small number of the elect. He suddenly paused, said that he would no longer speak of the rest of mankind, but would confine his attention to those who were before him. He then imagined that the last hour had come—that the end of the universe was at hand, and that the heavens were opening over their heads. He then represents Christ as appearing in their midst in all His glory, and they assembled around Him as trembling criminals about to receive the final sentence of condemnation or approval, &c.

When Patrick Henry, in the Virginia Convention, on the final question of adoption or rejection of the Federal Constitution, looking, as he said, “beyond that horizon which binds mortal eyes,” pointed to those celestial beings who were hovering over the scene, and waiting with anxiety for a decision which involved the happiness or misery of more than half the human race, those beings to whom he had just addressed an invocation that made every nerve shudder with horror—he achieved with most complete success, according to universal testimony, an oratorical feat almost as perilous as that attempted by the eloquent Greek; and in the case of Henry, the grandeur of the effort was prolonged by the fact, that the spirits whom he had invoked, seemed to come at his bidding; for a storm at that moment broke over the building, which shook it to its foundation. Availing himself of the incident, says his historian, with a master’s art, he seemed to mix in the fight of his ethereal auxiliaries, and, “rising on the wings of the tempest, to seize upon the artillery of heaven, and direct its fiercest thunders against the heads of his adversaries.”

The scene became insupportable; and the house rose without the formality of adjournment, the members rushing from their seats with precipitation and confusion.

Before closing this note, it may be proper to add, that however pertinent Mr. Hume’s remarks may be on ancient eloquence, he cannot be considered as authority in regard to modern oratory. Parliamentary speaking, before his day, had been very little more than the debating of a committee room;—the style in the House of Commons was that of earnest conversation—the smallness of the hall, and the fact that speeches were not even permitted to be reported, contributed to this result. Forensic eloquence, likewise, in his time, was greatly below that of the present day. In criminal cases the defendant was not allowed counsel till a late period.

it is difficult to adjudge the palm to either, for each is suitable to the circumstances which called it forth—the difference being rather in kind than degree.

There are five prominent causes which have perhaps mainly contributed to this difference. Let us advert to them. They are—1st. The difference of theatre for the display of oratory. 2d. Paucity of laws anciently, and the character of the pleadings. 3d. Exciting topics discussed; such as revolutions, oppression of provinces, &c. 4th. Invention of the printing press. 5th. Superiority of the Greek and Latin languages.

I. Almost all the tribunals before which the Grecian orator appeared, were of a popular character. The popular assembly, before which all political matters were discussed, afforded the principal theatre for oratorical display. The panegyris or great festival meeting, such as the olympic games, furnished occasionally another. The Heliastic courts too were so numerous and promiscuous, as to be fairly entitled to the appellation of popular tribunals, much more so than the Roman courts, composed of the Prætors and Judices Selecti. When Socrates was condemned, we are told that no fewer than two hundred and eighty voted against him. Even in the Areopagus, the least popular of all the courts, never fewer than fifty were present. In the palmy days of Grecian eloquence, this court had lost nearly all its influence and power; and the more popular tribunals, numbering sometimes more than one thousand dicasts, or jurors, judged all the cases of importance.

The ekklesia (ecclesia), or popular assembly of the Grecian states, was sovereign; there was no appeal from its decisions. It was not even divided into two branches, like modern deliberative assemblies. Its decisions were prompt, and generally under the influence of excited feelings. Hence it became the finest imaginable theatre for the display of impassioned eloquence. The orator felt a deep responsibility, and most laboriously prepared himself to meet a powerful, but at the same time, tumultuous and excitable multitude—“wayward, fitful and refractory”—alternately slave and tyrant; now the passive instrument in the hands of the demagogue; then, like a “devilish engine, back recoiling” on the rash hand that aspired to direct it. In modern deliberative bodies, questions of great importance are debated for weeks, and sometimes months; and it rarely happens that much can be achieved by one speech, however eloquent. Speeches have very little more effect in a protracted congressional debate than to spin out the time, and give to the parties an opportunity to arrange and compromise the matter. Thus, in 1832, the celebrated tariff compromise, adopted after weeks of discussion, seemed to be almost wholly irrespective of the long speaking which had preceded it.* Not so in Greece. The orator there knew full well, that if a powerful impression could be made on his audience, his cause would be gained—the impetuous democracy would suffer no delay—the decree went forth immediately. Hence, not only was the judgment to be convinced, but the passions were to be aroused—the triumph of the moment was final victory. There was no waiting for another tribunal to pass upon the measure; for an executive to give his sanction, or interpose his veto; nor for voters to communicate with their constituents; for here, the sovereign people themselves were present in primary assembly.

It has been supposed, however, that the popular assemblies of Greece must have been deficient in that critical taste necessary to form the accomplished orator. Mr. Hume thinks that an Athenian assembly, composed often of the lowest vulgar, must have been inferior to a Roman senate, or a British parliament; and consequently, that the great orators of Greece were rather formed in spite of, than by means of, such an audience. That the orator in a measure formed the taste of his audience in Greece, there can be no doubt. Diodorus, for example, tells us that Gorgias of Leontium was very captivating with his figures of speech, his antitheses, &c., until the introduction of a better style taught the people to despise his. But that this taste, when once formed, reacted powerfully on the orator, there can be little doubt. The Athenian assembly, though composed of many of the beggarly ragamuffins, so admirably burlesqued by Aristophanes, was nevertheless one of the most critical audiences which the orator, in any age, has ever been called on to address. Its taste, strange as it may appear, was fastidious to a fault. Demosthenes himself, several times, failed before such an audience, and that too from defects which would not have been objected to by any but an Athenian assembly. At every failure, however, he returned with more vigor to his studies; and, even after his fame had ultimately been established by his untiring perseverance, he was once hooted off the Bema, for laying the acute accent on the δ in ακαδημicos. This extraordinary tact in regard to language, pervaded the whole Athenian people; it is well illustrated by the anecdote of the elegant Theophrastus, who had lived many years at Athens, and prided himself for speaking with all the purity of the Attic style. He was greatly mortified by an old woman, whom he was attempting to beat down in the sale of some articles, finding out from his language his foreign accent, and addressing him ω ξενε. In both Greece and Rome, the passages in the orations which seem to have produced the most magic effect, were those of most exquisite finish in thought and words, and such as the most refined taste of after ages has uniformly admired.

* It is not to be inferred, that we consider the long speeches delivered in Congress of no use: on the contrary, they serve a most beneficial purpose. They impose a barrier to overaction, which most deliberative bodies are prone to—they thus have a conservative influence upon the rights of a minority, which are but too often exposed under the action of democratic institutions. They have too, a most sedative influence on the house, on the nation, and on the individuals who deliver them. The member who is pregnant with a six hours' speech, however irascible he may be, disagreeable to his friends, and insulting to his enemies, during his pregnancy—is, nevertheless, sure by the delivery, to cool down himself, and Congress too, almost to zero; and he feels afterwards, during the period of preparing it for the press, the most delightful satisfaction in the reflection that if the nation could be saved, that speech would have done it. It is not perhaps saying too much, when we assert, that in all probability, this Union would have been dissolved during the days of South Carolina nullification, if the one hour rule had prevailed in the two houses of Congress. A long talk at a dangerous crisis, when all the angry feelings of our nature are aroused, has a marvellous influence in staying the torrent of excitement, and bringing the parties to that temper which will admit of adjustment, although it must be confessed to be not so favorable to genuine eloquence. They are the short pithy speeches, sped, to use the happy metaphor of Lord Bacon, from the quiver of the intentions, that are the most inflammable. When enemies can talk it out, they are not so apt to fight it out. In every crisis of angry excitement, the gaining of time is a desideratum of incalculable value.

Attic taste was no doubt the result of the intense interest which the Athenians took in political matters, and of the constant practice of hearing the best speakers. The meanest citizen had a nice ear for eloquence, which the most intelligent of other countries did not possess. We meet now with something similar to this in the taste of the modern Italians for music. You may collect together the most refined assemblies of Americans, Englishmen, or Frenchmen; and bring before them Catalini, or Pasta, or Paganini; and although they may discourse well, yet they cannot feel like the Italians, nor display that sense of music, that acute discrimination and accurate nicety of ear, which even a company of Lazzaroni in Italy will exhibit. Bad music to an Italian is worse than unpleasant; it is painful. Hence the exclamation of the poor Italian at the French opera, when almost agonized by the bad music, Il Francesi hanno le orecchia di corno. The French have ears of horn!

It is generally supposed, that popular assemblies give rise to loose and diffuse speaking on account of the ignorance of the multitude, which requires that the speaker should dwell on each point in order to make himself understood. Facts, however, militate against this supposition. The speeches of Demosthenes are the most condensed on record—so much so, that we are almost constrained to believe that the speeches, as spoken, must have been more dilated. With him, as has been well observed, there is no coming back on the same ground, or lingering over it. All is done at once. There is nothing superfluous, nothing for mere effect. He is never scattered, never stagnant, never sluggish; nor can the hearer ever stop for an instant to admire or throw away a thought on the great artist, till all is over, and he has time to recover his breath. This is the effect of true eloquence, and not of argument alone. Demosthenes combined the two. In Rome, the speeches before the Comitia, or popular assemblies, were much more condensed, than those before the Senate and Prætors. It has been well said that three or four of the philippics of Demosthenes put together, would hardly equal in length an average congressional harangue, de lana caprina.

Thus, the facts seem to prove that the popular assembly is highly favorable to the production of energetic and condensed speaking, which is really the only kind that can command the attention of a promiscuous audience. When there are first rate speakers to be heard, the multitude will not tolerate one that is tedious and prolix. In the senate, the order and decorum of their body insures patient attention to even the worst speakers. The Roman senate, for example, was a patient audience, and would tolerate speeches of the greatest length. Not so with the Athenians: they often restricted their orators in time. The pregnant brevity of Lysias is attributed by Dionysius to the necessity of conforming his speeches to the scanty contents of the Clepsydra. Sometimes they would not listen to the speaker at all; at others, they compelled him to omit what was disagreeable, and sometimes forced him to begin where they chose. Even Demosthenes himself, in all his speeches, particularly his forensic speeches, shows the utmost anxiety about being heard, begs them not to disturb him till they have heard all. Æschines, in his oration against Ctesiphon, charges the people not to let Demosthenes have his way, for if they did, he would infallibly hurry their feelings off by a torrent of irrelevant declamation. Any speaker, who has ever addressed a multitude, knows full well the difficulty of the task; he must speak so as to produce an impression on his audience, or an utter failure will be the consequence.

No wonder then that the orator of Greece prepared himself with the most minute care before appearing in public. The exquisite structure of the sentences, the balanced periods, the apt and perfect antithesis, the neat and epigrammatic turn, the finished collocation, says Lord Brougham—all indicate an extreme elaboration that could hardly be the suggestion of the moment. The orations of the ancients were eminently artistic; every word seemed selected with skill, and in its proper place. Dionysius, speaking of the exquisite finish given by Socrates and Plato to their style, compares their works to pieces of fine chasing or sculpture.

II. We proceed to the second cause of difference between ancient and modern eloquence. It is well known that the legislation of modern times is much more complete than that of the former. There were then comparatively few laws. Cicero says that he could make himself acquainted with the laws of Rome in three months.* The beautiful science of pleading too, which occupies so important a place in the common law of England, was comparatively unknown to the ancients, particularly the Greeks.

In proportion as the laws are few in number, so does the judicial power, wherever vested, become more and more important; for, in the absence of law, the judge is left to decide the case according to his notions of natural equity. In such a state of things, the orator will have a much finer field for display. He may not only address himself to the understanding of his judges, but arouse their feelings. When, however, there is a law which will fit every case, the advocate is then reduced to the necessity of showing the application of the law. Every effort to arouse the passions is viewed with distrust—it is regarded as a species of trick to divert the mind from the true issue.

Not only, however, in the ancient republics did they have few laws in comparison with modern nations, but the few which they had were not so scrupulously observed, particularly when the sovereign people were the judges. When the six commanders were brought to trial after the battle of Arginusæ, according to the law of Canopus, each case should have been decided separately. But the people voted on all together; and when the law was urged, they exclaimed that it would be monstrous, if the demos could not do what they liked. Something of the same kind occurred in the trial of Socrates. And, it is notorious, that in the case of the conspirators, for whose death Cicero pleaded, he succeeded in palpable violation of a well known law of the Roman commonwealth.

The ancient orators, particularly the Athenian, were then in truth scarcely ever trammelled by laws. The judges were consequently exposed to all the influences of oratory. How different in modern times! We are comparatively a law-

* It is because of the little attention paid to law and pleading, that the Roman barrister often attained to great celebrity at a very early age. Cicero thought at 20, that he was sufficiently acquainted with the mysteries of the law, to discuss a mere legal question with the greatest lawyers of the age. Caius Gracchus established his reputation at the bar before 20; Crassus acquired great reputation at 19, by his prosecution of Carbo; Hortensius, second only to Cicero, appeared for one of the Roman provinces of Africa, against its governors, at 19; and his excellence was instantly acknowledged, says Cicero, like that of a statue by Phidias. Now, we know of no one in our country who has ever attained any great celebrity at the bar before the age of 21, unless it be that extraordinarily precocious genius, John Thompson of Virginia—author of the letters signed "Curtius;" and his was a reputation, rather for splendid speaking and fine thought, than for real knowledge of the law. The successful study of modern jurisprudence requires the labor of years, no matter how transcendent may be the genius of the individual.

making, law-loving, and law-obeying people. Let the most splendid orator now make the finest appeals to the passions, and prove too by the most ingenious logic that what he urges is consonant with reason, and built on natural justice; still the most clumsy debater will demolish him at a blow, if he can only prove that the law and the constitution are against him. It has been well observed that the administration of public justice is now a strict syllogism; the written law is the major, the verdict of the jury the minor proposition, and the sentence of the judge is the conclusion. The law says he who commits murder shall be hanged. The jury says, A. B., prisoner at the bar, has committed murder. Therefore, says the judge, let A. B. be hanged.

Again; in early ages, all powers were blended, and judicial and executive were concentrated in the same hands. King David sat in the gate and dealt out justice. St. Louis and Louis XII. administered justice under an oak. The German emperors travelled from place to place to hold courts, &c. In Greece and Rome, these different powers of government were blended, and never could be separated. And hence, whilst in modern times, all civilized nations vest the dispensing or pardoning power in the executive, in Greece and Rome it remained with the judicial power whenever exercised. The effect of the separation has been to confine the courts exclusively to the law. A merciful judge is now a criminal judge; and a jury, who would save the guilty prisoner by their verdict, must be perjured. The whole scene in which Sir Walter Scott has so touchingly described the intercession of Jeannie Deans to save the life of her sister Effie, would have been wholly out of place in a modern court. It is inimitable, however, when brought to bear on the king, who has the pardoning power.

In ancient times, all these influences might be exerted on the court; for, first, there might be no law to govern the case, and the judges would be left to follow their inclinations; or, if there were law, it might be dispensed with. When a charge of peculation was brought against Scipio, the only answer he returned was, "This day last year, I won the battle of Zama." And we must agree with the Edinburgh Reviewers, that such reply would not only be wholly inadmissible in court, but that Mr. Tierney would look a little awry at even the chancellor of the exchequer, who would make such a reply to his calculations. But such a consideration might well have great weight with a king, who had the pardoning power, if such a man as Scipio had been previously condemned.

From all that has been said, we can see that formerly the orator had full range in his discourse. He looked to the whole nature of man, to all his passions, prejudices and emotions, as well as to the reasoning faculty. He endeavored to operate on all. Man is like a many-stringed instrument, upon which he alone can play with success, who can touch with skill all the cords. And Hume, with all the ancient critics, has pronounced in favor of the orator, who can produce the most powerful effect on the passions. Quintilian says logicians can be found every where. An able argument is not rare; but seldom has that orator appeared, whose eloquence could carry the judge out of his depth; who could throw him into what disposition of mind he pleased, fire him into resentment, or soften him into tears. Many have constructed arguments as logical as those of Demosthenes and Cicero, but none ever arrayed them before their audiences with such magic power. The greatest men of the age acknowledged the resistless force of such oratory. Even Julius Cæsar once confessed himself subdued by the eloquence of Cicero, and absolved a criminal contrary to his settled purposes.*

Under these circumstances we see at once why orators anciently paid so much attention to gesture. We all know the persevering efforts of Demosthenes to cure all his physical defects. He studied rhetoric under Isæus, delivery under the comedian Satyrus, and afterwards under the actor Andronicus, and was in the habit of constant declamation. It is well known, that, besides paying such attention to delivery, Demosthenes arranged his dress with studied care. Cicero studied under Molo, the rhetorician. Even after coming out at the bar, he went into Greece, attended the schools of oratory, and afterwards, when in full practice, continued the habit of declamation by way of exercise, frequented the school of Gniphio, and studied delivery under two great actors, Roscius and Æsop, (B. 4,422.) Cicero tells us, that Gracchus kept a man behind him with a pitch pipe to regulate his voice before the people. Hortensius, the celebrated rival of Cicero, prepared all his attitudes before a mirror. When about to go into the forum, like Demosthenes, he chose and put on his dress with a view to oratorical effect; and Macrobius says, he once instituted a suit against a man for ruffling his toga after being elaborately adjusted. Quintilian, who was one of the best speakers of his day, gives particular directions for the dress of the orator, how to manage the folds of his gown, and rings upon his fingers. The orator in Quintilian's time had large space to move in. This travelling oratory was carried to such an extent on a particular occasion, that the orator was asked by his antagonist, how many miles he had spoken?

Ancient orators practised every art which could operate on the feelings or on the prejudices. Antonius, when pleading for old Aquilius, tore open his tunic and exposed his wounds, and then made a pathetic appeal to Marius, which brought tears even from that stern chieftain, with whom Aquilius had served. Hyperides saved the beautiful Phryne from just condemnation, by laying bare her bosom before the judges. When Cicero was about to be impeached by Clodius, he went in mourning, with the whole equestrian order. The accused party, says Quintilian, may sometimes appear in worn and tattered garments, indicative of wretchedness and despair. He may even prostrate himself before his judge, and embrace his knees. His wife and children may be brought into court, and appeals made in their behalf.*

* Acquitted Ligarius after the decree for his death had actually been made out.

The difference between the ancient and modern systems of pleading is very great. By the genius of the common law, a great proportion of every trial, civil or criminal, consists of the pleadings. Every charge must be precise, specific, single; every fact must be related with the minutest accuracy of time, place, and circumstance. The answer must be drawn with the same logical acuteness. Every fact charged in violation of the law, must be met by direct denial in terms adapted to the nature of the charge. Every accusation in vague or general terms, must be repelled by an appeal to the judge, whether the party is bound to answer. In this manner, the declaration or allegation, on the one side, and the answer on the other, lead to an issue involving generally a single question, either of fact to be decided by the jury, or of law to be decided by the judge. This beautiful science of pleading has been somewhat altered in England by some little abatement from its original strictness; and in this country, still more. It nevertheless yet remains in sufficient force to make it one of the most important branches of the law, and it has produced an essential difference between ancient and modern judicial oratory. The pleadings among the ancients were very loose. The forms of process, both civil and criminal, were very simple and general. Cicero speaks of the whole system of pleadings with contempt, de-

* Hence the effort of opposing counsel to counteract—e. g., Quintilian was counsel for a young man, of whom a large estate was claimed for a young girl, on the plea of being his sister. The lawyer of the girl directed her at a certain part of his pleadings, to go over to her supposed brother and clasp him around the neck. This move was understood, as soon as made, by Quintilian; and the young man, by getting out of the way, totally disconcerted the advocate for the girl. When Glycon brought a child into court that he might excite compassion by his crying, he asked in his speech why he wept? The child answered, because my schoolmaster pinches me. On another occasion, when a number of boys were brought into court, the opposing lawyer threw a handful of marbles among them, which set them all to scrambling. (Q. 1,394.) In Greece it is certain that the same arts were practised, as we learn from Aristophanes, who in one of his plays ridicules the courts by introducing the mock trial of a dog for stealing cheese. He brings in a litter of puppies, whose yelping is urged by counsel as the wailing of helpless orphans over the fate which is to befall their parent.

rides it as a compilation of verbose and unmeaning pedantry, and asserts, with all the pressure of his business, that he could make himself master of the science in three days.

Owing to this difference in the pleadings, the modern advocate is hedged in and prevented from taking that wide range in the discussion, which a loose system would allow—e. g., Cicero vs. Verres, makes apology for passing over the licentious debaucheries of his youth, because too shocking for his modesty; then he proceeds, "fourteen years have elapsed, since you, Verres, held the office of quæstor. From that day to this, I put in judgment every thing you have done. Not an hour of your life will be found unpolluted by some theft, some baseness, some cruelty, some villainy. During those years you successively disgraced the office of quæstor, of delegate in Asia, of prætor in the city, and prætor in Sicily. From the functions of these several stations, will arise the four-fold distribution of my whole accusation." This celebrated oration could never have been delivered before an English or American judge; for, although in criminal cases, the defendant is allowed the fullest latitude, it is not so with the prosecutor. His pleadings must be of the strictest character. He must have a written declaration of charges penned with the most technical accuracy. A sweeping accusation against fourteen years of a man's life would be totally inadmissible. He could not rake up the undefined crimes of a dissolute youth for the purpose of increasing the measure of his guilt—not a witness could he call to prove a single offence, not specified in the bill of indictment—not one word could he utter unconnected with the allegations and the proofs. Had he lifted his torch on the midnight revels of his adversary's boyish days, the judge would have told him that he must not proceed. Had he attempted that beautiful apostrophe to the Alban groves, and lakes, and fountains, which has immortalized Cicero, he would have been reminded that he was travelling out of the record. The various specified misdemeanors too, would have been cognizable before different tribunals;—official misdemeanors would have been tried by one, private wrongs by another, and perhaps thefts and acts of cruelty by a third; and before each, every offence charged must have been drawn up in the most precise language by an article of impeachment, a writ of trespass, or an indictment; and these, like the stakes and floating buoys of an expansive but shallow river, would have continually reminded him, that he could not proceed a foot beyond them without stranding. (A. 1,288.)

When Cicero defends Publius Sextius from the charge of riot, grounded on a special law, not one-tenth of his long oration is at all to the point in issue; and that most exquisitely composed speech of Archias, the poet, could never have been delivered before an American court. Archias was on his defence against the charge of being an alien. Not one-sixth part of his speech has any bearing on the real question involving the construction of the Roman law of naturalization; it is mainly taken up with the literary merits of his client. If an American barrister, says Mr. Adams, should undertake, by an elaborate argument, to prove that the Abbe Delille was an American citizen, because he was an excellent French poet, if all the muses should combine to compose his oration, not five sentences of it would he be suffered to deliver; the judges would stop him in his oratorical career, by asking for the certificate of naturalization.

Cicero's notions of pleading are exemplified by remarks which, in one of his dialogues, he puts in the mouth of the old orator, Anthony. Pontius had a son supposed to be killed in the war with the Cimbri. Under this belief the father left his property to another son. The soldier returned after the death of his father. "Had you been employed," says Anthony, "to defend his cause, you would not have discussed the doctrine as to priority or validity of testaments; you would have raised his father from the grave, made him embrace his child, and recommend him, with many tears, to the protection of the centumviri." (D. 2,140.)

In a British or American court, nothing would have been discussed but the validity or priority of the wills; all the rest would have been cut off by the rigor of the pleadings. In our own country, in different states, and even in different courts of the same state, the rules of pleading are enforced with different degrees of rigor; and it is uniformly observed, that where the pleading is most strict, there is least declamation on the part of the lawyer—strict pleadings always rein up the counsel to the stern logic of the law.

III. The third cause of difference between ancient and modern eloquence, is the character of the topics discussed. It is evident that, all other things being equal, the more agitating and important the subjects are, which call forth the orator, the more grand and imposing will be his oratory. He will be stimulated by the responsibility which devolves on him, to the utmost exertion of all his powers, whilst the importance and grandeur of his subjects will impart force to his eloquence, and an impressive interest to his counsels.

Political events of ancient times were more agitating than those of modern. Governments of modern nations are much more settled and stable than those of ancient times. Revolutions are much more rare than formerly. The invention of gunpowder has rendered wars more expensive; and therefore, it has given a decided advantage to civilized over barbarous nations. Power now depends on wealth; and barbarous nations are unable to support the expense of war. Hence, conquest moves now in an opposite direction. The civilized man conquers the savage every where; whilst in ancient times, when the sword, javelin, bows, arrows, &c. were the instruments of war, the hardy barbarians could easily supply themselves with those cheap weapons, and thus were enabled often to overthrow the wealthy but more effeminate nations. Conquests generally were much more easily achieved in ancient than in modern times. Amongst equally civilized nations, since the invention of gunpowder, and the perfection of the modern system of the political balance, it is almost impossible for any nation to achieve the conquest of its neighbors—e. g. since the days of Charles V. of Germany, the nations of Europe have been engaged in almost constant wars, and yet scarcely any of the large states have been blotted out from the political system; nor has the territorial integrity of even the smaller been materially impaired. The nation on the defensive has a decided advantage over her on the offensive. Hence it is very rarely the case that one can be surprised by the other. War now is a matter of science, of deliberate calculation. Not so anciently. There is no conquest now by a coup-de-main.

There were circumstances which rendered the political events of Greece particularly interesting and imposing. First, the little states of Greece formed a sort of confederacy against the barbarian powers, particularly the great empire of Persia. Secondly, there were rivalry, negotiation, and frequent wars among the Grecian states themselves—e. g., the Peloponnesian war of twenty-seven years' duration. Thirdly, after the Persian war, Athens obtained the Hegemony of the democratic states, and she soon usurped the right of coercing the refractory members, and of deciding all the great questions of political importance in her courts. This brought the great and agitating questions of all her allies to Athens, and thus opened the finest field for the display of oratory. Fourthly, there was that important class of subjects growing out of the relation of the conquering states of Greece to their subject islands and provinces, including cases of malversation in office, and oppression on the part of governors, &c.* Now, we must remember, that all these agitating topics, whether tried before the assembly or in the courts, were in fact discussed before a popular tribunal; for in Athens, the Heliastic courts were all of the popular character; and thus the orator enjoyed full range for the display of his powers.

Demosthenes appeared at a time particularly favorable to oratory. 1st. In the formation of great orators it is necessary to have the trade of the ad-

* In these great state trials, where provinces and towns were often the plaintiffs, we see at once that the advocate might devote his entire time to them and thoroughly prepare himself, for his compensation was sure to be, in the highest degree, liberal.

vocate separate and distinct, so that the orator may confine himself to his profession alone; and 2d, not only must the topics be great and agitating, but the country must be in the condition to make the orator the most important character. Both of these circumstances concurred in favor of Demosthenes.

1st. It is easy to trace in Greece, the relative importance of eloquence and statesmanship on one hand, and military skill on the other. At the time of the Persian war, military skill was the most important—e. g., Miltiades, Themistocles, &c., rose to power, more by military skill than by eloquence or statesmanship. There was a great change at the time of Pericles: he was both statesman and orator, and likewise general. In the first named capacity he acquired more power than in the last.

In the time of Demosthenes we find the orator and statesman rising to great influence without military skill. The cause of this seems to be, that Athens, by drawing to herself after the Persian war all the principal lawsuits from the democratic states, gave rise at once to the profession of the lawyer; and the Peloponnesian war, during the time of Pericles, and afterwards, brought so many great political causes before the courts, and gave rise to so many state trials, that the labors of the advocate and statesman became united. The effect of this was to give to the orator a power of speech, which is rarely acquired except by practice. A proper training is requisite for the full display of the mental powers in debate—e. g., Dumont tells us that in the national assembly of France, the only orators who possessed any talent for improvisation were Maury, Clermont Tonnère, Barnave, and Thouret. Of these, Barnave was the only one who could extemporize a speech of any length. Mirabeau could not. Most of his great passages are laboriously prepared. It was the want of training which produced this anomaly—one that would never occur in England or the United States, where we are so much accustomed to public speaking.

2d. A state of peace, with great and agitating questions, with imminent dangers threatening the state, is most favorable to the orator. The reason is evident—in war, events are great and agitating; but force is there more important than persuasion—the military chieftain is greater than the orator. Not so in time of peace, with dangers impending. Then the orator is the great man of the age—he nerves his countrymen for the coming contest—he inspires fortitude under trials; e. g., when the children of Israel were about to leave Egypt, Moses was afraid to take the command, because he felt the want of eloquence at such a time; and Jehovah acknowledged its importance when he answered, “Is not Aaron, the Levite, thy brother? I know that he can *spe*ak well, and he shall be thy spokesman unto the people.”

When the great and agitating questions of the crusades were preached up, such men as Peter the Hermit and St. Bernard were the great men of the age; but when Peter joined the army, he soon sunk into utter contempt, because the general was here more important than the orator; and, the man who had shaken all Europe by his preaching, lost his reputation in the camp.

In the national assembly of France, just before the commencement of the continental wars, in spite of all the disadvantages resulting from want of training among the speakers, there were occasionally great displays of oratory; and perhaps Mirabeau has hardly been excelled in modern times. But when force became predominant, eloquence ceased: such men as Pichegru, Moreau, and Bonaparte became the men of the age. And in our own country, we had a fine theatre for eloquence in those provincial assemblies which heralded our revolution, when the orators of the day were arming the people intellectually for the great battle of Independence—it was then that the eloquence of Henry was called forth. But when action commenced, his influence declined.

Now what condition can we imagine more favorable to eloquence than the age of Demosthenes? Every thing conspired to produce the great orator. The form of government had long made public speaking customary; political and forensic eloquence were united, as before explained; and, in the north of Greece there had risen up a power, with the most wily statesman and able general at its head, who bade fair to conquer the liberties of Greece. Philip, it has been said, formed Demosthenes. The dangers which he created, inspired the eloquent warning of the orator—e. g., what speaker ever had a more agitating theme than Demosthenes, when he made the great speech that brought about the alliance between Thebes and Athens, and led to the fatal battle of Chæronea? He had warned his countrymen against Philip; but hireling orators had calmed the popular excitement. At length, late one evening, news arrived that Philip had seized Elatea, the key of Phœcis and Bœotia, and might soon be expected before the walls of Athens. On the morrow, at dawn of day, the senate met, and the people crowded into the assembly. The Prytanes reported the news. The herald himself was produced and made to recite from his own lips. Then the crier called aloud to the assembly, “Does any one wish to speak?” None answered to the call; and it was repeated over and over again, until Demosthenes mounted the bema, and delivered that soul-stirring speech, which made the assembly cry out, with one voice, Let us march against Philip! Such a case could not occur in modern times, nor even in the Roman republic.

Let us now examine for a moment the character of the subjects which called forth the Roman oratory. Mr. Dunlop says, that Cicero had a wider and perhaps a more beautiful field than Demosthenes. The wide extent of the Roman empire, the striking vices and virtues of its citizens, the memorable events of its history, supplied an endless variety of great and interesting topics; whereas, many of the orations of Demosthenes are on subjects unworthy of his talents. (Q. 193.)

We can scarcely imagine more glorious opportunities for the display of oratory, than those afforded by the complaints of oppressed and plundered provinces against their governors. Take, for example, the impeachment of Verres; here, the clients of Cicero were the injured people of a great province. When he pleaded their cause, not the Sicilians only, but persons of distinction from all Italy, flocked around him in the forum—the glaring guilt of Verres, and the nature of his crimes, made the subject most copious, interesting and various. “Such a wonderful assemblage of circumstances,” says Mr. Dunlop, “never yet prepared the course for the triumphs of oratory. So great an opportunity for the exhibition of forensic art will, in all probability, never again occur.” (160.) From the extensive ramifications of Roman power, numerous cases arose, of a description rarely to be met with in modern times. There is but one case in all British history at all comparable to the case of Verres—the impeachment of Warren Hastings—and that called forth perhaps as great a display of oratory as has been witnessed in modern times.

It is true, that the subjects of forensic eloquence in Rome may have excelled in importance and interest those of Greece, or of any other nation, which has ever appeared; and hence most of Cicero's master-pieces were delivered in the forum. But great as those subjects were, they could not compare in interest with the important subjects debated before the assemblies of Greece. The bar does not admit the most sublime eloquence. The highest order can only arise “on occasions calculated to strike and agitate the human soul.” When consternation prevails,—whenever the brave are mute with astonishment, then, the man, who can stand forth undismayed, and point out the means of deliverance, or lead the way to a noble self-devotion, like Patrick Henry, when he exclaimed, “whatever others do, I'll fight,” is the truly eloquent man. Such situations as these oftener existed among the Grecian democracies than in the Roman empire. The extent of the latter, its power, the mixed character of its government, with the predominance of the senate—all conspired to prevent the occurrence of those crises, in which the very existence of the commonwealth was threatened. Great state matters too were not always debated before a tribunal so favorable to eloquence as the popular assemblies of Greece. The Roman senate materially modified Roman oratory.

IV. We now proceed to the fourth cause of difference between ancient and modern eloquence. The invention of the printing press, without doubt, is the most important of modern events—it has fixed an era in the history of mankind—has given to government, to literature, to civilization, a new aspect; and we are not to wonder, therefore, that it has powerfully contributed to change the character of eloquence.

Formerly, books were necessarily so dear, that few could be produced; and consequently few persons could purchase or read them. In the time of Louis XI., it is supposed that about six thousand persons, in all France, were employed as copyists; whilst, at this time, with that powerful engine, the press, in motion, sixty thousand persons in the city of Paris alone obtain their living, either directly or indirectly, from the business of the press. The consequence has been a greater diffusion of knowledge among the people. This has contributed to destroy that immense inequality which formerly existed among individuals; even the lucky few, who had wealth and talent, could procure but a scanty supply of the imperfect works that existed—the deficiency was to be supplied by travel and personal inspection. Herodotus, for example, was obliged to travel most extensively before he could write his history. The very few, therefore, who could amass knowledge, and cultivate their talents, enjoyed a monopoly which gave them undue power over the illiterate mass. Voltaire has compared the great men among the people of antiquity, to a few tall cypresses amid a thick undergrowth of shrubbery. The printing press has elevated the mass, and perhaps brought down, somewhat, the more gifted few. To pursue the simile of Voltaire, it has lowered the tall cypresses, and elevated the shrubbery. “The noble has gone down on the social ladder, and the retainer has gone up.” Public opinion is every thing; individual influence is nothing. The orator now does not possess that commanding superiority over his audience, which will enable him to sway it by his eloquence. There is too much light in the world to make the orator even the principal instructor.

It has been well observed by Lord Brougham, that the orator of old was the parliamentary debater; the speaker at public meetings, the preacher, the newspaper, the published sermon, the pamphlet, the volume—all in one. It is not to be wondered at, that when such a being was to speak, all Greece should assemble to hear him. But there is a great change since the invention of printing. The periodical press is now the organ of communication, and the potent engine that controls the popular will. It is the periodical press which first discusses every matter of importance; and when the orator now rises to speak on any great subject, in a deliberative body, or even in a court of justice, he finds that the novelty of his subject has been worn off by the newspapers; his arguments are stale; and he feels like one rehearsing the thrice-told tale. How different from the Greek and Roman orator, who monopolized all the functions of the press, the senate, the school and the pulpit, and was even a rival of the stage actor! Surprise has always been found a powerful coadjutor of eloquence; but what orator can now operate a surprise on his audience, either as to matters of fact, or of argument? He finds that busy, sleepless organ, the press, eternally ahead of him.

With the progress of civilization and advancement of arts, manufactures and commerce in modern times, men are divided into more varied professions and occupations than formerly. We are too busy, each with his own concerns, to exercise directly all the political functions. We delegate the management of political interests to those, who have the leisure and ability to attend to them. But whilst the system of representation thus throws the immediate action of the government into the hands of the few, the diffusion of knowledge, by the press, secures to the people an irresistible influence over the government—sectional interests are better understood—and it is well known that large masses will generally pursue their interest. Representatives feel themselves responsible to their constituents; and hence, in all great deliberative bodies, legislation becomes a matter of compromise and balance between the great and jarring interests of the body politic. Every thing must now be done by calculation, by previous arrangement, by party combination. It has been justly said, that even in the greatest storm of debate, you may perceive the speaker under the dominion of a spirit of calculation; in his boldest flights, he is still bound in the fetters of political combinations. No orator now can, by the energy of his single voice, sway the deliberations of modern parliaments to the issue of peace or war. But, in the democracies of antiquity, war was often declared, alliances formed, revolutions achieved, by the single influence of one potent tongue. The assemblies of Greece and Rome were supreme; and on their judgments depended the fate of empires. It was the population of the metropolis that ruled, unconditionally and irresponsibly, all the other parts of the body politic. But in the modern representative assembly, the capital in which it deliberates may not have a single representative. All the discordant interests of a widespread territory are here represented—the pulse that beats within the senate chamber may not be in unison with that which beats around it. It is not on the multitude of the metropolis, not even on the assembly seated in the capitol, that the orator must produce his effect. He must in fact address, through the medium of the press, the distant provinces of the empire, and wait for the slow returns of popular will, before he can persuade to action. Before the orator can operate on an American congress, it is necessary first to op-rate on the American people. Congress is but the mirror that reflects the popular will.

When an immediate effect is to be produced, the strongest passions of our nature must be appealed to. But when time is an element in the calculation, the principle of self-interest predominates over every other. When Demosthenes addressed the Athenian assembly, or Cicero the comitia of Rome, the audiences did not wait to hear from the islands of the Ægean, nor from the province of Gaul, nor from the more distant Britons; their decisions were immediate and irresponsible. Hence every effort was made to rouse the stronger passions of our nature. But he who addresses the modern parliament knows full well that it cannot be by a mere stroke of oratory that his effect must be produced. He knows that the speech which he delivers, to be efficient, must be one that will bear the closest scrutiny. He knows that the editor and reviewer will sit in judgment on it; that the leaders of the opposite party will analyze it; and, above all, that the wise men of that constituency which he represents will sit in solemn judgment on its merits. Such a speaker must be exact in his information, accurate in his principles and details, comprehensive in his views. His plans and his principles will be of infinitely more importance than the mere rhetoric with which he enforces them. However, at the moment of delivery, the substance may be concealed by the skill of the orator, he may be sure that when the wand of criticism is applied, every principle and every plan will be made to stand forth to public view in all their nakedness. When a gentleman was once asked, how he liked the speech of one of the finest orators of our country? he answered, that he had been greatly disappointed, but that it was impossible for human power to produce eloquence upon fourteen and three-quarter cents to the square yard. For all that, however, our speaker must not neglect cents and quarters of cents, no matter how unfavorable to oratorical display. He is very sure that the great interests of this country will not be cheated out of their wealth, nor reconciled to dangerous schemes of policy, by the mere jugglery of oratory. Thus substance is every thing, ornament nothing. The modern science of political economy has of itself operated a powerful change in public speaking.

V. The fifth cause of difference between ancient and modern oratory, is the difference between the ancient and modern languages. The superiority of the classic languages for the great ends of oratory is acknowledged by every scholar; take it all in all, no language has ever equalled the Greek. Lord Brougham, when speaking of Demosthenes, says, that the adoration of ages has consecrated his place at the head of the mighty masters of speech; and the loss of the noble instrument with which he forged and launched his thunders, is sure to maintain it unapproachable forever. The peculiar structure of ancient languages, whilst it dispensed with the larger proportion of those little words which Dr. Campbell has aptly called the luggage of language, gave much more latitude to the collocation of the related words in a sentence; and consequently, enabled the speaker so to arrange as to place the important words in that position which would give greatest force or beauty to the sentence. Even in the most common prose, the utmost attention was sometimes paid to the management of words—e. g., in the note-book of Plato, after his decease, it was found that the first sentence of his treatise, De Repub., had been written several times over with different arrangements, so as to select the best; and yet the sentence translated is simply, "I went down yesterday to the Piræus with Glaucon, the son of Ariston." It would be ridiculous to bestow such pains on the collocation of the words of such a sentence in any modern language. Yet we cannot charge Plato with sacrificing force and dignity to the polish and miniature beauties of language, whose diction Cicero compares to the inspiration of poetry, and Quintilian to the responses of the Delphic oracle, and of which it was said, had the father of the gods spoken in Greek, he would have used no other language than Plato's.

It was by means of this liberty in collocation, and the more musical character of the words, that the effect of many a sentence in the ancient orations must be mainly attributed—e. g. Cicero's description of Verrea, he tells us, produced an electric effect on his audience: Stetit soleatus Prator Populi Romani, cum pallio purpureo, tunicaque talarum, muliercula nixus, in littore. Again; he says he was present when Carbo, in a speech, pronounced the following words: Patris dictum sapiens temeritas filii comprobavit; in which the metre of the word, comprobavit, drew forth a shout which it was wonderful to hear. Ancient rhetoricians gave rules for composition of "numerous" prose, scarcely less nice and complex than those of metrical harmony. It is owing mainly to the superiority of the ancient languages, that no translation can do justice to the orations of Demosthenes and Cicero. Hence, the Edinburgh Review was justified in saying of the translations of Demosthenes' speeches, by the Abbe Augur, that, when the bullion and substance of the athletic and ponderous orator were span into French wire, it bore very little more resemblance to the original, than the slim figure of one of their skipping posture-masters to the muscular frame of old Milo of Crotona, or one of their lean kine to a well-fed bull of the Crowland or Bedford level.

In the preceding remarks, I have not insisted particularly on free institutions as a cause of eloquence, because these were common to the ancient and modern world; and all history has shown that genuine eloquence can only flourish under institutions of republican character. Under arbitrary governments, where one governs and the rest obey—where the despot, like the Roman centurion, has only to say to one, go, and he goeth, and to another, come, and he cometh—persuasion is of no avail. Wherever submission is the principle of government, eloquence can never arise. Hence, in modern times, we can only look for eloquence in states with popular institutions, like England and America; or, if it appear in despotisms, it will be in times of great popular excitement, as in the commencement of the French revolution. Among the ancient nations, Greece and Rome only—and these merely during the existence of popular institutions—furnish us with great specimens of oratory. The vast despotisms of Asia, either in ancient or modern times, have furnished not one single great and acknowledged orator.*

It will be seen from the foregoing remarks, that the difference between ancient and modern eloquence is owing mainly to the difference of circumstances, and hence it is difficult to assign the palm to either. The ancient had perhaps more passionate appeals, and produced greater effect on the audience; ours has more logic, more learning, more thorough regard to all the great interests of the body politic. If upon the whole it be asserted, as Hume and Quintilian and most of the critics have done, that the rarest and noblest specimens of oratory are those that appeal to the strong passions, and carry away the hearer, a passive instrument in the hands of the orator, we must never forget that this advantage was due to circumstances which no philanthropist could ever wish should return. It was the forms of procedure, the character of the courts or assemblies before which questions were tried, and above all the nature of those questions themselves, that gave to Greek and Roman oratory such dazzling splendor, and surrounded it with a glory which can never shine on the efforts of rhetoric in better regulated communities, under a more sober dispensation of justice, and with that invaluable engine, the press, giving ubiquity to in-

* The only kind of eloquence that can flourish to any great extent under a monarchy, is that of the pulpit. The pulpit oratory of France has been perhaps superior to that of England or America. The Roman Catholic religion is better calculated to produce impassioned eloquence than the Protestant. The latter is more favorable to reason and argument. The authority of popes and councils fixes the Catholic creed, and individual interpretations of the Scriptures are heretical. Crede, believe, is the Catholic motto. Hence, the minister in the pulpit, with all his doctrines previously established by popes and councils, is left to address the feelings principally: his sermons are exhortations. Not so with the Protestant. He proceeds on the principle that every christian must read and interpret the Bible for himself—nothing is taken for granted; all must be proved. His motto is the reverse of the Catholic's. Proba, prove! is what every Protestant demands of his pastor. Hence Protestant sermons are mainly of the character denominated doctrinal, not so favorable to passionate eloquence.

It has become customary in all discourses on eloquence, to compare Demosthenes and Cicero, because they stand first in their respective countries. Theophrastus, it is true, is represented by Plutarch as saying, Demosthenes was worthy of Athens, and Demades above it, thus giving the preference to the latter.† But in spite of this, we must give to Demosthenes the first place in Greece. In making this comparison between the two great orators of antiquity, we must remember that we cannot compare the manner and elocution of the two, but must judge mainly from what has come down to us from each; and this, as it regards eloquence, is but an imperfect test. There is generally something in the manner of the great orator, for which no language can compensate. Hence, we can never adequately determine true oratorical merit by even the most accurately reported speeches. Mr. Burke's speeches are incomparably the best that have ever been delivered in parliament, judging from the printed reports, and they will probably survive all other specimens of British parliamentary eloquence; and yet it is a well known fact, that Burke was not an orator; he could not produce an effect on the house. When he delivered his great speech on the debts of the nabob of Arcot, so faint was the impression that Pitt and Grenville, after consultation, decided not to answer it; and yet both were obliged afterwards, when it appeared in print, to acknowledge it to be one of the most perfect models of oratorical compositions on record.

Demosthenes and Cicero have been compared; 1st, as business speakers; 2d, as regards vehemence and moral sublimity; 3d, as to learning and philosophy; 4th, as to morals.

1st. Demosthenes' speeches have more of the business character than Cicero's. They are always to the point; there are no digressions—no common-places—nothing for mere ornament. Demosthenes combined the lofty declamation of Lord Chatham with the close, business-like, rapid debating of Fox. He is almost painfully concise, even to the reader; whereas Cicero often amplifies and deals in philosophical reflections, some of which are mere common-places. He was accused by his contemporaries of being rather florid and Asiatic in his style.

2d. Demosthenes' speeches, too, have more of the moral sublime. Heeren has pronounced him the sublimest and purest tragic character with which history acquaints us. From his first appearance to the moment when he swallowed the poison in the temple, we see him struggling against destiny—sometimes thrown to the ground, but never subdued. How natural that the lines of melancholy and indignation, which we behold in his bust, should have been imprinted on his austere countenance.* His political principles emanated from the depth of his soul. He remained true to feeling and conviction amid all changes and dangers; hence, that vehement sublimity which made him the most powerful of orators.† When Cicero spoke, the man was admired, the oration was praised. When Demosthenes had spoken, the crowd went away denouncing Philip.

A great deal of this difference between the two orators must, however, be attributed to the difference of subject. Cicero, on a suitable theme, sometimes made a near approach to the Greek—e. g., his speech against Piso was extremely vehement. His second philippic against Anthony has more Demosthenean vehemence than any of his orations. In the latter part of his speech for Milo, he rises into the moral sublime; so likewise, in many parts of the speeches against Verres—in all these instances his subject was of such a nature as to call forth much vehemence. But Cicero would often weaken, by digression or philosophical reflection, in the midst of the most powerful eloquence—e. g., the oration for Milo, in the midst of

* There seems to be something truly wonderful in the Grecian character. If we take the parts of one of their fine statues or buildings and examine each separately, every leg, every arm, every column has an individual beauty, which makes it almost perfect in itself. View all the parts as composing one whole, and how beautiful is the relation existing between them! how perfect a unit is that whole which they make! how inimitable is the expression of design! Take one of the great orations of Demosthenes and dissect it in like manner, and you will find the same remark applicable to it which I have made on Grecian sculpture. Examine his introduction, his narration, his argument, peroration, &c., and you find them all perfect of their kind. Put them together as he has done it, and you have the beau-ideal of an oration. It is singular that even in geometric demonstration, the Greeks almost reached perfection, in the simplicity of the style, and the order and arrangement of the steps.

† Demades was said to be a good extempore speaker, and his was probably the cause of the preference given by Theophrastus.

* The associate counsel of Cicero generally assigned to him the peroration, in consequence of his seductive, melting manner. But the sternness of Demosthenes adapted him peculiarly for success in the prosecution; hence, all his judicial speeches, with only one exception, are on the side of the plaintiff. He was irresistible in bold denunciation. He was charged with inheriting the Scythian ferocity from his maternal grandmother; and hence the cutting sarcasm of Diogenes, the cynic, who characterized him as Scythian in words, and civil in battle.

† Demosthenes represented the spirit of the small cities and petty republics; his genius belonged to a time, past and gone, that could never return. Hence his eloquence, matchless as it was, could never achieve the result at which he aimed. His attempt to re-animate a bygone and demolished age, says Monsieur Cousin, was a real wager against all possibility; his history is similar to that of all men who attempt impossibilities. After the performance of prodigies in the tribune, he found it necessary to run away at Cheronæa.

the most vehement declamation, he digresses suddenly into a dissertation about the order of Divine Providence—beautiful, but ill-timed. Eloquence with Demosthenes was an instrument to attain his ends; with Cicero, it was an accomplishment—a branch of finished education.

3d. Demosthenes was less learned. Rochefoucault remarked, that no man ever exerted his faculties to the fullest extent of which they were capable. A great critic (Mr. Adams) has observed, if ever there was an exception to this remark, it was Cicero; who was perhaps the most perfect example of universal genius, combined with untiring study, presented in the annals of history. Some men may have equalled him in genius, some in labor, but never was there so illustrious an instance of the "mutual league between nature and study, between the ethereal spirit and terrestrial toil," as this wonderful man presents. He was poet, historian, philosopher, moralist, epistolary writer and critic; and in every character except the first,* he was preëminently great. From the 26th year of his age, when he first appeared in public, in defence of Quinctius, to the last year, when he delivered his philippics against Anthony, his labors in his profession and his studies in the closet were without intermission. Demosthenes labored as intensely as Cicero; but it was all for one purpose: it was not to be an elegant scholar, but an irresistible orator. In him, consequently, we behold nothing but the one great talent.

Demosthenes, therefore, produced the greatest effect on the auditor, Cicero on the reader.

Burke, of all modern speakers, most resembles Cicero in his matter, and therefore has generally been regarded as an imitator. Cicero is always ethical and deeply philosophical.

4th. The moral character of Demosthenes has suffered from having taken a bribe, as was asserted, from Harpalus, a creature of Alexander, whose prosecution was commenced by Demosthenes, but was afterwards discontinued, because of the present of a golden cup made by Harpalus. This charge, however, rests on insufficient grounds, and is now discredited by the best historians.†

Of the private character of the Greek we know but little; but the noblest impulses alone could give rise to that immortal eloquence, by which he so often roused the democracies of Greece. With Cicero we are much more familiarly acquainted—

* It is said we appreciate compliments most highly upon doubtful accomplishments. Upon that principle, we can explain the reason why Julius Cæsar, when trying to win Cicero, praised his poetry as much as his eloquence. So likewise under Cardinal Richelieu, the applicant for office was more likely to obtain it, by calling the Cardinal a greater poet than Corneille, than if he had told him he was the greatest statesman of the age.

† Eschines reproaches Demosthenes with his money-loving propensity, and speaks of his head as being a treasure to him.

he was undoubtedly one of the best men of his age. Mr. Adams thinks, that his system of morals was the most perfect, ever promulgated before the glad tidings of Christianity. No one has ever more beautifully delineated the pleasures, or prescribed the duties of friendship; no one, with more soothing hand, has extended the consolations of virtue to the waxing infirmities of age.

After all these bright points, we can but regret that last infirmity of great minds—an overweening vanity: Cicero's fulsome praises of himself are sometimes disgusting to the modern reader.

Demosthenes was entirely free from this weakness. We must, however, remember that the ancients generally had but little of that delicate sensibility which would blush at praise, particularly self-praise. Cardinal Woolsey defended his usual style of address, ego et rex meus, by the custom of the ancients—who always, in the spirit of selfishness and candor, put themselves first.

Demosthenes was no doubt the firmest man, and perhaps the most uncompromising patriot—sternness was his characteristic. Cicero was sometimes wavering, and his party always feared his want of firmness. He vacillated between Cæsar and Pompey; and it was thought the artful praises of the former, operating on his vanity, too often weakened his exertions for his party. Both were banished from their countries, and Cicero wept over his fate like a child; Demosthenes bore it with manly fortitude. Both have been charged with cowardice—Demosthenes ran away at the battle of Cheronœa (no proof however of cowardice, as the whole army fled); and Cicero was always accused of being deficient in nerve. It was said that the presence of Pompey's troops, at the time he defended Milo, so agitated him, as to produce a perfect failure. He always, however, had resolution to attack his enemies with great fierceness, as exemplified by his attacks on Catiline and Mark Anthony.* Both behaved with great firmness in the hour of death, and both fell the patriotic victims of despotism.

Both not only prepared themselves, but wrote out carefully their speeches before speaking, whenever they had an opportunity. Demosthenes was extremely averse to speaking without this preparation, and generally the mode of doing business allowed of it. When, however, there was a necessity for it, he spoke extemporaneously, and Plutarch says, with great power—e. g., his celebrated reply to Pytho was unpremeditated; and he spoke on the capture of Elatea after a single night's reflection. Cicero, too, was capable of splendid extemporaneous display, whenever the exigency demanded, as in the case of the great riot in the theatre on account of Otho's law; yet he too pronounces the pen to be the most effectual teacher of eloquence.

It was this constant habit of writing out speeches which will explain the anomaly of so many written speeches never delivered—e. g., oration against Midias by Demosthenes was never spoken; five out of seven of the orations against Verres were never spoken; 2d philippic vs. Mark Anthony was not even designed to be spoken; the oration for Milo was not delivered, at least as it now appears: and in the written speeches, reference is often made to circumstances which would now appear ridiculous. In the speech for Milo, Cicero makes reference to things which could only happen whilst in the rostrum—e. g., alarm occasioned by the presence of armed men, the attention of the audience, the effect on the adversary by certain passages, &c.; all these were put in at random. But in 2d philippic, never delivered, he speaks as if delivering it on a particular day, which day is spoken of as bearing on the argument; he affirms that certain parts make Anthony feel, as if torn in pieces; and actually asserts, that he is at the moment growing pale with fear, and perspiring.

In Greece it was customary for the pleaders to write speeches and give them to others to deliver. The celebrated Isocrates, after his first failure, never could command resolution to appear again in public, but wrote many admirable orations delivered by others. The moderns are so much in the habit of extemporaneous speaking, that we have acquired a sort of contempt for written speeches. We consider them unfit for the modern mode of debating; and hence the two great orators of antiquity, it has been supposed, would have cut no great figure in the struggle of a modern debate, where the subject is argued stringently with an antagonist, "hand to hand, and foot to foot." As the mode of doing business anciently allowed of preparation, it is probable that Cicero and Demosthenes were not good debaters in our sense of the term; but that is no objection to them. Theirs was the highest kind of eloquence.

History has shown that the greatest speeches cannot be struck out at a heat. The finest displays have been those most studied, where the orator, as has been happily said, refines into simplicity, and elaborates into ease. It has been generally supposed, that the orator cannot feel the impulse of inspiration, except with the audience before him. This is a great mistake. In the closet his imagination may picture the scene, and thus inspire him as effectually as if the speech were delivering. Facts prove this theory. The two greatest orators of the ancient world preferred writing: and without doubt the two speeches of Cicero, the one for Milo, and the other, the 2d philippic against Anthony, which were never delivered, were his greatest; the last is particularly remarkable as a vehement oratorical effort. The speech too of Demosthenes against Midias is one of his best, although never spoken.

In modern speeches, even, there is little doubt but that most of the passages of overpowering eloquence are most elaborately wrought out beforehand. The most powerful orator that England has ever produced, Lord Chatham, most laboriously prepared himself. He is said to have read Bailey's Dictionary twice over, to have articulated before a glass, to perfect himself in the use of language. We have every reason to believe that all his most celebrated passages, even that splendid allusion to the tapestry, were concocted beforehand. The very folding of his flannel around him, like a toga, and that sweep of his crutch, by which he awed his adversary into silence, were all pre-arranged.* Lord Brougham, by his own confession, wrote out the peroration of his speech for Queen Caroline seven times before he was satisfied with it.

Of all the orations of modern times, that of Sheridan in the trial of Warren Hastings seems to have produced the most magic influence on his audience,† and yet we know that it was most labo-

* One of his most distinguished partizans complained that he could not even get admittance to Lord Chatham's room, till all was ready for the representation, till the dresses and properties were correctly disposed of, till the light was thrown with Rembrandt-like effect on the head of the illustrious performer, till the flannels had been arranged with the air of a Grecian drapery, and the crutch placed as graceful as that of Bellisarius or Lear.

† Mr. Hume considers the effect produced by Cicero so cool a head as Cæsar's, in the case of Ligarius, as evidence of great power. Judging by a similar rule, we should pronounce the speech of Sheridan on the Beggar charges, as preëminently eloquent. Bissett, the continuator of Hume and Smollett, tells us that Logan, an accomplished scholar, and who himself wrote a masterly defence of Hastings, went into the House of Commons prepossessed in favor of the accused, and against the accuser. At the end of the first hour of Sheridan's speech, he pronounced it all declamation without proof—at the end of the second, he said, "this is a most wonderful oration"—at the close of the third, he said, "Mr. Hastings has acted very unjustifiably"—after the fourth, "Mr. Hastings is a most atrocious criminal"—and at the close of the speech, which lasted five hours, he said, "of all the monsters of iniquity, the most enormous is Warren Hastings." Sir William Dolben moved the adjournment of the debate, confessing it was impossible to give a determinate opinion after such a speech. Mr. Stanhope seconded the motion; his opinion had inclined to the side of Mr. Hastings, but now nothing but information, almost equal to a miracle, could prevent him from sustaining the charge; but he had just felt the influence of such a miracle, and therefore he must avoid an immediate decision. Mr. Matthew Montague made a similar confession; and Burke, Fox and Pitt immediately paid compliments, which proved that all were overwhelmed by the display. It may be well here to add, before closing this note, that the result in this case marks the difference between the ancient and modern theatre. Had the decision been made immediately, as would have been done in Athens, or even as quickly as in Rome, Hastings would certainly have been hanged, or sent to the galleys. But in England, the prosecution was spun out through several years; the influence of great interests was brought to bear on the trial riously prepared—all the decorative passages were worked to a full polish beforehand by the most artistic skill. The industry of his whole family, from Mrs. Sheridan down to Edwards, his servant, was put in requisition—some with pen and scissors making extracts, while some were pasting and stitching his scattered memoranda in their proper places.

Our American orators, too, generally prepare their finest passages. In the late presidential canvass (1840), it was proved by the fact, that the same speech would be delivered in different places almost verbatim et literatim—several of the most successful of our popular orators have confessed that their finest declamatory passages were wrought out beforehand, and committed to memory. It is well known that Mr. Randolph, one of our greatest orators since the time of Henry, prepared himself with minute care: it has been proved by his notes.* About Patrick Henry some doubt has been entertained, because he was not a student in

The success of Mr. Hastings in his government, in spite of all his supposed enormities, moderated the public censure—public opinion turned in his favor; and thus was this great state criminal not only preserved unharmed, amid all that perilous lightning which flashed around him from the lips of Burke, Fox and Sheridan, but his trial came to be regarded as an unworthy prosecution of a meritorious and successful statesman; he was discharged, and lived to see the day when a British House of Commons thought themselves honored by his presence, and actually welcomed him with cheers when called as a witness on the East-India company's charter!

* By this, I do not mean to assert that Mr. Randolph wrote out his speeches beforehand, and that his notes were intended to remind him of words, but merely he prepared himself with great care and thought. As soon as he conceived the purpose of making a speech, his mind went to work to gather, arrange and prepare the materials. This it did whether alone or in company, whether speaking or listening. Every thought that came into his mind, which seemed capable of being wrought into the texture of his intended speech, was arrested, canvassed, and, if found appropriate, tacked down, as it were, by a word or two, in his notes. No caprice of his own fancy, or of the fancies of those with whom he conversed, was suffered to escape this process; and illustrations, sarcasms and epigrams were all treasured up. These last, and these alone, he polished with elaborate care. He knew that the effect of these things depends not only on the precise words, but on the precise collocation of the words. This therefore he determined beforehand. But it was only on the very point of the epigram—the "sting in the tail" of the sarcasm, as he himself called it, that he bestowed this care. He went into battle armed with arrow points, and trusted to the chance of war to supply the shafts to which they were to be fitted.

This was known to his intimate friends by the fact, that, in conversation with them on the subject of which he was about to speak, he would frequently utter such things in the very words in which he would afterwards introduce them into his speech. "I remember particularly (says a friend) the last speech he made in the House of Representatives. He had been waiting the opportunity to make it for ten days; and in that interval, I am inclined to think, I heard from him, in private, almost every brilliant thought contained in the speech. General Hamilton, who was most with him at the time, and possessed all his confidence, probably recollects much of the same sort."

the ordinary acceptance of the term; nor was he in the habit of committing his thoughts to paper; yet even he made the most elaborate preparation. When he was about to plead a great cause, he became more abstracted than usual in his family; he talked frequently to himself; now and then uttered half sentences; would go to the river to fish and be unconscious of what he was doing;—in fine, during the whole period between the first conception and the delivery of one of his great speeches, his very soul seemed to be filled with his subject. It was this that enabled him, with but little learning, to make such complete and perfect oratorical efforts. With the learning and study of the Earl of Chatham, he would have surpassed all modern orators; as it was, Mr. Jefferson thought him equal to any orator that has ever appeared since the time of Cicero.*

Extemporaneous debating requires the most perfect preparation; because all other things being equal, the man who possesses a thorough and complete knowledge of the whole subject, will be the most ready speaker. You cannot take such a man by surprise, because he is prepared at all points; and this explains why men of great reputation almost always fall below expectation, when suddenly transferred to great deliberative bodies, before which they have not been regularly trained. Lord Erskine went to parliament with an unrivalled reputation as a forensic speaker; yet he was no match for Pitt and Fox, very much to his chagrin. It was the remark of a distinguished Senator, some years since, that the greatest debater in the world might be suddenly translated to the Senate of the United States, and for the first year, at least, he would find himself unequal to some three or four in that body. The reason is not, that the new speaker has an intellect less powerful; but because, in the first place, he is not so thoroughly master of all those topics which may, by possibility, engage the attention of the house, as he who has been longer trained on that arena, and therefore he is much more subject to surprise; secondly, he is not so thoroughly acquainted as older members with the temper of the house; and, therefore even if he could deliver as good a speech as any one, yet it would not be so effective; he could not throw his shot between wind and water with that precision which a more thorough knowledge of the temper of the body alone could enable him to do.

The presidential canvass of 1840 presented a scene somewhat analogous to popular speaking in Greece. During the entire summer, and the months of September and October, the people throughout the United States became so interested in the presidential contest, as to gather from day to day in large assemblages, before which the best speakers of the districts engaged in debate. The greatest orators too in this country travelled from county to county, and state to state, like Peter the Hermit, visiting even the most inaccessible regions, that they might, everywhere, awaken the public mind to a due sense of the importance of the crisis—the subject too was great and agitating: the public mind became deeply excited; and it may perhaps be asserted with truth, that never, since the period just before the American revolution, has a finer field been presented for the display of oratory. It was not the schoolmaster, but the orator who “was abroad in the land.” By the success of this experiment, we may assert, without the fear of contradiction in after times, that a new era has been introduced into this country.

The stump and the steam engine will become, as one of Virginia’s most gifted sons asserted, the means of disseminating knowledge, and breaking down the influence of central dictation, and of caucus juggling: and thus will the oratory of modern times be made more analagous to that of the ancients. By this means, the orator once more is made the successful rival of the press. What will be the influence of this on the future character of American eloquence? Decidedly beneficial. It is feared by some that these promiscuous assemblies will increase all the defects of American oratory; that our speakers will become more turgid, prolix, declamatory, and their style more rude and unpolished than ever. This is not to be apprehended. The history of the ancient republics has most conclusively proven that no audience is so favorable to the production of close, concise, and powerful oratory, as the popular assembly. The people, says Mr. Hume, may sometimes be imposed on by false taste in rhetoric; but, uniformly, when the true orator makes his appearance, his superiority will be acknowledged, and the palm adjudged to him. Lord Brougham justly remarks, that the speaker who lowers his composition in order to accommodate himself to the habits and taste of the multitude, will find that he commits a grievous mistake.

All the highest powers of eloquence consist in producing passages which may at once affect the most promiscuous assembly. The best speakers of all times have ever found that they could not speak too well, or too carefully, before popular assemblies. “Mirabile,” says Cicero, “cum plurimum in faciendo intersit inter doctum et rudem, quam non multum differat in judicando.” Clear, strong, terse, natural style, has always been that which most delights the people; and these remarks are confirmed by all the most effective speakers in the late presidential canvass.

Some of the finest eloquence which has ever been displayed in this country was before the people. Mr. Randolph’s most brilliant speeches were those to his constituents; particularly, it has been said, at Prince Edward courthouse, where he was sure to have a large proportion of his audience men of high intelligence. He spoke to that high intellect, and put forth all his highest powers. He was sure of being understood better than in Congress; for they understood not only his thoughts, but his feelings and his character. They loved him, and he them;—they were proud of him, and he of them. He was proud to lead them to heights to which ordinary minds could not climb; and if at any time he went where they could not follow him, they gazed on him as he ascended with delighted pride, that supplied the place of intelligence. Hence the notorious fact, that he could not speak anywhere else as he spoke at that spot.

Our congressional oratory is not the best, because there is not a proper sympathy between the speaker and his audience. But before popular assemblies, a proper sympathy almost always exists. Those who watched the career of any one of our great speakers during the late canvass, would not fail to remark its powerful effect, and to observe how rapidly the speaker improved under its influence. Perhaps to-day he starts some topic, he throws out some hint, he finds the feelings of his audience responsive to his own—that which was a mere hint to-day, he elaborates for to-morrow; he develops the idea to its fullest magnitude, polishes and clothes it with the most energetic phraseology, and on the morrow, when he reiterates it to another but a similar multitude, he receives the loud plaudits of a delighted auditory. Thus does he advance from day to day till he arrives at the highest pitch, both in the matter and the manner, which he is capable of attaining.

Here then is the finest school for eloquence which our country presents. It is true, our popular assemblies are inferior to those of Athens, because in the hands of the latter dwelt all political power; they were addressed on all the great topics of the day by the great orators of Greece, and consequently the taste and tact of those assemblies must have been greater than that which can be generated among the millions spread over our boundless regions; any portion of whom, when assembled together, must feel that they are but a microscopic fragment of the sovereign demos, with a share of power in comparison with that of the aggregated whole, less than the widow’s mite.

This great popular mass will ever be too broken and varied, to be wrought in all its parts to that high polish, taste and tact, in regard to oratory, which characterized an Athenian assembly. Every multitude that assembles cannot have the training which the first orators of the country alone can give. But although on no point can we concentrate all the influences which operated on an Athenian assembly, yet we are compensated by the wider theatre on which we are practising. As before observed, we are enacting Greece on a grander scale; and if from any equal portion of our population we may expect fewer great orators, we must remember that we shall have millions of freemen, where the Athenians had thousands; and that the multiplication of our chances may more than compensate for the want of that concentrated influence, which operated so intensely within the walls of Athens and Rome. Our multitudes are now the most intelligent in the world; and, from the interest they take in public matters, the most susceptible of improvement. No observer could fail to mark, during the late presidential campaign, the rapid improvement achieved in the popular mind by only a few months of oratorical labor. Even the most uncultivated became at last possessed of the main points in the discussions, and contracted an intense relish for the higher kinds of eloquence. Mr. Hume said, in his day, that few would go without their dinners to hear the finest speech that could be made in Westminster Hall. But some of our best speakers have not only addressed crowds who went without their dinners, but were willing to brave the burning sun, or the pelting rain, rather than lose any portion of the intellectual feast prepared for them.

The critical taste of the whole American people has thus been wonderfully improved; and particularly in those districts where they enjoyed the advantage of hearing, in quick succession, some of the finest orators of our country. It is but fair therefore to conclude, that a continuance of such scenes, whilst it would improve the critical taste of the people, would react on the speaker, and produce the most vigorous species of popular eloquence. The oratorical campaign of 1840 has, in truth, furnished the true key to the secret of Grecian eloquence; henceforth, the American student will find no difficulty in understanding the real character of Demosthenes.*

* If it be asked whether we consider these popular discussions beneficial in a political point of view, we have no hesitation to answer in the affirmative. In the first place, they correct an alarming evil growing out of the influence of the press. The great bulk of the people read altogether on one side; few, except the rich, take more than one newspaper. None but the wisest heads can resist the influence produced by reading on one side alone; and when we consider the falsehood and treachery which characterize the press in times of high party excitement, we see at once the difficulty of diffusing truth among the people. Popular discussion corrects this evil. Able antagonists argue, face to face, before the people. Each is cautious in his assertions, because he knows that his opponent stands ready to expose falsehood, and overthrow sophism. Doubtful points are settled by a proper comparison of the facts; and the people are thus enabled to judge for themselves.

Again; we consider these discussions as eminently useful in another aspect. The party in power, in every political contest, has greatly the advantage over the adversary party; the former is the organized party; the best drilled party; and above all, it is the party which wields the patronage and influence of the government. With any thing like equal numbers and equal justice on its side, it is sure to win the victory.

Now, these popular discussions afford the very best means for successful conflict with such a party. It happens in debate, that the case is directly the reverse of what occurs in war—the party acting on the offensive, has a most decisive advantage against the defending party. The ministerial party must defend their measures at all points, and it is impossible for the course of even the wisest administration to be free from error. An opposition therefore may select these points of attack, and plant themselves always on the impregnable ground of principle; and this is one reason why, in all countries, the opposition literature, if we may so term it, and the opposition oratory, are really the best, and survive the longest.

The only objection which can seriously be urged against these popular discussions, is the political excitement and party strife which they engender. But we do not object to political excitement in a republic. The people are very rarely so thoroughly excited, that they do not decide properly; the mass are almost always honest; and when they do wrong, it is generally because they have been deceived, which rarely occurs when they have been awakened to a proper sense of the importance of the crisis. Look over the history of our Union, and you will generally find the popular verdict a correct one, after the periods of thorough political excitement. The only danger to be apprehended from excitement would be civil war, and consequently a dissolution of the Union; but this result need never be apprehended, except when parties are geographically divided; and then these popular debates would cease, because all would be on the same side in the same meeting. A popular discussion, for example, for and against abolition, will never occur in the South.

CHILDHOOD.

Again, my lyre, I wake thy soothing notes;
And while around thy stealing music floats,
Fair Fancy forms the gentle plastic lay
To image forth the morn of Life's young day.

Now night's sad sombre curtains slowly rise,
And rosy dawn comes blushing o'er the skies;
The mazy mists of morn awhile delay,
Then take fantastic forms and fly away.
From out the sea, bright Phœbus rises slow;
His shining face illumines the world below;
And now, beneath his early glancing rays,
Earth, clad in diamonds, like a queen, doth blaze;
And lovely now the dewy rose appears,
Like beauty smiling sweetly through her tears!

The golden lark, in early matin lays,
High soaring, sings her great Creator's praise;
The rippling streamlet lightly leaps along,
And ever and anon breaks forth in song;
And softly sighs the faintly perfum'd breeze;
And gently wave the green and graceful trees;
And beauteous birds dance light from spray to spray,
And sing and sport the merry hours away:
While from the grove a thousand notes arise
And join morn's many-mingled melodies.

Thus early childhood wakes to life and light—

Its dewy innocence gleams purely bright,
 Beneath the beams of Hope, that, glancing, shed
 Their heav'nly radiance round its curly head.
 No clouds are there to darken o'er the page
 Of glowing youthful joys—the reckless rago
 Of Pleasure drives the soul upon its course,
 Nor stops to heed Anticipation's hoarse
 Of coming ills. Blind confidence endues
 All objects with the most entrancing hues.
 Light thoughts, like butterflies, so bright, so gay,
 Entice pursuit, then fleetly glide away;
 And their pursuer never gets so near
 As to perceive the colors which they bear;
 But still runs on to snatch the glitt'ring prize,
 Which still, as he pursues, more swiftly flies.

Now, down the stream of Chance, the tiny boat
 Of Joy, light bounding o'er each wave, doth float;
 While on the bows the rosy boy appears,
Reflection by his side, all pale with fears,
 Watching the darkling stream, as on they glide,
 For dang'rous rocks that 'neath its bosom hide.
 The gladsome boy but sees, as on they go,
 The gaudy flow'rs on either bank that blow;
 While pensive Memory sits a stern, and sighs
 For the bright bubbles which behind them rise.
 As Knowledge, like the noonday light, comes on,
 Fair childhood's dreamy joys, like mists, are gone—
 Its errors, up, by wayward fancies driven,
 Besceem a beauteous drapery of heaven;
 They serve to dim Truth's ever-glowing blaze,
 Too pure, too bright, for youth's untutor'd gaze.
 Alas! alas! that childhood's dawn of day,
 So fair, so beauteous, fades so soon away!

ECHO.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART IV.

While the squadron of the Order was employed at Algiers, some Turkish corsairs made their appearance off Malta, and blockaded its ports. The Bailiff Simeoni, however, on his return from Africa, quickly repairing his ships, set sail after the Infidels; many of whom he captured and brought home in chains. The Turks, alarmed at his good fortune, were afraid to appear at sea, and kept themselves confined to their havens, while the Maltese Admiral pursued his course to Tripoli. Simeoni, being informed, on his arrival, by the Governor, that he had received a letter from Hassan, the King of Tunis, in which he stated that great preparations were making at Constantinople for an attack on the place, landed what provisions he could spare, with a number of soldiers, and immediately set sail to return to Malta. Omedes, on the receipt of this information, was anxious to render all the assistance in his power; but as his means were limited, he despatched an ambassador to Charles V., to remind him of his former promise, and to ask of him its fulfilment. The Emperor gave to the Grand-Master many kind words, but neither sent men nor money to the aid of his friends, who were surrounded at Tripoli by their enemies; and who were aware they must perish, should the Turks attack them in their sad and defenceless condition. Indeed, Ferdinand de Bracimont and Christopher de Solerterian, the two in command, not wishing to assume the responsibility of conducting affairs during the impending siege, asked of Omedes their relief; which being granted, John de Valetta, a monk of great courage, experience and talent, was sent to succeed them. When this Knight arrived at his perilous post, he enrolled many Moors and Arabs among his Christian soldiers, and expended the little money he had brought, in repairing the walls of his weak and crumbling castle. Fortunately for the Order, while Valetta was thus employed, news was brought of the decease of Barbarossa at his seat of Basietas, a short distance from Constantinople, where he had built a mosque and mausoleum, in commemoration of his having sold on their site, a few years before, some fifteen thousand slaves, whom he had brought captive from Corcyra. This temple and sepulchre still remain.

Dragut Raïses, a mortal enemy of the Maltese, who was to have served as second in this expedition against Tripoli, succeeded, on the death of Barbarossa, to the chief command. While the Sultan was getting his fleet in readiness, Hassan Muleasses, the King of Tunis, at the suggestion of Valetta, with rich presents and a large retinue, made a voyage to Italy, to meet Charles V., and to crave some assistance against their common enemy, who, he expected, would make a descent on his coast. When tarrying at Naples, expecting the arrival of the Emperor, Hassan heard that his eldest son, Amida, whom he had left at the head of his army, was in open rebellion against him, and had murdered all who did not acknowledge his authority. Anxious to recover his throne, Muleasses returned to Barbary, having in company many malefactors and outcasts, who, with a promise of pardon for their offences, preferred enlisting in a foreign service, to being confined to their dungeons at home.

The chief of this villainous band of eighteen hundred men who landed at Goletta in Africa, was John Baptist Lofredius, a person of good family, but of a fierce and covetous character. Hassan and Lofredius were both told, on their landing, by Tonarres, the Spanish commander of the fortress, not to think of approaching towards Tunis, until they should know whom the citizens were disposed to favor. To this advice, they were inclined to listen, until some Arab chiefs, coming out of the city, and who, like their countrymen generally, were of a suspicious and treacherous disposition, advised the King to advance quickly, saying that his son would doubtless fly when he should make his appearance before the gates, and claim his lawful throne. Muleasses unfortunately listened to this suggestion; and, with a small force, began his march, fully expecting, that, as soon as he came within sight of the walls of his capital, the citizens would come out and carry him to his palace in triumph. The Moors, when they heard that Hassan was attempting to recover his dominions only by the assistance of a few Christians, and remembering the manner in which he, by treachery and murder, got himself to be proclaimed their King, declared themselves in favor of Amida, and sallied out with hideous cries to impede his advance on Tunis. This attack was met by the Italians as gallantly as it was made. Muleasses, while bravely fighting, was severely wounded in the head and face; this, many of the soldiers who were near, observing, and fearing his death, turned and fled. Lofredius, however, with a small company, held his ground until he was completely encircled by a multitude of Moors, on horseback and foot; who, issuing out of the groves of olive trees, threatened him with immediate destruction. Discharging some pieces of artillery among his enemies, he spurred his horse through the gaps in the dense masses which his shot had made; and, in company with a few friends, took to the lake, in which he perished. Hassan, while retreating upon Goletta, was taken and brought before his son, who condemned him to have his eyes put out with a red hot iron. After this punishment had been inflicted, he was, by the assistance of an old woman, enabled to escape, and to put himself under the protection of Tonarres, who shortly after sent him to Sicily in company with the five hundred Italians, who survived in this fatal conflict, and who were only saved by the assistance of the Spaniards,—they having opened to them the gates of their fortress when closely pursued by the Numidian cavalry.

The blind old monarch, on his arrival in Europe, complained to the Emperor of his having been robbed, by the Governor of Goletta, of the money and jewels which he had placed in his custody. It would appear that this charge was substantiated; for Tonarres was soon recalled from his command, and Muleasses always supported at the expense of the Sicilian government.

Dragut appearing with a large squadron on the coast of Africa, treacherously took possession of Mehedia—a strongly fortified town between Tunis and Tripoli—"for the purpose of securing to himself an independent sovereignty" and a good harbor, whither he might carry the prizes and plunder which he should make on his different cruises. Mehedia had been for centuries subject to the Princes of Tunis; but the citizens, throwing off their allegiance, declared themselves alike independent of all foreign rule, and established a commonwealth. Dragut, having bribed one of the chief officers to admit him and his friends into the town, seized upon the castle, and declared all the inhabitants prisoners of war, unless they should acknowledge him as their master. To this, in their extremity, and much to their sorrow, they were compelled to submit.

Charles V., fearing to have so strong a position held by his enemy, commanded the younger Doria to go hither; and, at all hazards, to wrest it out of his hands, calling at the same time on the Pope and Grand-Master to render all the aid in their power. When the Admiral was ready to sail on this service, he was joined by the Maltese Bailiff de Sangle, with four gallies, one hundred and forty Knights, and four hundred men, who were in the pay of the Order. Doria, shaping his course for Cape Bon, landed his soldiers, and captured the castle of Calibia, the ancient Clypia; thence advancing upon Monasteer, he also took it after some hard fighting. When the Christians appeared before the latter place, the Turks and Moors made a sally upon them, more for the purpose of reconnoitering, than for a general engagement. The Knights, however, with a body of Spaniards, charged them so fiercely, as not only to overthrow them, but capture their town. The Governor, who retired with a few soldiers in his castle, would not surrender; he was killed by a musket shot, while exposed on the top of a breach, through which the Maltese monks were trying to force their way. Though the Turks, on his death, immediately surrendered as prisoners of war, yet grievously did the Order suffer in this short but sanguinary conflict.

Doria, who had been strictly charged by the Emperor not to lay siege to Mehedia, until joined by the forces which were expected from Italy, carried his fleet off the port, to prevent any succors being thrown in the town, which Dragut, on his departure to ravage the coasts of Spain, had left in the best possible state of defence. Hardly had he commenced his blockade, before the Admiral received a despatch from the Viceroy of Naples, intimating that it might be advisable for him, while the forces for Africa were being collected, to visit Palermo, and take on board Don Juan de Vega, an aged and experienced officer in Turkish warfare; and afterwards, proceed to Drepano, which he named as the place of a general rendezvous. When Doria arrived in Sicily, he found the Neapolitan and Maltese squadrons already at anchor: the former under the command of Don Garcia, a son of the Viceroy, who, by virtue of his birth, claimed the supreme command; an honor which the young Spaniard thought belonged to him, and which he would not consent to yield to his rival. This dispute, after being carried to such a length as at one time to threaten a division of the fleet, was compromised with great difficulty by the Bailiff de Sangle, who got the two officers to consent to the following arrangement. While at sea Garcia was to act as second in command, and when on shore each one was to head his own soldiers and obey a council of war, which was to issue all orders in the Emperor's name, as if he was actually present.

While the Christian fleet was thus detained at Sicily, Dragut made his appearance at Mehedia; and, remaining only long enough to land some fresh troops and ammunition, sailed on a cruise for the purpose of intercepting all the vessels which might be sent, during the siege, to carry succor to his enemies.

On the 28th of June, 1550, the Knights, Italians and Spaniards took up their position before the town, opened their trenches, and raised their batteries. The inhabitants, being alarmed at such a powerful force, and desirous of avoiding a battle, proposed to capitulate. This coming to the knowledge of the Governor, Eisee Rais, a bold and resolute soldier, he drew his dagger, and threatened first to kill all with his own hand who were such cowards as to propose so base a measure, and then to set fire to the city;—asking of the citizens how they could expect to receive any kindness at the hands of their enemies, and whether it was not more honorable for them to fight, and if needs be, die in defence of their religion, especially when so well supported by him and his garrison, than to quietly yield themselves as slaves, and become the inmates of foreign prisons. This language had the desired effect; the Moors passing their swords across their throats, to show that they would be faithful to their commander to the end of their lives. Rais, to show in what contempt he held the Christians, ordered some cavalry, with a few hundred Turkish soldiers, to sally out and take possession of a hill, from the summit of which they might harass the Italian camp. Don Garcia, with several companies of soldiers, advanced in a gallant manner to drive them from their position; but the Turks, being reinforced with a great number of Arabs, maintained their ground with such desperation, that the Neopolitans would have perished to a man, had not Juan de Vega and some Maltese Knights penetrated into the midst of the hostile squadrons, and courageously rescued their friends. The Viceroy observing that his artillery had effected a breach in the walls of the town, ordered an assault to be made by his Sicilian troops, refusing to permit the monks of the Order to take the lead, which, according to ancient custom, they claimed as their special right. Though the attack was made two hours before day, and in a courageous manner, yet its result could not have been more disastrous; only one, of all who were employed in this duty, escaped with his life; and he was only saved to give what information he could to the Infidels, of the intention and force of their enemies.

About this time, Muleasses, who had accompanied the Christians in this attack on Mehedia, was taken ill of a fever, and died in the sixty-fifth year of his age. He was of a tall stature and dark complexion; wise in council, brave in the field, but of a temper so vindictive, that, with his last breath, he cursed his son and all who had assisted him in his unnatural rebellion. His remains were taken to Kayrwan, the burial place of his ancestors.

Dragut, having landed on the coast with eight hundred Turks, unknown to the Christians, concealed himself in some groves of olive trees, which bounded the Spanish lines. One of the first acts of this corsair was, to send a messenger to inform his nephew, the Governor of the castle, of his arrival—and of his intention, on St. James' day, to attack his enemies, commanding him at the same time to make a sally, with a powerful force, to sustain him. A straggling Moor, who was in the suite of the deceased King, and who, by chance, discovered many of his countrymen laying on their stomachs in ambush, was the first to give the Viceroy intimation of the danger of the troops, who were out foraging for the use of his army. Don Juan de Vega, not wishing to recall the soldiers, who were engaged on this service, took with him some Maltese and other officers, with a squadron of cavalry, and advanced to escort them. This movement caused a fierce and desperate fight, in which Perez de Varga, the Governor of Guleta, and many Knights, lost their lives. When the Christians reached their camp, they found the main body of the army warmly engaged with Rais, who had made a sally in spite of a murderous fire, and had succeeded in planting two of his standards on their trenches; though he could advance no farther, and was compelled to retire with a serious loss within the gates of his fortress. At a council of war, it being proposed to raise the siege, Don Garcia, who was opposed to the measure, introduced some deserters, whose opinion it was, that any longer bombardment on the land side would be useless, as the walls were impregnable; but should they change the point of their attack to the seaward, they would doubtless succeed in making a breach, and in taking the town.

This advice being taken, some galleys were lashed together and moored near the fortification, through which, after several discharges, a practicable breach was made. Every thing being arranged, the Maltese were allowed to take the lead in the assault. Giou, who carried the standard of St. John, was the first who entered the town; but hardly had he planted it on the bastions, before he was killed by a musket shot. He was succeeded in his honorable post, by de Cossier, who proudly held the ensign waving over his head, while the battle continued. The Moors behaved with great firmness; the Turks, fearing Dragut's resentment, should they capitulate, would receive no quarter, and were utterly destroyed. Many of the inhabitants, when they found their town was captured, sought their safety in flight. Don Garcia, having purified the principal mosque, and made it a Christian church, ordered the bodies of all the Knights and other officers, who had been killed in the different attacks, to be there entombed. When the town was afterwards destroyed, these remains were taken to Sicily and deposited in the cathedral of Montreal; a splendid tomb being erected over them, and a suitable inscription engraven upon it. The siege of Mehedia continued for three months, the town being taken at the close of September 1550. Besides the immense booty of gold, silver and precious stones found in the city—for the place, from its strength, was used as a store-house for the African merchants—several thousand prisoners were made and carried off in chains.

Dragut, incensed at the loss of his capital and treasure, sent an envoy to the Sultan, to inform him how necessary it was to rout the Maltese Knights from their strong holds; adding, that should they be permitted to remain undisturbed, the commerce of his subjects would be ruined, and his longer possession of Egypt and Palestine be greatly endangered. To these suggestions, Solyman most willingly consented; more especially, as he considered that Charles V. had, by engaging in the expedition against Mehedia, faithlessly broken the five years' league, which he thought was binding between them.

Early in the Spring of 1551, Dragut, having the commission of a General in the Ottoman service, left Constantinople with a fleet of one hundred and forty sail, destined to make an attack on Malta; Sinam, being in joint command, hoisted his flag as Admiral. The news of this armament's being at sea, greatly alarmed the Order and the Spanish court. Charles V., supposing that Dragut was the prime mover of the enterprise, be it what it might, ordered his Admiral to put to sea, and give him battle, desiring also the Grand-Master to send his galleys with as many Knights as he could spare from his garrison. To this request Omedes acceded, pretending to believe that the Turks were to act in concert with the French against the city of Naples; though his council were satisfied, from the statement of the chevalier De St. John, who had returned from cruising on the coast of the Morea, that it was destined against their island; they strongly protested against his sending his squadron away at a time when he might be so hardly pressed himself. Villegagnon, the monk, who was so conspicuous at the siege of Algiers, having arrived at Messina, sent a letter to the Grand-Master to inform him, that the Infidels were on their way to attack him; and that he could not be too active in making preparations for the defence of his Order. So satisfied was the Knight of the correctness of his statement, that he asked permission of the Viceroy of Sicily to leave for Malta, and open the eyes of Omedes to his fatal error in supposing himself in safety, when there was a mine ready to explode, which might bury him and the whole Chapter in one general ruin. Villegagnon, making his appearance at the convent, being asked from whom he received his information, answered, that he was indebted for it to Montmorency, the constable of France, who told him, at the moment of his departure, that the Sultan was determined to bend his whole force against Malta and Tripoli, that he might be revenged of the Knights for the prominent part which they had taken in the capture of Mehedia and other places on the African coast. The Grand-Master, who had received this zealous monk with the greatest coolness, simply remarked, on his leaving, to some friends who were around him, "that either this Frenchman is the high constable's dupe, or he wishes us to be his;" adding, "that he could never believe that the Sultan would send so large a force against two such sterile islands as Malta and Gozo; from the plunder of which he could never collect a sufficient amount to defray him for one-tenth part of the expense which he must necessarily incur, to carry his object into execution."

The Turks sailing along the coast of Sicily, surprised the castle and town of Augusta, which they easily took, and thoroughly sacked. Few of the inhabitants lost their lives, as they fled to the mountains, whither they were not pursued. So stubborn was Omedes, that, even after this news was received, he would not believe the Ottoman fleet would visit his island.

On the 16th of July, the Grand-Master awoke to his error; for being called at early dawn, he saw from the windows of his palace the crescent waving in the westerly breeze, and a large number of hostile ships laying off the mouth of his harbor. Though the Knights were surprised at seeing so large an armament, yet they were not dismayed. Dividing themselves in different companies, some were employed in putting the women and children in places of safety, arming their men, and marshalling the soldiers; while others made excursions to discover the strength of their enemies, and watch their movements. In this last service, a Spanish commander, Guimerano, and a monk of English origin, were particularly active. The former, putting himself at the head of one hundred Knights on foot and three hundred musqueteers, ascended Mount Sceberras, where he remained in ambush awaiting the landing of the Turkish General, who was approaching in a galley to reconnoitre from his position. When the Turks came within range of his shot, he opened upon them with such precision, that many of the rowers were killed; while those who escaped, in the greatest alarm, abandoned their oars. Sinam, enraged at their cowardice, ordered them, on their peril, to pull for the shore. Guimerano, satisfied with the check he and when on shore each one was to head his own soldiers and obey a council of war, which was to issue all orders in the Emperor's name, as if he was actually present.

While the Christian fleet was thus detained at Sicily, Dragut made his appearance at Mehedia; and, remaining only long enough to land some fresh troops and ammunition, sailed on a cruise for the purpose of intercepting all the vessels which might be sent, during the siege, to carry succor to his enemies.

The news of this armament's being at sea, greatly alarmed the Order and the Spanish court. Charles V., supposing that Dragut was the prime mover of the enterprise, be it what it might, ordered his Admiral to put to sea, and give him battle, desiring also the Grand-Master to send his galleys with as many Knights as he could spare from his garrison. To this request Omedes acceded, pretending to believe that the Turks were to act in concert with the French against the city of Naples; though his council were satisfied, from the statement of the chevalier De St. John, who had returned from cruising on the coast of the Morra, that it was destined against their island; they strongly protested against his sending his squadron away at a time when he might be so hardly pressed himself. Villegagnon, the monk, who was so conspicuous at the siege of Algiers, having arrived at Messina, sent a letter to the Grand-Master to inform him, that the Infidels were on their way to attack him; and that he could not be too active in making preparations for the defence of his Order. So satisfied was the Knight of the correctness of his statement, that he asked permission of the Viceroy of Sicily to leave for Malta, and open the eyes of Omedes to his fatal error in supposing himself in safety, when there was a mine ready to explode, which might bury him and the whole Chapter in one general ruin. Villegagnon, making his appearance at the convent, being asked from whom he received his information, answered, that he was indebted for it to Montmorency, the constable of France, who told him, at the moment of his departure, that the Sultan was determined to bend his whole force against Malta and Tripoli, that he might be revenged of the Knights for the prominent part which they had taken in the capture of Mehedia and other places on the African coast. The Grand-Master, who had received this zealous monk with the greatest coolness, simply remarked, on his leaving, to some friends who were around him, "that either this Frenchman is the high constable's dupe, or he wishes us to be his;" adding, "that he could never believe that the Sultan would send so large a force against two such sterile islands as Malta and Gozo; from the plunder of which he could never collect a sufficient amount to defray him for one-tenth part of the expense which he must necessarily incur, to carry his object into execution."

The Turks sailing along the coast of Sicily, surprised the castle and town of Augusta, which they easily took, and thoroughly sacked. Few of the inhabitants lost their lives, as they fled to the mountains, whither they were not pursued. So stubborn was Omedes, that, even after this news was received, he would not believe the Ottoman fleet would visit his island.

On the 16th of July, the Grand-Master awoke to his error; for being called at early dawn, he saw from the windows of his palace the crescent waving in the westerly breeze, and a large number of hostile ships laying off the mouth of his harbor. Though the Knights were surprised at seeing so large an armament, yet they were not dismayed. Dividing themselves in different companies, some were employed in putting the women and children in places of safety, arming their men, and marshalling the soldiers; while others made excursions to discover the strength of their enemies, and watch their movements. In this last service, a Spanish commander, Guimerano, and a monk of English origin, were particularly active. The former, putting himself at the head of one hundred Knights on foot and three hundred musqueteers, ascended Mount Sceberras, where he remained in ambush awaiting the landing of the Turkish General, who was approaching in a galley to reconnoitre from his position. When the Turks came within range of his shot, he opened upon them with such precision, that many of the rowers were killed; while those who escaped, in the greatest alarm, abandoned their oars. Sinan, enraged at their cowardice, ordered them, on their peril, to pull for the shore. Guimerano, satisfied with the check he had given the Infidels, hastily embarked his men and returned to the Bourg, the usual residence of the convent, and the only place on the island which could, with any chance of success, be defended against the huge force which had appeared to invade it. The English commander, with thirty of the Order and four hundred mounted islanders, repaired to the beach, where the Turks were endeavoring to effect another landing. So courageously did they maintain their ground, that the besiegers, seeing any further attempt to land would be useless, and only expose them to greater loss, returned to the fleet, carrying their dead and wounded with them.

Sinam, having reached the summit of Mount Scceberras, and carefully observed the situation of St. Angelo, with its bastions and bulwarks, asked of Dragut, in an angry manner, if that was the castle which he had mentioned to Solyman as being so easy to reduce? "Surely no eagle could have chosen a more craggy and difficult place to make her nest in. Dost thou not see that men must have wings to get up to it, and that all the artillery and troops of the universe would not be able to take it by force?" An old Turkish officer who was of his suite, remarked: "Seest thou that bulwark which juts out in the sea, and on which the Maltese have planted the great standard of their Order? I can assure thee, that whilst I was a prisoner with them, I have helped to carry a part of the huge stones of which it is built, and am pretty sure that before thou canst make thyself master of it, thou wilt be overtaken by the winter season; and probably likewise prevented from succeeding, by some powerful succors from Europe." Dragut still supporting his opinion, a council of war was called—at which it was decided, not to attack St. Angelo, but to advance some seven miles inland, and commence their operations against Citta Vecchia, the ancient capital of the island.

St. Paul's Bay being the most convenient place for the Ottoman army to land, the fleet were carried thither and all the time kept under way, as the water was shallow, and the anchorage, in the event of a northerly gale, dangerous. While the slaves were employed in landing the artillery and dragging it over the rugged rocks—a tedious work during the summer heats—the Turks amused themselves by making continual incursions in the country, killing the inhabitants, razing their dwellings, plundering every thing of value, and destroying all the crops of cotton, corn and fruit, which the peasants, in their flight, had not been able to carry with them.

The number of inhabitants in Citta Vecchia was not far from twelve thousand, of both sexes and all ages—a people who were only accustomed to till the earth, and who were more disposed to surrender to their enemies than to arm and become subject to the Knights, and to the few soldiers who were there to defend them. While making this remark, we would not wish to imply that the Maltese were cowards, for we believe that they were then, as they are now, a courageous race; but they feared for the safety of their wives and children; and thought, that unless assistance was sent them by the Grand-Master, it would be madness for them to attempt to defend their city against so formidable a force.

Adordo, the Governor, being alarmed for the safety of his garrison, when he observed the number of Turks who had encamped themselves before his fortress, sent a messenger at midnight to St. Angelo, to inform the council of his situation; and to add, that to protect the place, it would be necessary for him to have a large reinforcement of disciplined troops, and some Knights to command them—making particular mention of Villegagnon, whom he desired would come to assist with his prowess and advice.

Omedes, being glad of an opportunity to rid himself of the presence of the French monk, who enjoyed so great an influence in the Order, and on all occasions spoke his mind so freely, consented to his departure; though he pretended to think that it was not necessary, as the peasants were so numerous, and sufficiently good soldiers to protect themselves and their capital. Villegagnon, indignant that the Grand-Master should refuse to grant the relief which Adordo requested, bluntly remarked, that he did not conceive the safety of Citta Vecchia at all depended upon the number of ignorant citizens, who, from their different villages, had fled there for protection, and who might, on the first attack of their enemies, be induced to fly; but rather on the Knights, who, from their sense of honor and education, would never, but with their lives, yield the place which they should be charged to defend. Omedes replied in a haughty manner, that six chosen members of the convent would be permitted to accompany the French commander to the capital; and should he fear to go with that number, others of his friends, he thought, might be found, who would be proud of being employed on so honorable a service. "Sir," said Villegagnon, "I will soon convince you that fear never made me shun any danger." So saying, he immediately started with his companions for their distant and dangerous post, which they safely reached unknown to the Turks; they were drawn up into the fortress by cords, the Governor fearing to open the gates to admit them. The Maltese greeted the arrival of this small party with a general discharge of artillery, and such continued shouts, as to induce the besiegers to believe that strong reinforcements had reached the garrison during the previous night.

Villegagnon, to encourage the citizens, gave them to understand, that he had come in advance of a large force; though he frankly told Adordo that he could expect no other help from the Grand-Master and that he and his friends had only come to perish as Christian warriors in defence of that standard under which they were enlisted.

A fortunate stratagem was at this time devised by the pay-master general of the forces, which succeeded to admiration. This Knight penned a letter at Malta, and directed it to Omedes, as if it had been written from Messina, in which he stated that a large fleet would leave the port the first fair wind, under the celebrated Doria, who had orders from Charles V., either to compel the Turks to raise the siege, or give them battle. A small vessel being sent out of the harbor, this despatch was entrusted to the crew, who were in the secret; they were directed to retreat in their boats to the shore when pursued; but to leave the letter where it might be easily found. When the vessel was taken, the letter was carried to Sinam, who, on learning its contents, called his officers together, to whom he said that he undertook the siege of Citta Vecchia, only at the earnest suggestion of Dragut; that he was opposed to its continuance; and recommended that they should immediately repair to Tripoli, before the season was more advanced, and the blustering weather should commence—adding, that should the information which he had received be true, and of its correctness they had no reason to doubt, the Christians might attack and capture their fleet, while the principal officers and the most of their soldiers would be at such a distance as not to be able to render their friends the least assistance. Should this happen, Sinam asked, what is to become of us? There will be but this alternative—either to die, while vainly attempting to take this castle—or surrender as prisoners of war, and become slaves to these monks, whom we are here to conquer. Though these arguments were so conclusive, yet the members of the council would not consent to raise the siege, until the Admiral promised to stop while on his way to Africa, and make an attempt on Gaules, now called Gozo, a small island about thirty miles in circumference, and four miles distant from Malta. Therefore, by the lucky trick of the pay-master, Citta Vecchia was doubtless saved.

The Turks, as they retired, were fired upon from the Maltese batteries; but more from bravado than effect; as they were out of gun-shot distance, and consequently could suffer no loss.

Three hours after the Ottoman army was embarked at St. Paul's Bay, a portion of it was again landed on Gozo, and had already commenced its ravages. The people leaving their habitations, sought refuge in the citadel, which was unfortunately commanded by a young Spanish Knight, Galatian de Sessa, who was more of a craven than soldier; he, having on the first appearance of danger, fled to his quarters, and there kept himself concealed, though repeatedly called upon by the citizens to appear and aid them with his advice, as they were willing to make a desperate defence. A brave English cavalier, incensed at the dastardly conduct of the Governor, assumed the command, and with his own hand fired off the only piece of cannon in the place which would bear upon his enemies; the piece did no little service, having killed some mussulmen of rank, which kept the rest for a time from approaching the walls. No one having the courage to take the place of the Englishman, who fell by a shot from the besieger's battery, de Sessa sent a monk to Sinam, offering to capitulate, should he guarantee the lives, liberties and effects of all the inhabitants. The Admiral contemptuously returned for answer, that he would make no such promises; and that if the place was not immediately surrendered, he would hang the commander at its gates.

This message being given to the Governor, he sent the monk a second time consenting to admit the Turks, provided he should be allowed, with two hundred, to retire in safety to the convent at Malta. This request was refused; the liberty of forty only being promised; and the messenger informed, that should he return again to offer other terms, he would be instantly flayed alive. De Sessa in despair surrendered; and the Turks finding him in his palace, the first place which they entered, compelled him, like a beast of burden, to carry on his back, down to their ships, the property they found in his own apartments. Sinam, to have the appearance of not breaking his word, sought among all the inhabitants for the forty who were the most aged and infirm, remarking that they were, in his opinion, the principal inhabitants, and least able to endure the sufferings of a captivity in a distant land. Six thousand three hundred Gozotans were, on this sad occasion, made captives, and carried off in slavery. De Sessa being stripped almost naked, was put in chains, and sent as a prisoner to a Turkish galley.

An instance of desperate courage was shown at this time by a Sicilian peasant, who, preferring death to bondage, first poignarded his wife with two lovely daughters, and then sallying forth with his musket and cross-bow, expended all his bullets and arrows before he fell, covered with wounds in the midst of his enemies.

LINES.

A WIFE TO HER HUSBAND

Tell me not that I must stay
While thou goest far away,
For indeed I cannot be
Any where if not with thee.

But wherever thou shalt roam,
I will make thy side my home;
With thee rove, and with thee rest,
Leaning on thy gentle breast.

As the ivy, passion-bound,
Clasps her cherished elm around,
Folding it with many a ring;
So to thee, my love, I cling.

As the ivy, torn away
From her sole supporting stay,
Droopeth, dieth; so must I,
Severed from thee, droop and die.

O! my husband, know'st thou not
That the Lord hath linked our lot?
And whatever is thy fate,
Mine shall not be separate.

VOGUE.

To be in vogue, is an object for the attainment of which more nerve is strained, I believe, than in any other human effort, and I take great credit to myself, therefore, for the sacrifice I shall make in this article—a sacrifice that will probably be deemed the most disinterested of any recorded in literary history; for I propose to make some remarks that will put me out of vogue—place me beyond the pale of fashion, and for aught I either know or care, beyond the boundaries of civilization. The Messenger professes, I believe, to be a “liberal” magazine, and it will, I dare say, be willing to “dot down” the impressions of thinking citizens, whether they all of them happen to think fashionably or not. The writer of the straggling thoughts here embodied, would be very sorry to “commit” the Messenger to any outré, or old fashioned notions; but, perhaps a few such crude ideas as occur to the mind that does its own thinking, may not give very great offence even to the exquisite, and possibly may even reach the sympathies of those who are not quite so exquisite. At all events, I expressly beseech that our excellent friend Mr. White may not be held responsible for the heresies of the author, if they really be heresies; but, that he may be excused on the ground of the national franchise—the right of saying pretty much what every body pleases on all subjects.

“The largest liberty” is the modern motto, and it is difficult to see, upon the principle of this adage, what right the editor of a republican magazine has, to reject the honest thoughts of a “free citizen,” even though they may run counter to the current of popular opinion, or more accurately speaking, the affectation of that opinion.

This is, it must be confessed, a tolerably long preface to so very short a title as I have adopted; but, the truth is, I thought it but reasonable, since I was so merciful in the brevity of my title, that I should be indulged in a pretty tedious introduction. If it be too tedious, there is no shorter remedy for the reader than that which obtains among the aspirants to martial glory in the New-England militia—he must jump the preliminaries.

Even after that exploit, however, I am afraid there will be farther forbearance called for. It will still be necessary, I fear, to ask him to help us a little in examining into the meaning of this same word “Vogue;” and as I have no Anglo-Saxon dictionary by me, or a Lexicon in any other language, likely to throw much etymological light on the subject, perhaps after all we may remain rather in the dark as to the legitimate signification of the very “heading” of this otherwise learned essay.

Vogue! What the deuce is “vogue?” it may possibly be asked. I am not precisely prepared to assume the responsibility of a definition; but I believe the word means—something that caprice has taken up, without knowing very well herself what it means, per se—something that has obtained a vulgar standing among those who can't account for their own partialities. This, I believe, is about what “vogue” amounts to. If there be any thing more definable or more sensible in its composition, I have only to pray heaven for further enlightenment.

* * * * *

If the foregoing attempt to convey my own meaning of the subject matter be in any degree satisfactory, it only remains to analyze it by looking a little into some of its component parts, and by exhibiting some of their more prominent phases.

Vogue is as various as the human whims that give it life and being. There are the musical vogue, the literary vogue, the political vogue—the vogue of taste in artificial productions, embracing the labors of the painter, the poet, the statuary and the architect; the vogue in what we wear, and in what we eat, as well as in the particular fashion how we shall eat after the table is spread. In short, there are so many vogues, that we have no idea of enumerating and still less of descanting on them, at this time. We shall touch one or two of them, and afterwards go on with others; unless our heterodoxy should be so palpable that the readers of the Messenger reto any farther proceedings.

The musical vogue is the most obstinate, and certainly is the most senseless and stupid of the vogue family; for its followers, man, woman and child, only endure their delights. Their ecstasies are all forced, and would be worse than torture if the sufferers were not carried through the infliction by the desire to be considered fashionable. They find it fashionable to admire a certain style of music, and of course they must admire, or confess to downright barbarism. Italian music, like Mr. Biddle's notion of Greek architecture, when he built the Banking House, is all that is “endurable in classic minds;” and, therefore, all else is counterfeit.

The moving melodies of nature, the combination of sounds which please the ear and animate the heart, are all to be discarded, looked down upon and despised, because they have not the merit of falling in with modern taste; a physical dogma is as absurd in the abstract as it is in the concrete—as gross in the mental as it is in the animal appetite—as absurd as it would be to say that the palate has the right to usurp the functions of the ear, and decide upon what should, and what should not, please the latter organ; just about as rational as for the auricular organ to undertake to regulate the faculties of its brother member, and tell the palate when to relish oysters, and when to prefer a dish of Chinese bird's nests “fried in fat,” and how the latter delicacy tasted best—manipulated with chopsticks, or carried to the mouth through the medium of knife, fork or spoon!

The simple music of our forefathers, the martial sounds that led them to battle and to victory, the “wood-notes wild” which have thrown a romance over our rural reminiscences, are voted vulgar by a vulgar cognoscenti, and every natural note and combination of natural notes are flouted, as so much heathenism, by the runners after the caterwauling of Italian professors, whether they play their “variations” in the shape of bearded bassos—pumpkin vines in the vernacular—or unbearded Cypreans who sing unintelligible contralto. The beautiful airs of Ireland, of Scotland, of England, and of our own country (if we have any,) are mere bores that the poodleism of fashion pretends to turn up its pug-nose at; while the “difficult passages” of a mustachioed savage from Milan, Mantua, Bologna or the Black Forest, are swallowed with a gusto equal to that of a half-starved Neapolitan, when theft or charity has supplied him with a mouthful of macaroni.

It may be that I was born a Goth, and that my “suscceptibility to sound” is different from that of my countrymen; but I do not believe it. I am of opinion that my tastes and my organs of sensation are as acute and as well regulated as those who “feign a fancy and affect a folly.”

Those who profess to be knowing in these matters tell us that it requires an “educated taste” to relish Italian music, and that a novice in these mysteries does not himself know what he likes. Nature has provided him no medium through which he has the least insight into his own sensations! He must put himself into training before he can distinguish an agreeable from a disagreeable sound, or know for an instant whether a melody be melodious or not. He is called upon to consider a guttural cadenza, ghastly as the last grunt of a doomed porker, as the ne plus ultra of vocal excellence, and to be in utter ecstasy with it, while he would vastly prefer the torment of a concert of broken-headed drums, and the cracked fifes of a Barkhemstead militia company. What we ought to like in music is a very different thing from what we do like, according to the canons of musical criticism, and we are actually called upon for ecstasy when nature and true taste feel nothing but disgust.

We have, through life perhaps, cherished a favorite air, and we ask a lady at the piano to play it for us; she commences, and in executing—literally executing it—we find ourselves in a fog of “variations,” and obscured by a cart-load of “science,” which render identity impossible, and make us anxious for the creaking of a grindstone, or the rumbling of an iron-waggon over the pavement, to relieve us. This is vogue—musical vogue, and which can only be reached by those who are educated for it. Heaven be thanked that I, at least, was not educated in such a school. There is no telling what a man might not have been educated to. It is easy enough to teach any thing. Cannibals are taught to prefer human flesh to any thing that could be placed before them; and the ladies of the Celestial Empire are educated in the full belief, that small feet, educated into a deformity which makes them cripples for life, are of all things the most charming. This Chinese vogue, however, is considered out of taste among most other people, though the pinching process is, we acknowledge, “practiced to some extent in this community;” but outlandish as we may look upon such propensities, they are quite as natural, and rather more rational, than the education of the taste which requires us to consider modern music any thing but an abomination.

This is what I choose to say, Mr. Editor, of musical “vogue.” If you think it too outrageous, you had better not permit me to say any thing about the other members of that fantastic family.

WHERE ART THOU, WANDERER, WHERE?

BY MRS. E. J. KAMES.

Where art thou, wanderer, where?
Where stray, this hour, thine ever-restless feet—
What lovelier place than home, what voice more sweet,
What truer, tenderer care,
Dost thou, afar from us, my brother, meet?
To what bright phantom doth thy spirit bow?
Wealth? 'tis not worth thy childhood's happy home!
Fame? 'tis a false gem glittering on the brow!
Love? doth not a fair meek image sometimes come,
With all-beseeching glance and tear-dimm'd eye,
Calling thee back by Nature's holiest tie?

Where art thou, wanderer, where?
Amid the splendid pomp of some proud English hall,
In courtly bower, or at the midnight ball,
Amid the bright and fair?
Canst thou be happy there, a stranger 'mong them all?
Where art thou? sailing upon that sunny sea,
Whose shining ripples wash the shores of Spain?
In lovely Greece, and classic Italy—
Roam'st thou through grove, and hill, and flowery plain?
Pausing by each old haunt of fallen glory,
To gather treasures for thy future story?

Where art thou, wanderer, where?
 Beneath the sultry blue of Asia's far-off sky,
 By mosque, and idol-fane, and snowy-mountain high,
 Or Persian valley fair—
 Where strange bright birds and flowers enchant thine eager eye?

Or art thou where the stars of Afric shine?
 In Moorish palace, or by Nile's green shore—
 'Mid pyramids, spice-woods, and golden mine?
 Or where the harp of Memnon play'd of yore?
 Or doth the Southern cross, magnificent and grand,
 Shine on thy path in the Cordillera land?

O! wheresoe'er thou art,
 We pray thee, burst each flowery spell, and come.
 Fain with soft-links of love, would we draw home
 The wanderer's step and heart,
 Never again from its dear scenes to roam.
 Come, for thy kind old father waits to bless—
 Come, ere thy mother's dimming eye is clos'd—
 Brother and sister wait for thy caress—
 Thy wife—thy child—'tis long since they repos'd
 Upon thy heart. O, by that fair boy's promise—
 By thy early love for her, linger no longer from us!
 March, 1842.

THE "PROMETHEUS UNBOUND" OF SHELLEY.

It has been stated by Macaulay, in one of his incomparable essays, that the present is rather a critical than an original age; and although we cannot entirely coincide in this opinion, believing as we do, that talent has rather changed its direction, than ceased its efforts; yet, to a certain extent, we must admit the justice of the remark. We believe that as much good has been done, by directing the attention of the public to hidden beauties of thought and diction in neglected authors, as by working up the old ore into new shapes to please the popular taste.

In no country has the influence of reviewers been more powerfully felt than in Great Britain; and although they may have passed many hasty judgments, and effected some injustice—as the fate of poor Keats can testify—yet, upon the whole, their influence has been decidedly beneficial. The full though tardy justice, they have of late awarded to Shelley, would do much to redeem many sins, both of omission and commission. His case has been one of peculiar hardship; seldom has so much obloquy been heaped upon the head of one man. His whole life was so embittered by constant and unrelenting persecution, that it became a torture to him. For a mere speculative difference of opinion, he was made a scoff and a finger-point—his feelings outraged—his complaints disregarded—his children wrested from his guardianship by the strong arm of the law—and he himself finally driven from his country, amidst the exultant yells of enemies, whose enmity he had never provoked.

Byron too was driven forth; but he, to use his own words, "worm-like, was trampled; adder-like, revenged." Shelley's nature, though, was far different from Byron's; there was no bitterness in his heart; in spite of all his wrongs, he loved his race; and, in his Italian exile, he cherished the same warm sympathy and gushing kindness, which characterized his boyish years. The malice of his enemies might banish him from the shores of his country, but could not erase its memory from his heart. His writings too have shared the hard fate which seemed to cling to their author. Steeped as they are in the spirit of human love, breathing the loftiest sentiment and the purest morality, and enriched and adorned by a fancy as varied as it was beautiful, they have nevertheless been stamped with reprobation, as the ravings of an atheist and misanthrope. With the strange inconsistency of hate, as Talfourd well observes, "this poet is said to deny Deity, who sees Deity in every thing." What was the pretext for this unsparing warfare against him? Why, the publication of an Infidel poem, "Queen Mab." The noble defence of Sergeant Talfourd, in the case of Moxon, has now placed this matter in its true light. But even had the fact been otherwise, we do most solemnly protest against the principle involved, that men should be persecuted for mere opinion's sake. If an opinion be founded on false premises, it can easily be refuted by argument; if it be true, it can do no injury; and that policy is as short-sighted as it is unjust, which makes a martyr of the man who candidly and honestly avows his opinions. Not that we are attempting to defend the opinions contained in "Queen Mab;" but this poem was written when Shelley was a boy of 18, and was never intended for publication; and many of the sentiments there expressed were afterwards repudiated by him in his maturer years. We merely allude to the injustice of punishing the man for the indiscretions of the boy.

The Westminster Review, for April, 1841, contains an able and eloquent sketch of the life and character of Shelley, in which the "Revolt of Islam" and the "Cenci" are highly praised; but it leaves unnoticed our especial favorite, the "Prometheus Unbound." And, as we do not recollect ever to have seen any separate notice taken of it, we will venture briefly to convey our own impressions of this production, relying on the kind forbearance of the "gentle reader."

The "Prometheus Unbound" is, both in subject and construction, an attempt to imitate the ancient drama; an attempt in which only one other of the moderns has succeeded: need we mention Talfourd? And even "Ion," beautiful and classical as it is, both in spirit and execution, does not strictly adhere to the ancient model; for the chorus, "the idealized Spectator," as Schlegel finely calls it, is not introduced. Shelley, on the other hand, does not deviate from the form of the ancient drama.

The "Prometheus Unbound," was intended as a sequel to the "Prometheus Vincit" of Æschylus; one was written by Æschylus himself, but only the outline of the plot has reached us: in it, the Titan is reconciled to his foe, the secret in his possession is revealed to Jupiter, by which the danger that menaced him is arrested, and his rule more firmly established than before. The plot of Shelley's drama is different; he rightly thought that reconciling the champion with the oppressor of mankind was but a "lame and impotent conclusion," and one which marred the character of Prometheus; he therefore preserves the unity of the character: and, by the downfall of Jupiter, and the liberation of Prometheus, he shadows forth the triumph of good over evil. No one saw more clearly than Shelley the high contrast he provoked, in selecting a subject which the mighty master of the tragic muse had already made his own; he himself earnestly deprecates any such comparison; but the issue of the high attempt has proved, that it was dictated, not by the promptings of an idle vanity, but by the happy audacity of genius, confident of its own resources. We do not pretend to compare this drama with its great prototype; for, who could ever hope to reach the unapproachable sublimity of Æschylus? He towers above his own contemporaries like a giant cliff, grim, frowning and inaccessible from the distance. The first conception of the Prometheus was his; and for that age, grand was the conception of mind triumphing over brute force—of the terrible wrath of Omnipotent malice, baffled by the firm endurance of an indomitable will, animated by superior intellect; for Prometheus knows more than his enemy, and in that knowledge is his superior.

His crime too, what was it? "Sympathy for the race of man!" The literature of the world does not present a picture more darkly grand than that of the Titan, chained to his rock, and suffering strange tortures, yet supported and sustained by his own steady soul, and laughing to scorn the vain malice of his vindictive enemy. Nor is the execution inferior to the conception; for now, when Athens, her laws, her customs and rites, are but the dim shadows of a shade, almost lost in the twilight of a remote antiquity, the "Prometheus" still remains, to delight and fascinate the scholar who possesses the key to its hidden treasures; a drama belonging to no one age nor nation, but to all mankind. Valuable is it, too, in another respect. It embodies the philosophy of the age—that dark and gloomy fatalism which made man a puppet in the hands of Fate, and which extended even to his gods; for Jupiter, though Lord of heaven and earth, is the slave of Destiny, and subject to a doom he may not fathom nor avoid.

Our space will not allow us to do more than to give a few specimens of the manner in which Shelley has performed his task; for we really believe that his drama has been as little read as its Grecian model, by the mass of readers. We take no credit to ourselves for a familiarity with its beauties. The rude laborer with his spade may often lay bare the treasure, for which the philosopher, with his divining rod, may have sought in vain.

When the drama opens, Prometheus is lying chained to a rock on the Indian Caucasus, with two of the Oceanides, Panthea and Ione, seated at his feet. He thus bursts forth in an address to Jupiter:

Prometheus.

"Monarch of Gods and Demons, and all spirits
But One, who throng those bright and rolling worlds
Which Thou and I alone of living things
Behold with sleepless eyes! regard this Earth,
Made multitudinous with thy slaves, whom thou
Requiest for knee-worship, prayer and praise,
And toil, and hecatombs of broken hearts,
With fear and self-contempt and barren hope.
Whilst me, who am thy foe, eyeless in hate,
Hast thou made reign and triumph, to thy scorn,
O'er mine own misery and thy vain revenge.
Three thousand years of sleep-unshelter'd hours,
And moments aye divided by keen pangs
Till they seem'd years—torture and solitude,
Scorn and despair,—these are mine empire."

* * * *

"No change, no pause, no hope! Yet I endure.
I ask the Earth, have not the mountains felt?
I ask yon Heaven, the all-beholding Sun,
Has it not seen? The Sea, in storm or calm,
Heaven's ever-changing shadow, spread below,
Have its deaf waves not heard my agony?
Ah me! alas, pain, pain ever, for ever!"

* * * *

"And yet to me welcome is day and night,
Whether one breaks the hoar frost of the morn,
Or starry, dim and slow, the other climbs
The leaden-color'd east; for then they lead
The wingless, crawling hours, one among whom —As some dark Priest hails the reluctant victim—
Shall drag thee, cruel King, to kiss the blood
From these pale feet, which then might trample thee
If they disdain'd not such a prostrate slave.
Disdain! Ah no! I pity thee."

Herein we think the Titan of Æschylus inferior to that of Shelley. The former is drawn as a stern, fierce, implacable being, returning the hate of Jupiter with equal bitterness, and awaiting with stern joy the doom which he knows will crush his enemy. Not so the Prometheus of Shelley. From the lofty height of his moral superiority, he looks down with pity upon his foe, and recalls the curse which, in the first bitterness of his heart—"e'er misery made him wise"—he had pronounced upon him. The ruling principle of the Prometheus of Æschylus, is hate; that of Shelley's, is benevolence. Thus, at the end of this invocation to Jupiter, he calls on the Elements to repeat to him his curse, so that he may recall it. The Elements, fearful of the wrath of Jupiter, refuse to repeat it; as also does the Earth; who finally summons the "Phantasm of Jupiter," who repeats the curse. Prometheus then asks:

(Prometheus.)

"Were these my words, O parent?"

(The Earth.)

"They were thine."

(Prometheus.)

"It doth repent me: words are quick and vain:
Grief for a while is blind, and so was mine.
I wish no living thing to suffer pain."

The Earth, mistaking the meaning of the withdrawal, and fearing that the Titan is about to yield to his enemy, bursts forth into lamentation. Just at this time Mercury, followed by the Furies, reaches the spot. A dialogue ensues between Mercury and the Titan, in which he seeks to persuade him to submit and reveal his secret to Jupiter, and shows him the Furies eager to torment him; but finding all in vain, finally says—

(Mercury.)

"Alas! I wonder at, yet pity thee."

Prometheus replies—

"Pity the self-despising slaves of Heaven,
Not me, within whose mind sits peace serene,
As light in the sun, throned: how vain is talk!
Call up the fiends."

Mercury then departs, and the Furies are left behind. Here occur some of the most powerful passages in the drama; for the Furies do not apply physical pain, but are made to work upon the mind and feelings of their victim, particularly by showing him the sufferings and evils entailed on the human race, for whose sake he is suffering so much. When first they approach him, he asks—

—"Horrible forms,
What and who are ye?"

First Fury.

"We are the ministers of pain and fear,
And disappointment, and mistrust, and hate,
And clinging crime; and as lean dogs pursue
Through wood and lake some struck and sobbing fawn,
We track all things that weep, and bleed, and live,
When the great King betrays them to our will."

Prometheus.

"Oh! many fearful natures in one name—
I know ye"—

The Furies, after all their tortures, which are powerfully described by the chorus, finding it vain to shake the constancy of the sufferer, retire; and Prometheus, left alone with the Oceanides, again bursts forth:

"Ah woe! Alas! pain, pain ever, for ever!
I close my tearless eyes, but see more clear
Thy works within my woe-illumined mind,
Thou subtle tyrant! Peace is in the grave.
The grave hides all things beautiful and good:
I am a God, and cannot find it there,
Nor would I seek it: for, though dread revenge,
This is defeat, fierce king! not victory.
The sights with which thou torturest, gird my soul
With new endurance, till the hour arrives
When they shall be no types of things which are."

The Earth then sends, to comfort him, "those subtle and fair spirits, whose homes are the dim caves of human thought." Amidst their triumphant prophecies of the happiness of the human race, and the triumph of Prometheus, the first act closes. In the second act, Asia, (another of the Oceanides, and beloved of Prometheus,) accompanied by Panthea, visits the cave of "Demogorgon"—the incarnate Destiny, who holds in his possession the secret in which the safety of Jupiter is involved. His answers are mysterious and oracular;—he tells them, however, that the "car of the hour" which is to seal the doom of the world, has now arrived, and that the hidden destiny is soon to be accomplished. In the third act Jupiter is discovered seated on his throne, and announces to the other deities that he is at length triumphant, and that the soul of man shall be trampled out, like an "extinguished spark." In the midst of his exultation, the "car of the hour" arrives; Demogorgon descends, and commands Jupiter to "follow him down the abyss." Jupiter at first resists; but finding force in vain, exclaims—

"Mercy! mercy!"

No pity, no release, no respite! Oh,
That thou wouldst make mine enemy my judge,
Even where he hangs, sear'd by my long revenge
On Caucasus! he would not doom me thus.
Gentle, and just, and dreadless, is he not
The monarch of the world?

Sink with me then,
We two will sink on the wide waves of ruin,
Even as a vulture and a snake outspent
Drop, twisted in inextricable fight,
Into a shoreless sea. Let hell unlock
Its mounded oceans of tempestuous fire,
And whelm on them into the bottomless void
This desolated world, and thee, and me,
The conqueror and the conquer'd, and the wreck
Of that for which they combated.

"Ai! ai!"

The Elements obey me not. I sink
Dizzily down, ever, for ever, down.
And, like a cloud, mine enemy above
Darkens my fall with victory! Ai! ai!"

Hercules then unbinds Prometheus, amidst the rejoicings of the Oceanides and the Elements.

In the fourth act, the benefits conferred on them by the sufferings of Prometheus are unfolded, and the drama concludes with the exalted moral drawn from the allegory which was its subject.

From these imperfect fragments, the "disjecta membra poetæ," some idea may be formed of the scope and aim of this great drama; but in the narrow limits of an article like this, it is impossible to convey any thing like an adequate idea of the lyric flow and harmony of the verse, or the striking power of the thoughts embodied in it. Like all the other productions of Shelley, it is intensely imaginative throughout; but even in his loftiest flights, he sustains himself with a strong and steady wing. It is the flight of the eagle towards the sun, revelling in the blaze of light, which would blind and bewilder any eye but his own. There is a curious coincidence in the private history of the two authors, which we cannot pass unnoticed. Æschylus, like Shelley, was accused of impiety, and tried before the Areopagus. Although acquitted, he was rendered so obnoxious to his countrymen, that the latter part of his life was spent in voluntary exile; more fortunate however than Shelley, who was arraigned and condemned, without being heard in his defence, at the bar of public opinion.

But the genius of Shelley, was as varied as it was strong. If the "Prometheus" evinces the daring sublimity of his genius, the "Adonais" equally exhibits his mastery over the gentler and softer feelings of our nature; for in it love and sorrow blend their sweetest notes over the early grave of Keats; and, "with a flute-voice of infinite wail," pour forth the dirge for him, whose spirit was too gentle and refined to resist the trials it encountered. Compare the "Lycidas" of Milton, (similar in subject and design,) to the "Adonais" of Shelley, and how boundless the difference: the one, calm, correct and unimpassioned, glittering with beauties of sentiment and diction, but cold as "Lycidas" himself, beneath the lucid wave; the other, warm and impassioned, gushing forth from the inmost heart of its author, breathing a sad and deep sincerity, and thrilling our sympathies, like the wail of a mother over her stricken child.

"O weep for Adonais—he is dead!
Wake, melancholy Mother, wake and weep!
Yet wherefore? Quench within their burning bed
The fiery tears, and let thy loud heart keep,
Like his, a mute and uncomplaining sleep;
For he is gone, where all things wise and fair
Descend:—oh, dream not that the amorous Deep
Will yet restore him to the vital air;
Death feeds on his mute voice, and laughs at our despair."

With this parting extract, we bid Shelley farewell!

THE PICTURE OF VIRTUE.

Say, who art thou that hast an angel's face,
Yet wearest weeds of sorrow and disgrace?
'A maiden pilgrim, Virtue is my name;
And, far from home, I suffer scorn and shame,
Unknown, unhonored by the passing throng,
Who spurn my counsels, and despise my song.'
Why treadest thou on death? 'I cannot die.'
And why hast thou those wings? 'To reach the sky.
For I shall shortly bid the world farewell,
And soar to heaven where all my kindred dwell.'

* This little piece is hinted from an old poem, (a sort of antique gem,) entitled 'Description of Virtue;' by Nicholas Grimoald, who wrote between 1530–1550. See Montgomery's Christian Poet, p. 62

PANDORA.

BY JOHN M'MULLEN, OF NEW-YORK.

Great Jupiter sat on Olympus' height,
In the upper air, so pure and bright,
And gazed upon the earth.
There were many green fields and lowing kine,
With broad branched oak and stately pine,
And up from among them, in wavy line,
The smoke curled from the hearth.
Then his brow grew dark, as the black storm-cloud,
That some howling wind to earth has howed,
And direful was his look;
For all fire had he taken from sinful men,
And, when he saw it blaze again,
Prometheus' craft he quick did ken,
Nor could the insult brook.
Forthwith Jove called to Mercury;
Now deep beneath the earth was he
To Pluto leading souls.
But as the winged thought of Jove,
All lightning-swift, its way quick clove,
He stood where Ether rolls.
"Hie, winged son of Maia, hie,
"Where Vulcan at the forge doth ply,
"And bid him straight to me."
Then soon, full soon, the fire-god came
From Ætna, where, mid noise and flame,
He toiled the live-long day.
With limping pace, and smoke-embrowned,
Hammer in hand, and bonnet crowned,
He trod high heaven's way.
Straight, Jove, the skilful Vulcan, bade
Some gold-hued clay from dross assayed
To mould like Venus fair.
Quick he obeyed; the clay doth glow
With all the beauty man may know,
And all the Gods their gifts bestow,
Persuasive voice, and neck of snow,
The graceful shape and air;
And Mercury, with ready haste,
His left arm twining round her waist,
To Epimetheus bore.
Why need I tell her victory?
How his heart owned her witchery,
Despite his brother's warning,
And how she roamed his palace through,
Still finding something strange and new,
And every place adorning,—
Until one day she saw the jar,
'Mongst men renowned near and far,
Each fell disease containing?
This jar she ne'er had seen before,
And still she wondered more and more,
Until, not long refraining,
She raised the lid, and out there flew
So horrid, dire and foul a crew,
Her very blood ran cold.
Each fell disease, whose baleful wing
Despair and death on man doth fling,
Each pestilence from heaven sent,
When nations are in burial blent,
Their wings, with bat-like fold
Loud-flapping, from the jar did rise,
With visage grim, and horrid cries,
And spread through all the air.
Like marble cold Pandora stood,
And deemed that all, or fair or good,
Abandoned her as fitting food
To the fell demons there.

Her heart leaps to her throat in fear,
 Her bright eyes own the blinding tear,
 And shrinks her lovely form.
 But see! what from the jar doth rise,
 With golden hair and laughing eyes,
 And dimpled cheeks that care despise,
 And shape with beauty warm!
 'Tis Hope, bright Hope, all fair and glowing,
 Her wings of heavenly azure showing,
 And spreading to the wind.
 Then fair Pandora, freed from fear,
 And glad of heart, mid sights so drear,
 So sweet a form to find,
 Ran with swift steps to where young Hope
 Her gauze-like wings began to ope,
 And clasped her to her breast;
 And sweetly did Hope nestle there,
 Thus young, and thus divinely fair,
 There evermore to rest.

GRAVE YARDS.

BY CATHARINE COWLES.

So much may be learned of the character of a people, as well as of individuals, by the resting-place of their dead, that I resolved, before I should leave this city of a Southern clime, to visit the place consecrated to the repose of the departed. And who can ever visit a burial-place, where the rank weed, the broken turf, or fallen monument, tells of the neglect or forgetfulness of friends—where no overshadowing foliage nor humble flower is waving over the tomb, to whisper of the undying love of the surviving—without feeling in his heart he would not die among that people?

It was an Autumn twilight; the mellow radiance of a setting sun was thrown over that silent congregation of the dead. Who has not felt, at this hour, the holy influence which penetrates the soul—softens and subdues the feelings, and wafts the thoughts upward to the fountain of peace and love? The groves—the streams—the fields, unite in softer numbers, and send up sweeter notes of praise to the God of nature.

The very turf beneath our feet seem'd bent in silent prayer,
 The trees, to lift their green boughs up, and ask a Father's care;

And tho' the flowers may fade and fall, we mourn them not in vain;

They tell us, that we thus must die, and thus shall live again.

The crystal waters whisper us of never-failing streams,
 Whose living fountains ever glow, where light celestial beams;

That stream of life, whose spirit-isles are never clouded o'er,

But smile, in their undying bloom, along the blissful shore.

The varied tones that sweetly fall upon the listening ear,
 Seem like the echoed notes of praise from yonder blissful sphere—

From angel bands who wake the lyre beneath their radiant bowers,

And wreath for aye their golden harps with amaranthine flowers.

Nature whispers us continually that death not the termination of our existence; and, would we read its pages, earth is one mighty volume whose every line tells us this is not our home—that we must sleep in silence with those who have gone before us. Revelation tells us that the voice of the archangel will one day wake us from the sleep, and summon us to rise from the dust, clothed in immortality. Unnumbered multitudes, of every age and character, are slumbering around me, and I know not whether they acted wisely or unwisely in their part in the great drama of life. Shaded by trees and clustering vines, their's is a sweet resting place; it speaks volumes in favor of the surviving. It is sweet to know that when the cold tomb has received us, we shall not rest forgotten by those whom we have loved and honored; and with whom we have wept and rejoiced on earth; but that those loved ones will twine, with their own hands, the sweet vine around our tombs—will teach the fair flowers to wave over our graves; and will water them from the pure fountain of friendship and affection. How many hopes, and joys, and sorrows, lie buried with the silent sleepers! Here, the sculptured marble tells me that the loved, the honored and the aged have been gathered to their fathers; that although they have passed silently and peacefully away, their memory still lives in the hearts of survivors; and the remembrance of their virtues, like the sweet incense of flowers, lingers long after the heart has ceased to beat. Again it tells me of the youth taken in the sweet spring-time of existence, like a young bough putting forth its green leaves in the beauty and promise of May—of an infant plucked like a bud from its parent stem, to bloom a sweeter flower in a fairer clime. A little removed from these, stands a simple monument of white marble, bearing the inscription "Rest here in peace." It marks the grave of a stranger. He had left a home endeared by a thousand tender recollections, and friends bound to him by the strongest ties of love and friendship, to sleep afar from his kindred-land in the stranger's earth. 'Twas the voice of the stranger that fell on his dying ear; 'twas the hand of the stranger that closed his eye; that bore him to his last resting-place; that reared the monument which marks the place of his repose, and traced the brief inscription "Rest here in peace." Friends of the sleeper, the gentle breeze is sighing a soft, sweet dirge over the low resting-place of your loved and lost one—the stars look nightly down upon his tomb—the green turf is wet with the tears of the night, as they tendering their sympathies to the bereaved. Rest, stranger, until earth's graves yield their treasures up—

"Rest here in peace!" in the grave where thou'rt sleeping
 And sweetly repose in thy vine-covered tomb;
 No mourner's pale form a vigil is keeping;
 Wild flowers shed round thee their sweetest perfume;

lematis droops, the willow is bending kiss the green sod that covers thy breast;
and rose of Summer its perfume is lending,
and the first sigh of Autumn is breathed for thy rest.

and here in peace!" in the dark hour of danger, sight of the loved ones, to thy dim eye, arose;
sweet seems thy sleep, tho' the land of the stranger
th cradle thy form in its dreamless repose.
and fields are around, and the blue skies are free,
where the earth-wearied spirit is chainless and blest.
sleep, till a voice from above shall restore thee thine own kindred hand, in the mansions of rest.

NEW LIGHTS.

*The quickstep march of modern mind
Is leaving common sense behind,
And all the Gods from Pan to Mars,
Now make their trips in rail-road cars.
The Muses—nay, the very Graces
Have paid their fare—for early places;
And sooth to say, their votaries seem
To travel, now-a-days, by steam,
And strain—although the boilers burst,
To be at Bubbleton, the first.
No matter who deserves to win,
The cripple only can get in!
The sure of foot and sound of limb
Must not, of course, compete with him!
So rapid is "improvement" now,
It goes ahead, (no matter how,)
With such a fifty savan-power,
You get to heaven in half an hour,
By merely locomotive preaching—
—On the high pressure plan of teaching:
And by the same in shorter space
May reach, God wot, the other place.
Who now, would think for once of earning,
By labor's toil, the wealth of learning?
Or who propose to go to school
For knowledge—but a fool?
Not even the baby Prince of Wales
Is soft enough to kill the whales,
To light him to his pap—when gas
Is grown in every meadow-grass.
And when was candles of the best
Are from the castor bean-pod prest?

CASTOR OIL CANDLES.

Some friend of the human family at the West—one of your Utilitarian gentlemen, who are constantly upon the qui vive for a chance to extract the "essential oil" of mortal happiness from those meager productions of nature, which seem in their present state to be little better than so many fungi on her fair face—announces the fact that he can manufacture first rate candles from Castor Oil, and local newspapers express a conviction, as clear as the wick of one of the inventor's own fabric, that they are abundantly better than the bay-berry, tallow, wax, or even mutton tallow! We are sorry to see, at the same time, a disposition manifested to ridicule this lubricious patriot. A spirit of satire, instigated no doubt by the spermaceti interest at Nantucket, or by the holders of hog's fat at Cincinnati, has already sprung up, as it is always sure to do when deep discoveries are made known, and great genius develops itself. We care not for others, and shall always make up our own estimate of great men upon our individual responsibility, without stopping to inquire into the opinions of contemporaneous criticism. It would have been a great thing for Galileo if he could have had the benefit of our countenance and encouragement, when the besotted ignoramuses around him voted his philosophy a bore and an imposture. We should have seen at once into his philosophy, and beaten all the boobies out of their opposition to the "new lights." Just so we intend to act on the present occasion. It is our intention to take this Western philosopher and his Castor candles under our special protection, and permit none of the false philosophers to blow them out, till the world blazes into an illumination as bright and as brilliant as the prairie which was set fire to, by a stray spark from the imagination of Mr. Fennimore Cooper.

It will never do to tell us that there is any humbug in this business, or even that it is a mere light- ning-bug. We have more faith, and have better studied the "lights of the age," than to cramp the inventive faculties of Mr. Marsh, the illustrious inventor. We just as much believe that he can make good summer candles from Castor Oil as we believe in a great many other "improvements," ancient as well as modern. The philosopher of Laputa believed he could extract very good sunshine (or moonshine, we really do not recollect which,) from cucumbers; and we have very little doubt he did, though Swift leaves us in the dark as to the final success of that sublime experiment.
We have heard of another gentleman of "an ingenious turn of mind," who proposed to concoct Congressional speeches of "thrilling eloquence" from the "brawler's common-place book;" and of another, who took out a patent for making rainbows from the sediment of a chimney sweeper's tumbler of sour ale. It is understood that an Eastern savan, "located" somewhere among the granite hills of New-Hampshire, has nearly brought to perfection a cheap plan of digging double the quantity of potatoes out of a hill that could ever be coaxed to grow in it; an intelligent operative at Lowell has actually extracted an excellent cough candy from the devil's own turnip; and a gentleman of "great scientific acquirements," in one of the Hoosier towns, has contracted to light the streets with gas obtained from the natural deposits of the village stable. We have even heard it asserted, and we believe it as religiously as we believe in Castor Oil candles, that there is a fellow "down east" who can make first rate quince jelly from a

THE IRISH AVATER.*

I.

Ere the daughter of Brunswick is cold in her grave,
While her ashes still float to their home o'er the tide,
Lo! George the triumphant speeds over the wave
To the long-cherished isle which he loved like his bride.

II.

True, the great of her bright and brief era are gone—
The rainbow-like epoch, where freedom could pause
For a few little years, out of centuries won,
Which betrayed not, or crushed not, or wept not her crown.

III.

True, the chains of the Catholic clank o'er his rags,
The castle still stands and the senate's no more,
And the famine which dwelt on her freedomless crags,
Is extending its steps to her desolate shore.

IV.

To her desolate shore—where the emigrant stands,
For a moment to gaze ere he flies from his hearth:
Tears fall on his chain, though it drops from his hands,
For the dungeon he quits is the place of his birth.

V.

But he comes! the Messiah of Royalty comes;
Like a goodly Leviathan rolled from the waves!
Then receive him, as best such an advent becomes,
With a legion of cooks and an army of slaves.

VI.

He comes in the promise and bloom of threescore,
To perform in the pageant the sovereign's part—
But long live the shamrock which shadows him o'er,
Could the green in his hat be transferred to his heart.

VII.

Could that long withered spot but be verdant again,
And a new spring of noble affections arise—
Then might freedom forgive thee this dance in thy chain,
And this shout of thy slavery which saddens the skies.

VIII.

Is it madness, or meanness, which clings to thee now?
Were he God—as he is but the commonest clay,
With scarce fewer wrinkles than sins on his brow—
Such servile devotion might shame him away.

IX.

Aye, roar in his train! let thine orators lash
Their fanciful spirits to pamper his pride—
Not thus did thy Grattan indignantly flash
His soul o'er the freedom implored and denied.

X.

Ever glorious Grattan! the best of the good!
So simple in heart, so sublime in the rest!
With all which Demosthenes wanted, endued,
And his rival or victor in all he possessed.

XI.

Ere Tully arose in the zenith of Rome,
Though unequalled, preceded, the task was begun—
But Grattan sprung up like a god from the tomb
Of ages, the first, last, the Saviour, the one!

With the skill of an Orpheus to soften the brute;
With the fire of Prometheus to kindle mankind;
Even Tyranny listening, sat melted or mute,
And Corruption sat scotched from the glance of his mind.

* This poem, by Lord Byron, appeared many years since in the New-England Galaxy. It commemorates the visit of George IV. to Ireland, and is stated in the Galaxy to have been given by the author to West, the painter, from whom the correspondent of the Galaxy derived it. It was not contained in any edition of Byron's works that we have seen.—Ed. Mess.

Cape Cod halibut; and we have ourselves seen a philosopher from the same region who was engaged several years in an effort to extract the Prussian blue from a toper's nose—he never succeeded very satisfactorily, we believe, but it would have been all the better for the beauty of the patient's proboscis if he had. One of his neighbors is making experiments which promise better success—having undertaken to furnish the New-Haven astronomers with a new meteor made from a North-Stonington cheese—warranting it not to fall more than three miles from West Rock, and not to have any “skippers in it till Professor Olmstead has analyzed the particles, and settled the precise position in which it first made its appearance in the heavens.” All these things being believed in with the implicit faith professed by ourselves, we should like to know whether there is going to be any doubt on our part as to the authenticity of the candles! Not exactly, we reckon. If the Western gentleman had invented a method of converting Sal Volatile or the effervescence of a beer bottle into wax torch lights, we would have believed in the reality of the discovery with just about as plenary faith as we have now! How, under heaven, could credulity carry its convictions much farther?

There is, however, a more practical view of this subject. The Castor Oil candles will create a new era in literary life. The midnight lucubrations of the magazine writers will answer the double purpose of mental and bodily cathartics. The concocter of “interesting tales,” and the manipulator of “touching verses”—we call him manipulator, because he counts his spondees upon his fingers, and generally miscounts them—almost always “operate” upon the sensibilities of those to whom they administer, by an appeal to his stomach. The use of these medicinal lights will account for the phenomena, and there will be no loss among the doctors hereafter, as to the proper remedy.

There have been a good many cases lately, which would have been more speedily cured if the cause of the calamity had been known. We have seen more than one poet and an indefinite number of novel writers, within a year or two past, who have inoculated a numerous population with an alarming disease, and produced a nausea—a sort of epidemic “milk sickness,” or rather milk-and-water disease, which the regular practitioners could not account for. The public stomach has been subjected to a disturbance, and the popular brain been whirled about by a vertigo, that had well nigh upset the entire body politic. We never could account for it before; but a light has broken in upon us. The poets and the poetasters, the premium tragedy writers and the authorlings in the “penny line,” have been physicking the public, by making up their prescriptions from the light of the Castor Oil Candles.

XIII.

But back to our theme! back to despots and slaves!
Feasts furnished by famine! rejoicings by pain!
True freedom but welcomes, while slavery raves
When a week's Saturnalia has loosened her chain.

XIV.

Let the poor, squalid splendor thy wreck can afford,
(As the bankrupt's profusion his ruin would hide,)
Gild over the palace—Lo! Erin thy lord!
Kiss his foot with thy blessings for blessings denied!

XV.

Or if freedom past hope be extorted at last,
If the idol of brass find his feet are of clay,
Must what terror or policy wring forth be class'd
With what monarchs ne'er give, but as wolves yield their prey!

XVI.

Every brute has his nature; a king's is to reign;
To reign! in that word, see ye ages comprised—
The cause of the curses all annals contain,
From Cæsar the dreaded to George the despised.

XVII.

Wear, Fingal, thy trapping! O'Connell proclaim
His accomplishments! His!! and thy country convince Half an age's contempt was an error of fame,
And that "Hal is the rascaldest, sweetest young prince!"

XVIII.

Will thy yard of blue ribbon, poor Fingal, recall
The fetters from millions of Catholic limbs?
Or has it not bound thee the fastest of all,
The slaves who now hail their betrayer with hymns?

XIX.

Aye, "build him a dwelling!" let each give his mite,
Till, like Babel, the new royal dome has arisen;
Let the beggars and helots their pittance unite,
And a palace bestow for a poor-house and prison.

XX.

Spread—spread for Vitellius the revel repast,
Till the gluttonous monster be stuffed to the gorge!
And the roar of his drunkards proclaim him the last,
The fourth of the fools and oppressors, called George!

XXI.

Let the tables be loaded with feasts till they groan!
Till they groan like thy people, through ages of woe;
Let the wine flow around the old bacchanal's throne,
Like the blood which has flowed, and which has yet to flow.

XXII.

But let not his name be thine idol alone—
On his right hand behold a Sejanus appears!
Thy own Castlereagh! let him still be thine own,
A wretch never named but with curses and jeers,—

XXIII.

Till now, when the isle which should blush for his birth,
Deep, deep, as the gore which he shed on her soil,
Seems proud of the reptile which crawled from her earth,
And for murder repays him with shouts and a smile!

XXIV.

Without one single ray of her genius, without
The fancy, the manhood, the fire of her race—
The miscreant, who well might plunge Erin in doubt
If she ever gave birth to a being so base.

XXV.

If she did—let her long-boasted proverb be hushed,
Which proclaims that from Erin no reptile can spring—
See the cold blooded serpent with venom full flushed,
Still warming its folds in the breast of a king!

XXVI.

Spert, drink, feast and flatter! Oh Erin, how low
Wert thou sunk by misfortune and tyranny, till
Thy welcome of tyrants hath plunged thee below
The depth of thy deep, in a deeper gulph still.

XXVII.

My voice, though but humble, was raised for thy right,
My vote as a freeman's still voted thee free;
This hand, though but feeble, would arm in thy fight,
And this heart, though outworn, hath a throb still for thee!

XXVIII.

Yes, I loved thee and thine, though thou art not my land;
I have known noble hearts and great souls in thy sons;
And I wept with the world o'er the patriot band
Who are gone; but I weep them no longer as once.

XXIX.

For happy are they now reposing afar,
Thy Grattan, thy Curran, thy Sheridan—all
Who, for years, were the chiefs in the eloquent war,
And redeemed, if they have not retarded, thy fall.

XXX.

Yes, happy are they in their cold English graves!
Their shades cannot start at thy shouts of to-day—
Nor the steps of enslavers and chain-kissing slaves,
Be stamped in the turf o'er the fetterless clay.

XXXI.

Till now, I had envied thy sons and thy shore,
Though their virtues were hunted, their liberties fled,
There was something so warm and sublime in the core
Of an Irishman's heart that I envy—thy dead.

XXXII.

Or, if aught in my bosom can quench for an hour
My contempt for a nation so servile, though sure,
Which, though trod like the worm, will not turn upon power,
'Tis the glory of Grattan, and genius of Moore!

CABBAGE.

Cabbage! Many there are, who have never heard of Indian corn, or salsify, egg-plants, okra, artichokes, sweet potatoes, or even of asparagus; but never yet was there one who had not heard of cabbage, or had never eaten it in some shape or other. Beau Brummel had his conceits about it; and much did silly people, for a time, affect to despise it; but this lasted only till he himself grew out of fashion; and then this excellent and nutritious vegetable modestly made its appearance on our table again.

I scarcely know at what period of its curious and eventful history to commence; for it is of great antiquity, and embraces within its infancy and present maturity—(quere, is it in its maturity yet?)—the rise and fall of empires, theories and tastes; with all, and each, it is mixed up, and bears a conspicuous part.

With its merits and virtues I have long been acquainted; so long, and so early, in fact, that it never before struck me to investigate its character. I should as soon have thought of investigating the character of a familiar friend, one that I was in the habit of seeing daily; and, how could it occur to me to inquire about the beginning of a thing, which I knew was never to have an end! But, if I were thus unconscious of my delinquency; careless of the reputation of an esculent that had always filled up so large a gap on my table, and had so often come to my aid when an unexpected guest claimed hospitality; if I went about the world, star-gazing, or wool-gathering, picking up meteoric stones, and giving philosophers nuts to crack, while such a vast cabbagetical field lay unexplored, there was one at least who did not slumber; he did not remain idle or indifferent.

In all my little etymological difficulties,—and a searcher after truth has many,—I only had to say sesame, and a vast store-house, a deep reservoir, an inexhaustible mine, was opened to me, from which I could extract what I would,—iron, silver, gold, and diamonds, just as they were required for present use. In an idle moment, I carelessly inquired about the origin of the word Kale. Good heavens! what a light burst in upon me, what a flood of long forgotten thoughts rushed in, when the answer came. And I have eaten and raised cabbages all my life, thought I, without knowing how large a space it filled in history, politics, religion and literature!

Why did I not recollect, in the earliest sonnet extant,

“That tender bud, which thrust its head,
Up from its mellow, briny bed,
And when in steaming kettle cast,
Came forth to grace the rich repast?”

There too was the battle between the monks, in which cabbage had such peaceful effects—when

The Abbot, with the Sacristan,
Came near them with a smoking pan,
No sooner did the odorous Kale
(The monks were fighting tooth and nail)
Perfume the air, than one and all
Danced round the dish in noisy brawl.

Who has not read of the calumet, the pipe of peace? And do we not all know, that the word is derived from “calimus, a root, which is of the cabbage tribe?” that originally, it was the dried root itself, which was used long before tobacco was known; and that calumet means the bland perfume of the root? Hear what the bard has sung—

“The fragrant calamus the Indians dried;
And when the rival chiefs sat side by side,
Into each pipe the Sachem gravely laid—
The herb of grace, which angry passions staid,
And if the rival warriors smoked in peace,
It was the signal that the war should cease.”

Have we not read of the Calmucs, originally Calimas, or Khalemiks? and is not this derived from the root Calamus? Does not this mean separated, just as the fibres of the dried Calamus are separated, like the tobacco that is cut in shreds—and like the cole-slaw of the table, cut into vermicular tortuosity?—listen to the song of the Calmuc—

“We left Koko-Noor and went off to the west,
Where the Calamus root grows the deepest and best;
There, on old Wolgas’ side, in a salt, sandy bed,
The sea kale luxuriantly raises its head.
So we eat it, and smoke it, and make it our name,
For the Kale and the Calamus root are the same.”

Was not the most bloody sea fight ever known caused by the cupidity of one of the admirals, who wanted to possess himself of forty barrels of sour kroust, which the rival squadron had on board one of its vessels?

“They laid aside the pipe and joke,
And bravely, midst the noise and smoke,
The captain’s stentor voice sung out
Fire away boys, and save the kroust.”

And before crossing the Alps, according to Polybius, did not Hannibal refresh his troops with the abundance of sea Kale, which grew on the borders of the Doria Balta? Thus saith the poet—

“Great Hannibal in military tactics skilled,
In the art of war his valorous soldiers drilled,
And in that art he included wholesome fare
Which, with small cost to Carthage, was both good and rare,
Each soldier had at meals a mess of beef and Kale,
Flanked with a generous flagon of the Ivrean ale.”

Was not Sesostrus nourished by the delicate Broccoli? was not his spirits raised by the warm stomachic, Calamus? did he not plant the Kale and the Calamus wherever he planted an obelisk? and have not the former remained to testify his worth, while the latter has perished?

“All of male kind—so ancient sybils write—
Born on the day Sesostrus saw the light,
Were nursed like him; if he cried out for Kale,
For the same treat each little mouth would wail.
When they to manhood grew, and fought abreast,
Before they scoured their shields or went to rest,
They called for Kale, then having eaten their fill,
They brushed their armor up with right good will.”

I could go on and fill every page in the Messenger with quotations from ancient and modern writers and bards, who have been loud in the praise of Cabbage and all its varieties; but I must content myself with an extract—the answer to the question before mentioned, respecting the origin of our Kale,—knowing that it will not only enlighten my readers, but raise the writer of that extract in their estimation. At some future time, with the permission of this ripe scholar and ingenious critic,—this kind, golden sesame—I will give to the world, his etymology of the word Webster—a difficulty which he has most satisfactorily solved; but to the extract:

“Is not Kale of the same family with the German Kohl, (cabbage,) with which our English terms Cole, Colewort, or cauliflower, are connected?

Cabbage appears to have been a favorite article of food with our northern ancestors; the following may amuse you—

German—Kohl.
Dutch—Kool.

Swedish—Kal. (Kol.)

Danish—Kaal.

Islandic—Kal.

Anglo Saxon—Caul, Cawl, Caol.

Only to think of our orthographical (not to speak of our vegetable) murder in the case of what we call cole-slaw! (Kohl-schlacht—Kool-slag.)

The Dutch say Kail, and the Irish Colis; so that the Celtic race must have brought the Cabbage with them from the parent hive in the remote East, long before our Teutonic forefathers came into Europe.

Our Greek word Kaulos, properly the stem or stalk of a plant, is used to signify Cabbage; and in Latin we have from it, Caulis. The term 'Calamus' belongs to the same family of roots; and the whole brood trace their pedigree from the Sanscrit Kal, to move—shake—wave to and fro."

If, in our rage for novelty, we had neglected the culture of the Cabbage,—that remarkable relique of antiquity and universality,—and thus let the seed run out, how would our hearts smite us, on casting our eye over this honest tribute to its merits and true record of its fame! When a specific nostrum has run its full course, has cured its hundreds and slain its thousands, it gradually sinks into obscurity, to make way for some Phoenix that rises from its ashes. It lies, to all appearance, defunct, until a new nostrum-monger drags it up again under a new name, and puts it to its former use. But the Cabbage which perishes without seed, can never again be revived; for believe me, gentle reader, there is no such law or fact in nature as spontaneous generation. The Cabbage which we now see came from seed, and that seed was the product of a former Cabbage, which in its turn was the result of seed sown in the earth. "The invariableness of antecedents" holds as good with Cabbage heads as with crowned heads.

My offspring reigns—Bluff Harry said,
When I defunct shall be;
And so does mine, said Cabbage head,
When clouds rain over me.

What a brag we make of the potato. An orator of the Emerald Isle calls its juices, "the pabulum, which forms the organic structure of an Irishman;" yet, it is a mere mushroom, compared to the Cabbage. Salsify, which we fondly call the oyster plant, thus decking it with two natures, the animal and vegetable, is but an infant—the child of a twelve-month came in with it. The tomato—the scarlet tomato, known some few seasons back as the love apple, was brought into culinary dietetics during the French Revolution, of which its color is a type. The okra is from the far East, and was taken to the Bermudas by a shipwrecked mariner,

"Who, when the vessel sunk, sprang from the hold, Snatched up a bag of seed, and thought 'twas gold."

But, gentle readers, when I speak of Cabbage, it must not be understood that it is the coarse, strong, far-scented 'perilous stuff,' of which the whole medical faculty bid us beware. It is not that Sanscrit firstling Kal, (which signifies to move,) so stout in the ribs, having veins starting out like whip-cords, and a tough, corrugated skin, such as we see on the Rhinoceros. It is of the Kale, which shoots up its delicate white head, and

"When it comes on the dish, like asparagus strung,
It is cooked in your mouth by the heat of the tongue."

It is of the Colewort, which the good Abbot Boniface cultivated with so much care; and who, loyal as he was to poor 'Mary of Scotland,' preferred to tend the nurslings of his garden, rather than follow the fortunes of the beautiful Queen. "It is a fine dropping morning for the Coleworts," were the last words at parting with the good old man. Hear what the Scotch proverb says—

"Scotch ale and Scotch Kale,
Let the wind blow as it will,
Keep a male stout and hale,
If you let him have his fill."

It is of the Cauliflower and the Broccoli, those white and purple-headed, tender-hearted, and mellow, generous-tempered, nutritious esculents, that I speak; such as the ancient perruquiers imitated when they garnished the head of a judge.

"With Cauliflower wig, in elbow chair,
He sat in state, and made the bumpkins stare,
Not at his wisdom, for he knew no more
Of law or learning, than the wig he wore:
But at that wondrous flower which graced his head,
And on the admiring crowd its pollen shed."

It is of the Savoy Cabbage, boiled tender as marrow, with a perfume, which, to a hungry man, surpasses that of the strawberry. These are my theme: and I would particularly extol, likewise, the Pentonville, that queen of summer Cabbages, which is white and delicate.

"Let it be Cabus, Kopfkohl, or what not,
'Tis the best Cabbage ever boiled in pot."

And lastly, it is of the great Bergen drum-head—the sour-cROUT Cabbage, that I desire to speak, and for which I ask your attention and sympathy. If I have given you the opinions of ancient and modern writers—in poetic numbers, too, which renders it the more interesting and imposing—respecting the merits of Kale, which includes the white Cabbage tribe, it was to prepare you for the particular claims which this great Bergen-op-Zoom has upon the world. In the first place its size surpasses all others—just as that of "A stout Murphy baby, though born in a shanty,

Where feeding and clothing and nursing are scanty,
Exceeds the young Princeling, the heir to the crown,
Who is wrapt in gold tissue and cradled in down."

Didst ever hear of Kohl-Kenny!—It is the boiled Cabbage of yesterday, mashed up to day with potatoes, seasoned with a lump of fresh butter and pepper and salt. This savory mess is either heated in the pot in which it is mashed—oh cook! let thy ladle be delicately clean—or put upon a dish, and baked in the oven. We have to thank the stout-hearted and burly drum-head for this treat. Dost feed on sour-kroust? Behold, then, thy benefactor in this Dutch drum-head. But, alas! is it not with every one as it was with me, before I became sensible of the vast debt of gratitude due to the Brossica? When one eats sour-kroust, does one think sour-kroust?

Dr. Johnson says, that he who drinks beer thinks beer; so he that merely eats sour-kroust, only thinks sour-kroust: and Eheu! as the learned say, what thoughts they are—what waking thoughts and what sleeping thoughts! The waking ones are kroustish, anglice, swinish,—

“ Give me drink—give me drink—for I thirst,
Though already a gallon I’ve swilled,
But I fear, like a cabbage, I’ll burst,
When its vessels with fluid are filled.”

And his sleeping thoughts, what are they?—just listen, for he is talking his dreams out loud;

“ Oh Brandreth, Morrison and Moffit!
Take off this incubus—this heavy Burgomaster.
Open his jaws—let me but this once profit—
And make him swallow you all three—come, faster—faster.”

This is eating sour-kroust, and thinking sour-kroust; but, remember, that it is the kroust made after the fashion of the empirical book-makers; men who never saw it made, and who never ate of it when concocted and dressed by a legitimate German. Hear what a great German poet saith,—and his are the only rules worth following—excuse their length, but they cannot be curtailed;

Germans, who relish sour-kroust,
Which no true patriot is without,
Should, for the honor of the land,
Tell how our people make it—and What is important, let them see
The process of the cookery.

First, take the largest Cabbage heads
Out of the lowest, sunniest beds,
And then, when frosty days set in,
Put them together in the bin.
Now let your barrel be prepared,
All water-tight and nicely aired,
And four weeks ere the Christmas comes
Go down among the Bergen drums;
Cut the stalks close—but mind, I pray,
Don’t sling a single one away;
For when set out in early spring,
Many a mess of sprouts they’ll bring.

Now pick off rotten leaves, and such
As make the heads spread out too much;
And after cutting them in quarters,
Wash them well out in two good waters,
For many a sly and creeping thing,
Will often to the outside cling.
Cut careful out that callous part,
In common parlance called the heart,
And on a table, boards or trough,
Lay them, to drain the water off.

Soon as night comes, call in the men,—
You must not tax a woman then,—
For sour-kroust making is hard work,
And must be finished in a jerk.

The kroust machine is hired out,
And each house takes an hour about,
At seven I hire, to-morrow you
Get it, perhaps, from twelve to two,
And so the neighbors use the power,
For a whole week, from hour to hour.

The cutter has four blades, they lie
Close to each other slantingly.
Two quartered Cabbages are driven
Across these blades, until they’re riven
By one man’s hands, in shreds so small,
That down between the knives they fall.
A tub receives them; there they lie,
Until the man, who’s standing by,
Finds there is quite enough to make
A good deep layer for the brake
Or pounder. Now, the important part
Of sour-kroust making is the art
By which we all avoid the fault
Of too hard pounding—too much salt.
As to the salt—three pints is what
We to a hundred heads allot;
But vulgar minds, who love to drink,
After a sour-kroust dinner—think
A peck of salt will scarcely do,
To saturate the barrel through.

Now when you have a layer in,
Sprinkle salt evenly, but thin;
Then gently pound away, nor stop
Until the layers have reached the top;
Over this stretch a strong white cloth,
Four double, to receive the froth.
Across this put two sticks—which done,
Lay down a heavy, broad, flat stone.
Put a cover upon the head,
Then eat your supper and go to bed.

In a few days the pickle rises,
Which the experienced eye appraises,
(As well by this, as by the smell)
That fermentation goes on well.

On Christmas morn, the good vrow goes,
(She only has to follow her nose,)
Armed with clean hands and earthen pan,
With tub of water in the van.
First she skims off the thick white froth,
Then throws the stone and sticks and cloth
Into the tub—her ready hand,
Drags up the golden treasure—and Fills up the dish, unsparingly,
For hungry folks enough there ’ll be.
And now she nicely washes out
The cloth which lay upon the kroust,
As well as sticks and stones—and then,
She covers up the cask again.
This process she goes through each day
When a kroust dinner comes in play.

Now comes the important part at last,
To insure a genuine, rich repast.
First goes the sour-kroust in the pot,
And in the middle of the lot
A goodly piece of pork appears,
Parboiled the day before. She fears
The mess will be too salt. And now
In go four pounds of beef—I vow
Next comes a tough old cock, and he
Will help to make all savory.

On goes the pot; the water’s in;

To spoil it now would be a sin ;
 Slowly it simmers—near at hand,
 With skimmer, doth the good vrow stand,
 To take the scum off. This well done,
 The cover closely is put on.
 Five hours it slowly boils—if fast,
 'Twill only be a mush at last.
 When nearly done, she on the kroust
 Lays links of sausages about.

Off goes the pot, she laughs and brags
 The tough old cock is boiled to rags ;
 But that she puts aside—the poor
 Will soon be at the kitchen door.

With face like scarlet and with eyes
 As bright as diamonds; up she hies,
 And proudly to the table brings
 A dish that's fit to nourish kings.
 Gods of ambrosia make a rout ;
 But what is that to sour-kroust !

Now I have written out, you see,
 Not only the Kale's pedigree ;
 But traced it on from clime to clime,
 From early to the present time,
 Until at last I've brought it out
 Upon the boards as sour-kroust.

NAVAL SCHOOL.

The subject of a Naval school has been recommended to the attention of Congress by every President since the war. Its importance is daily becoming more obvious—indeed, the necessity of a well regulated plan of education for the Navy officer, is now admitted on all hands. It is a part of the system of economy and reform, which we have labored so diligently to bring about in the Navy. The example set by Harry Bluff, with his 'Lucky-Bag,' has brought us contributions on Naval affairs, from the Commodore down to the Midshipman. Though these offerings, for the most part, have been well written, we have, for reasons we believe in every instance satisfactory to the contributor, declined the publication of many of them. Most of the views contained in the piece below have been already presented in former Nos. of this journal—yet there was evidently no concert nor interchange of sentiment between the writer of those articles, and Commander Powell—the writer of this—which we take pleasure in spreading before our readers. Good reasons for a good work—especially when set forth in an agreeable manner—cannot be repeated too often. We moreover deem the present a propitious time for enforcing what we have already said on the same subject, because of the action which we hope Congress is about to take with regard to Naval reform—[Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.]

Washington City, Feb. 16th, 1840.

TO THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,—

Sir: The officers of the Navy have repeatedly suggested the signal benefits which the government would confer upon the Naval service, and I may add, the country, by affording more extended means of instruction to the Midshipmen of the Navy; nor are the officers ignorant of the efforts repeatedly made by government, though hitherto without much avail, to effect that object. The first annual report of the actual Secretary of the Navy, whilst it shows this fact, points out the radical defect in the existing method, and indicates the remedy.

The public mind has been awakened to the importance of this subject; and that Congress has not been unmindful of it, we have sufficient evidence in the ample pecuniary provision made for the support of a mathematical professor for every sea-going ship in the Naval service. So that it is apparent that neither expense nor anxiety has been spared, in the desire to make the Navy of the United States the most respectable in point of professional education, in the world. The cause which has hitherto defeated this expectation, has arisen from the mode in which the bounty of the government has been applied, and not from want of means or inclination in any quarter; and it is now sought to substitute a more practicable plan, effectually to secure the object.

In the first place, it would be proper to show that the present system does not reach the object in view; and that from the nature of the service, it cannot be made to do so;—and then, to state the plan, which it is proposed to substitute instead.

That the present mode of instruction, by professors of mathematics, does not serve a very useful purpose, we are assured, not only by those who are to be instructed, but by the officers of every other grade, and by some of the very professors themselves, who have tried the system.

It may be well perhaps to state the reasons which have brought them to this conclusion.

A ship of war has no place to spare for a school room, without encroaching upon the space occupied by her crew and armament. The sea duties proper, the artillery and divisional duty, the police of the ship, the constant interruption by the elements at sea, the refitting, boat and harbor duties in port, leave little leisure to any one in active service. Nor are the fatigues and exposure to the weather, and motion of the ship on the unsteady sea, favorable to literary pursuits. A small portion of time, under the most favorable circumstances, can be devoted to study—and that at intervals, from the above causes, fatal to the acquisition of mathematical learning, which demands a steady application. If we should undertake to teach young officers in the army, in the field, mathematics and philosophy, it would furnish a comparison quite just in its application to the navy; for a ship in commission is but an army afloat: and to carry out the illustration, it would be equally profitable to furnish each marching corps with scientific teachers, and the result would be about the same as it is in the sea service.

Nor is this the only evil—the expense without the profit is enough to make us pause. Our Navy is small as yet; still we have professors, in number equal to the scientific corps of any of the great civil and military universities of the old world; soon to be, if we adhere to the existing plan, a body of mathematical instructors equal in number to the ships in our increasing Navy: a condition of things clearly impracticable—nay, a monstrous evil—on a large scale. Our surprise may well be excited when we reflect upon this body of men, constantly enlarging, all ostensibly engaged in teaching a few midshipmen a little elementary mathematics: and that a fifth of this number, by a judicious organization, would instruct them all in the whole range of useful science.

It will be seen that the expense of the present plan is very considerable; and this is of very serious importance, when we consider that it is of so little real utility.

The pay and ration of a professor of mathematics is fixed by law at twelve hundred and seventy-two dollars; which, with incidental expenses,—such as travelling, &c.—may reach, on the average, to fourteen hundred dollars per annum. There are now eighteen of them in service, and some ten or fifteen more will be required to supply all the ships in commission, if the intention of the law be carried out in practice; so that the actual cost of this branch of the Naval service, which now amounts to twenty-five thousand two hundred dollars, may, and will, be increased to nearly double this sum of money! If we add to this the serious inconvenience of crowding into the Naval service this body of civilians, who occupy room in a man-of-war which has no space, save that occupied by the military fixtures and their dependencies, we perceive that we pay dearly for a little mathematics.

It is proposed to substitute a Naval school on shore, to which there will be attached a school ship, conducted by a well organized body of scientific instructors—the whole cost of which, will not be greater than that shown to be actually incurred by the present inefficient method.

The establishment on shore to consist of a superintendent, who will be charged with the government of the school; an instructor in Naval Tactics; and professors of Mathematics, Natural and Experimental Philosophy, the Modern Languages, the science of Hydrographical Engineering, and Drawing—with the necessary assistants in each department. The course of study would be determined at the organization of the school, but it may not be amiss to give an outline of the proposed plan.

One of the small sloops of war, (or one of the rejected exploring ships would answer well,) would be required as a school ship, to be fitted for the purpose, and mounted with sea guns of various calibre. The Midshipmen of the school would compose the crew, stationed and quartered as is customary in the service. Here they would be taught to hand, to reef, to steer, and work a ship, in a seaman-like manner. They would learn to fit and stow, and handle the apparatus of a ship; and the stations, duties and management of sea artillery. Eight or ten months of the year, say from October to June inclusive, would be spent in study within the walls of the institution; after which, they should repair on board the school ship, under the command of the instructor in Naval Tactics, and keep the sea for the remainder of the school year.

The instructor in tactics, during this period, will teach, by practice, the various duties of the seaman and the sea officer. Here the Midshipmen of the Navy will be taught the practice of Nautical Astronomy: to take observations of the Heavenly bodies, and work the reckoning of the ship: to take soundings, to project and execute harbor charts and coast surveys: to row and sail a boat, on the management of which their security and success in after life so frequently depend; and, by the barges of the school ship, the orders and evolutions of fleet-sailing. They will be trained to manly exercises, and invigorated by labor and exposure, be taught endurance under fatigue, and learn the value of the labors, which they, in after life, have to impose on others.

Whilst the school ship is thus employed, each officer will become the able pilot on his native coast, now the terror of our officers, because of our ignorance of its real dangers.

At the expiration of the summer's cruise, the school ship at the wharf will furnish daily occupation to the sections in turn: the rigging, masting, the guns and stores, will each become familiar in themselves to all the corps.

Here will be felt the first pressure of that discipline, which they, in turn, must enforce elsewhere; difficult to acquire, not less difficult to enforce on others;—but without which the wild though bold spirits which compose the personnel of the Navy would defy control. Such would be the uses of the school ship.

Youths when first appointed should be sent directly to the Naval school, and there, amid a well trained and disciplined assemblage of their fellows, receive their first impressions—no small matter to the young seaman. After having passed through the course here, and performed a three years' cruise at sea, they should be examined again, and, if found qualified, promoted. The standard of their qualifications should be, proficiency in the Mathematics; a knowledge of the French tongue; a critical acquaintance with our own language; the most important facts in Natural Philosophy; the principles of Engineering, for nautical purposes—the art of Drawing; a practical knowledge of Seamanship; a practical as well as a theoretical knowledge of the use and management of sea ordnance; and the control, and application of steam machinery to ships. They should be able to handle well, and teach the use of, small arms; and to take care of the men and boats entrusted to their control. They will have been educated to habits of obedience and subordination, and in one uniform mode of discipline, which can alone make a Naval establishment eminently efficient. We shall have provided a class of intelligent Naval Engineers, who can henceforth direct the constructions for nautical purposes, which are now done, as a succession of rude experiments, by men inexperienced in the business: and we can estimate the value of such a corps, by a reference to armies. There is not an officer in the Navy who could construct a Dry-Dock! I need not mention various other constructions—but simply refer to the expenditures upon our Navy-Yards for the last thirty years—when it is unquestionable, that the employment of a few able engineers would have saved the country many millions of money.

Our young officers will then be acquainted with the tools with which they work, as they are not now. There are many who never saw a dozen shot fired; who have rarely handled a musket or a cutlass; and many, very many, who never furled a sail, or tied a reef point, or touched the helm. In short, the education, professionally, of the few youths which compose our Navy, has dwindled to the merest theory. We should then have officers, not only competent, but engaged in making the nice calculations requisite for the arrangement of the nautical ephemeris; and our ships could sail, without awaiting the publications from the English, French or Spanish observatories. In one word, the skill of the thorough-bred seaman would be added to the science of the Mathematician, and the gentleman-like accomplishments which exalt a national character in the eyes of strangers, with over the safety of our commerce, and contribute so much to the honor, peace and prosperity of our country.

The contrast, on the other hand is mortifying. It is rare to see a Midshipman with the elements even of any of the above branches of a Naval education. He is but a child when given to the service of his country, and he has not the means and opportunity of learning. With crude and often vicious notions of discipline and the military obligations, he grows up in ignorance of the responsible labors which he is soon called on to direct.

It is unnecessary to refer to the embarrassments which are felt in all departments of the Naval service, and the obstructions which impede their operations, arising solely from the slender education of the officers, and consequent want of uniformity in their views and conduct.

As to the existing mode of imparting instruction, if it can be called so at all, there is scarcely a difference of opinion as to its value. It is far short of the end proposed by the government, and is sustained at a cost equal to the annual expense of the school proposed as a substitute. The professors pretend to give only a little Mathematics, which, owing to the causes before stated, beyond the control of teacher and student, is received, by a few of the Midshipmen only; and that so scantily as barely to merit the name of instruction. Whereas, were they concentrated on one fixed point, under the guidance of a fifth of the present number of professors, with a proper distribution of the studies, all the young officers of the Navy would be thoroughly instructed in several branches of useful professional knowledge.

If the country intends to rely upon the Navy for defence against aggression from without; to protect its immense and increasing commerce, and preserve those relations of amity with other nations, which take their complexion from the conduct of commanders of our ships and fleets abroad,—the Naval officers must not be suffered to fall behind their rivals of other nations. It is no longer a question whether education (or knowledge) will improve a Navy, and through it, the nation to which it belongs. All other powers are invoking its aid now to obtain power on the high seas—for knowledge is power, even on the ocean. By its agency, the French have made their sea soldiers compete with British seamen on their own element; so that many an anxious eye is turned to the issue of future wars, conducted on an arena, once the monopoly of the latter. The French now add practical instruction to the cultivation of the sciences applicable to navigation; and the English now teach the sciences to their young seamen. It becomes us, therefore, to follow the example of both, which we can no longer neglect without the most fatal consequences—fatal to the honor of the men who have to defend the interests as well as character of the nation. The English, Russians, French, Dutch, and even Spaniards, have their Naval schools.

The employment of steam in Naval warfare in time to come is no longer doubtful; indeed, we cannot see the limits to its utility. Steam ships will henceforth constitute the security of fleets. Knowledge of the steam engine, and the management of this power for warlike purposes, will form one of the most interesting and useful studies at the proposed Naval school.

Of all people in the world, the sea officer most requires the lights of knowledge to guide him in his wanderings; and the government alone, which undertakes the guardianship of his youth, can afford him the means and opportunity. He is received whilst yet a child, and from that moment his time and circumstances are controlled by the Navy office. He has not mastered the first rudiments of education upon which to work for his future intellectual improvement. Exposed to hardships which he knows not how to guard against, his health is often sacrificed; and to temptations, which older and wiser may not encounter with impunity, he is frequently the early victim of his ignorance; and should he reach the responsible station of command, thousands of miles removed beyond the control of his superiors, thrown upon his own slender resources, in daily official intercourse with a strange people and a foreign government, he only feels his power, to lament his inability, and tremble at its exercise. He is then the standard of the respectability of his countrymen, the representative of his country—the guardian of her interests and her honor. If he be equal to the duties of his station, he is indebted to those rare qualities which nature sometimes bestows, and which, with the culture of education, would have shone with tenfold lustre.

The school ship will be an important agent in the instruction of Midshipmen; here they will learn the manipulation of the sailor, which they do not now, on board a ship of war in commission. They would have teachers, when now they have none; they would be instructed in seamanship, and in the care of themselves, instead of being left to learn as they may. They would go to sea for the first time, better seamen than they now return, from a long cruise.

Respectfully,

THE LILY'S LOVE—A FABLE.

Suggested on reading the poem of "The Star and Lily."

BY MRS. ELIZABETH J. EAMES.

Through the depths of a secluded and beautiful valley there ran in ancient times a broad blue stream, clear as crystal, and shining as the fabled mirror in the Hall of the Fairies.

Among the flowers ("for which the poet hath no name,") that grew on the green borders of that stream, there stood, apart from the others, and the fairest of the fair, a snow-white Lily. Not far from her, clad in a splendid robe, that made him the admiration of all flowers, there dwelt a tall, handsome Tulip; while, 'neath a leafy bower, in the midst, the Angel of the Flowers had taken up his abode.

Now the Angel loved all his blooming protégés, but the Tulip and Lily were his especial favorites. These it was his custom to visit every day.

So, early one fine summer morning, just as the sun was rising amid clouds of silver and rosy purple, and while yet the dew thick-gemm'd the grass-blades, the Angel took his way to the Tulip's dwelling.

After a long chat with him, (for flowers could talk in those days, though we doubt whether they improved the privilege to the degree that mortals do now,) the Angel proceeded to visit the fair young Lily. Sure the Lily was not in general a sleepy thing, but on this eventful morning her long satin leaves were closely folded, her head drooped, and her pearly lids hung languid and heavily, as though she had kept vigil.

The Angel was touched and grieved, at this unlooked-for position in his best-beloved child, and he began casting about in his mind for the cause. "Ah!" said he, at length, clearing his perplexed brow, "I have it now. My poor Lily loves her neighbor the Tulip, and she is suffering 'concealment, like a worm, to feed upon her (not damask, gentle reader, but) delicate cheek.' 'The message I bring her this morning will gladden her young heart.'"

So, gently touching her with the tip of his pretty silver wand, he woke her, and whispered in her ear the Tulip's pompous declaration of love.

Never a look or word returned the Lily; but she grew paler than ever, and bowed her slender head lower over the stream that reflected her pure image.

"Why answerest thou not?" asked the Angel; "the Tulip is a lively, sweet-spoken gentleman—he will love thee better than all the flowers; he will be fond and true; he will cherish thee ever; and shield thy form from the stormy tide, the wind, and the cloudy weather. Speak, silent one; dost thou prefer his suit?"

Moved by a strong and sudden impulse, the timid Lily modestly but faintly replied. "Gracious guardian, the gay and stately Tulip would soon weary of a companion like myself; and though he now honors the poor Lily with fine compliments and flattering professions, it would not be long before he would forsake her for a more beautiful love. It is not well to trust to a fickle, fleeting disposition. I have seen the red rose and the brilliant poppy, the humble violet and lowly mignonette alike made glad by the Tulip's changeful smile. And would he be true to the pallid flower, that bends o'er the tranquil stream? O no! the lonely hour and the desolate heart would be the deserted Lily's portion! Dear, indulgent guardian—I pray thee let me remain as I am."

A change came over the spirit of the Angel's dream. "Dost thou love another," he inquired; "tell me the whole truth, fair Lily; where doth he abide?"

"If thou wilt come again at twilight," faltered the Lily, "I will show thee his home."

Alas for the Lily! She had gazed on the glorious star that rose each twilight over the still water, till a subtle pleasure, unknown before, entered her inmost soul, and pervaded her whole being:—till she dreamed of an existence, spiritual and lovely as its own, far removed from this dull earth and its common cares. The face of nature was no longer fair to her, as in days of old; the gushing music of the streamlet had no more a charm for her ear; and the fragrance that breathed from leaf and flower, after the warm summer rain, wafted no perfume to her. It was the bright beauty of that star, which alone constituted her world; and she gazed until she dreamed and believed that he would indeed stoop from his "high estate," to look lovingly on her.

The sun had set 'neath a diadem of burning gold—the sky was now one deep flush of purple, with here and there a violet-tinted cloud reposing in delicate beauty. One single star, large, lustrous and serene, (like a gem of price on the brow of the beautiful,) rested on its high throne. The Angel stood at the Lily's side. "And now for thy lover, sweet Lily."

The Lily lifted her meek blue eye to the deepening Heaven; and with tremulous finger, pointed to the star, whose soft silvery rays shone so wooingly on her lovely face.

Slowly the Angel turned his lifted eye from the star, downward to the Lily. "Unthinking child," he sorrowfully said—"the glittering shrine at which thou kneelest is higher than thou canst reach. Alas for thy simplicity! thou knowest not that a star can be as heartless and inconsistent as a Tulip, or a man. There is not a leaflet on the tree-top, not a drop of evening dew, not a golden sand sparkling on the sea-shore, nor a pearl gleaming in the deep waters, but hath felt the magic influence of his faithless beams! Wait thou till the stormy cloud and the driving rain shall come—the smooth stream is ruffled, and thy frail frame is shaken by the rude night-blast. O! then, fair Lily, he will not come from his far home in the sky to shield and save thee."

Alas, for the too-confiding Lily! she heeded not the warning.

When suddenly the black cloud arose, when the tempest raged, and the wave rose high, she lifted her soft eyes, in the beautiful security of trusting love, to the star. But she looked in vain—his glorious light was shrouded from her presence; and washed by the whelming billow, she sank 'neath the stormy tide! and the Tulip—he flirted as usual with every pretty flower, and the Star—he rose the next eve, to warm, with his faithless beams, another believing Lily!

LITERATURE AND MATRIMONY.

Signonius, a learned and well-known scholar, would not marry, and alleged no inelegant reason,—that Minerva and Venus could not live together.

TO W. C——, M. D.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

Dear to the monarch is his crown,
 Dear to the warrior, his renown,
 And to the minstrel dear the wreath
 That grants him life despite of death;
 But hast not thou, a power—an aim—
 Dearer than King or Bard can claim?
 To bid Pain's quivering lip resume
 Calm Pleasure's smile and Beauty's bloom—
 To turn the sufferer's anguished groan
 To grateful Joy's melodious tone—
 To see, at beck'ning of thy hand,
 The Goddess Health, beside thee stand—
 Mark her, with tints of roses, dye
 The pallid cheek, and light the eye—
 In fetters bind Disease's arm,
 And Azrael of his bolt disarm?
 Thou gain'st the sinner time to pray,
 Ere his lost soul is borne away;
 Thou tread'st, a messenger of peace,
 Where tortures, at thy coming, cease—
 Thy memory linked with Hope's return
 To lips and eyes condemned to mourn—
 Thy name engraven, as in stone,
 Upon the hearts which are thy throne—
 Oh! what the monarch's empty sway—
 The warrior's laurel—poet's bay—
 What all their visionary dreams of bliss,
 To greatness, glory, fame like this?

SOCIAL PROGRESS.*

The great question whether society is advancing, has commanded the attention of thinking minds in every age. From the mass of men, however, such speculations receive little regard. They generally confine their thoughts to the narrow present. They inquire more anxiously what they shall eat, or drink, or wherewithal they shall be clothed, than whether, at some future time, man will attain that high elevation from which his great progenitor fell.

That a sure, though not always observable, progress has marked the history of the race, cannot justly be denied. The past and the present aspects of society unite in affirming it. Though a light once seemed to shine on Grecian and Roman shores, only to go out again in gloom; and though in later times, the intellectual and moral part of man has seemed to struggle with its shackles almost in vain; we firmly believe that it will yet gather up its shattered energies, and stand forth in its early freedom and perfection. Among the evidences of such advance, we cannot fail to notice the fact that reflecting minds of this age are led to mark unusual indications in the developments of Providence, and exclaim one to another—"As yet we are tenants of the valley of shadows; but we live in promise of the dawn. Its twilight is already breaking around us. We feel the fresh air of morning;—we see the steps of day upon the mountain tops."

The author of this address has contemplated the law and means of social progress. He considers that society is progressive; that 'its law is the law of progress—of melioration,'—that the means are 'moral influences acting on the interior condition of man,—on the inward, spiritual character.' The grounds of his confidence in the progress of humanity are derived from the fact, that this has been the natural and prevailing sentiment of all ages; that it is in accordance with the whole experience and history of man, the moral government of God, and the Scriptures of Truth. These several points he illustrates and enforces with singular felicity.

After observing that Christianity has changed the objects and character of wars since the earliest ages, he proceeds to show that the shedding of human blood, though in itself an evil, has been a necessary means of maintaining certain great fundamental principles, which are interwoven with the welfare of the race.

"Take an extreme case: A nation, long abused and trodden down by despotism, suddenly becomes possessed with the idea of its freedom, and rises to reclaim and avenge its violated rights. Millions of hearts beat with a common sentiment of resistance. Every rock is made a rampart; and on every hill, the flag is shaken out to the air, inscribed in letters of fire, RESISTANCE TO TYRANTS IS OBEDIENCE TO GOD!"

Here is a great, a sublime movement; and all that is dear and noble and holy, seems staked upon the issue. Can it prove, in any event, ultimately disastrous to the well-being of mankind? Suppose then the worst possible result. After a desperate struggle, checkered with the various fortunes of war, misfortune clouds the hope of freedom; and defeat, signal—but not ignominious—extinguishes it forever. If any gallant spirits survive the strife, in whom there yet lurks the spirit of rebellion, without the power of resistance, they are chained in dungeons, or hunted into perpetual exile, or immolated on the scaffold. The spirit of the nation is thoroughly subdued; and she either sinks down under a despotism, more absolute and iron-handed than the first; or her wasted territory is parcelled out among neighboring powers, and her very name blotted out from under heaven.

Is this a calamitous result? In itself considered, it is calamitous and mournful; but never yet was a drop of blood wasted, that was shed for freedom; never yet fell a hero in her cause, who did not, like Samson, slay more by his death, than in all his life.

"This struggle, therefore, has not been a dead loss to the world. The liberty of this particular nation is entombed; but a light burns over its grave, strong and quenchless as the sun, which will lighten the nations to freedom through all ages. What she hath sown in tears, she will reap in joy; and though her heroes may rot, unburied, on her battle-fields, yet their avenging ashes, far as the winds can bear them through the world, among all its subjugated nations, will become the precious seed of rebellion and deliverance. This particular experiment has failed; but, taking it in all its connections, civilization and human liberty have suffered no discomfiture. A new and glorious chapter has there been opened in the moral history of man. A mighty sentiment has been developed on the field of carnage,—the sentiment of Liberty;—its worth, its power, its glory. This is the great truth which that nation was born to realize in her sublime and melancholy history. To reproduce it, to give it an imperishable form, and make it glorious in the eyes of men,—this was her mission; and she hath fulfilled it even to the letter. She hath written that truth in her blood, and hung the record out on high. Ere the characters can fade, the eye of history catcheth the inscription; and she transferreth it to her immortal page, to be a witness through all time and to all people, of the value of that freedom, for which a nation wasted its blood and gave up its life."

In considering more particularly the means by which society is to be reclaimed, the lecturer admits that the perfection of the useful arts, intellectual cultivation, political freedom, and systems of law and government, may have great influence; but that they are inefficient of themselves, and only available when made the instruments of a higher and mightier principle. In illustrating the inefficacy of mere forms of government, without virtue and morality, he cites the oft-quoted history of the first French revolution. That it has lost none of its original features by his epitome, will appear in the following vivid passages:

"Henry IV had publicly declared that he held himself amenable to two sovereigns—God and the laws. But the French people began their reform by renouncing allegiance to both. The spirit of resistance was tempered up with no reverence for religion. Not only was it barren of all those sentiments which are the peculiar fruit of Christianity, but it scorned that natural and devout reliance, common even among barbarous nations, upon Him who is the God of battles, and who holds in His hand the destinies of all people. Clubs were formed in every part of the Empire for the propagation of Atheism; and more than twenty thousand persons, including those of the highest literary distinction, were employed, hour by hour, in exterminating all sense of moral obligation, and every sentiment of private and public virtue. They proceeded throughout, upon the principle, that Christianity and republicanism could not subsist together. This frightful doctrine they wrought every where into the national mind; expecting to hold its terrible volcanic power in check, and control it to their purpose, by such devices as a representative convention; skilful operations of finance; a political establishment on the theory of natural right; and more absurd than all, a national oath, to be renewed by all Frenchmen every fourth year of the new calendar, 'to live free or die.' Infatuated men! what virtue did you expect from your 'national oath,' after you had thus extirpated every sentiment and every principle that could give it solemnity or sanction?

"But that nothing might be wanting to make this experiment complete and final, and to show that it was made by the whole nation in its corporate capacity, the government, by a solemn act, renounced its allegiance to Heaven, and established impiety by law. It decreed, that all religious signs, whether in public or in private places, which might serve to remind the people of their ancient faith, should be annihilated. It voted death an eternal sleep. It abolished funerals; and decreed that all deceased persons should be buried like the carcasses of brutes, without ceremony or religious service. It abolished the Sabbath; and gave up all churches and places of worship to plunder. It ordered the Bible to be publicly burnt by the common hangman; and, as if to extirpate the very memory of Scripture history, it instituted a new calendar, in which the divisions of time should be marked by no reference to the Christian era, or to Christian institutions.

"The world stood aghast at such a bold and shameless desecration of every thing pure and venerable, and holy. Men's hearts failed them through fear; and they waited for the event in fixed astonishment, as they wait for the avalanche, or the earthquake. Those who managed the vessel of state had thrown chart and compass overboard, and madly put out on the sea of revolution. They had hailed the rising sun of liberty with joy; but now, that the ocean swelled, and the air darkened, with what terror did they behold his broad blood-red disc, climb a sky black with tempest, and sounding with loud thunders from side to side? It has not been left to us to record the horrors and crimes of that eventful period; when Paris, the seat of art and elegance and fashion, became a great slaughter-house, and the throne and the altar floated away in blood from their foundations;—when one executioner had tired with his horrid work of chopping off human heads, another was called to stand in his place;—and another,—and another. No love was left. Every man was an assassin; and the murderer of to-day, while his hand was yet upon the axe, was marked the victim for to-morrow. And thus the Republic, drunk with blood, vomited forth crime, and staggered on under her load of misery and sin, towards the gulf of military despotism—an abyss dreadful and profound as hell. Anarchy is always impatient for a tyrant : and in a state so fruitful of monsters as France had been, he could not long be waited for. There was a brief and fearful pause ; when lo !—girt about with darkness, and clad in complete steel, a stern and solitary figure,—the offspring and very image of the times, rose on the highest wave of revolution, with the imperial eagle in his hand ! The tribune hailed him as the supreme head of the nation. The senate entreated him to accept the purple. The army followed, and laid the glory of a thousand victories at his feet. The people shouted, Vive l'Empereur Napoleon. and Ilium fuit: the French Republic had been."

After tracing the influence of what he terms "the religious sentiment in man," from the earliest ages of the world, to the time of the reformation, he dwells upon the great changes in public sentiment effected at that period by Christianity. On this point we regret want of space to make extracts. He then portrays, in living colors, the settlement of America by the Puritans, and the principles which gave rise to it, as well as the revolution which succeeded, and concludes thus eloquently :

"The success of the American arms only consummated the work which the Pilgrims had begun ; and all this mighty and prosperous civilization, which, after a little more than two centuries, we behold poured abroad over the continent, from one ocean to the other, is the fruit of that social and civil organization, whose foundations were laid by the Pilgrim fathers, in suffering and in faith."

* * * "But Christianity herself moves in advance of her own civilization, and does not wait the tardy operation of philosophical causes. Conscious of her power over universal man, and that she holds the world's destiny in her hands, she has undertaken, as a specific object, and as her own proper work, the reclamation of all nations,—all the millions of humanity. Possessed by this august idea—an idea infinitely surpassing in the grandeur of its conception, every project of ambition, every dream of universal empire—she has surveyed the enterprize from all its points. She has marked out, with astonishing boldness and precision, her plan of operations ; and moves to its execution with a fixed and steady eye ; with boundless energy and inextinguishable faith. Already, she is in occupation of the seats of power in every division of the globe, and speaks to its swarming multitudes in two hundred languages of the many-tongued earth. In Africa, she has taken up her line of positions, from Cape Palmas to Port Natal ; and in Asia, from Constantinople to Ceylon. She has thrown a belt of moral light, like a galaxy, over either continent. She has touched the iron sceptres of Brahma and Mohammed ; and they crumble from their hands like ashes. She gathers her school on the Acropolis of Athens, and works her printing presses under the shadow of the Pyramids. She has kindled her lights among the islands of the Southern and Pacific oceans ; and the Polynesian cannibal comes running from his native woods, and sits at her feet clothed and in his right mind ; receives her sacrament, and worships at her altars. And wherever she moves over the world, she carries with her all the fruits of that civilization which she has spread over the face of Christendom ;—its liberty and its literature ; its arts and its opinions ; its commerce, agriculture, knowledge and philosophy. Thus she is commingling and assimilating all the races of men ; and by acting at the fountain of all social improvement, on the interior and moral life of man, she is building up a new order of society, and securing it on deep and imperishable foundations. The spirit of Him who said, 'Let there be light,' is moving over the face of the moral chaos ; and it will not return void. It will bring light out of darkness, and order out of confusion. It will summon into being a new world, more beautiful and glorious than that over which angels and the answering stars shouted on the morning of creation ;—a world of harmony and love ; where humanity will hold fellowship with heaven ; in which the spirit of Truth will preside to guide into all truth, and over which it will reign with a serene and holy dominion forever." LEGEND OF THE HAUNTED CASTLE.

Ay ! porque así agitarse el hombre insano !
Y viendo ya á los pies ; ó ciego ! abierto
El sepulcro gozarte :—

On a branch of the Gaudalquiver, which loses itself among the heights of the Sierra Nevada, may be seen to this day, the remains of an old chateau, whose bare and blackened walls frown in grim majesty upon the silver waters, which now mirror only desolation. Thick moss has grown over and obscures the once valued memorials of an almost regal pride and magnificence. A hoary, matted mass of ivy covers, and partially supports, the decaying and crumbling tower which stands on the left side of the castle ; its angle of inclination is so great, that the tottering old ruin seems momentarily on the point of falling, and will inevitably crush in its descent, the gay group of young orange trees, whose glossy leaves and graceful wavings convey to an imaginative mind the idea, that they rejoice in being the only living things which dare to look cheerful in a spot so melancholy and desolate. The prospect is even worse on entering the house. The only furniture of the large, dark and dismal hall, which is ornamented with grotesque carvings of saints and angels, consists of an antique, worm-eaten picture, half fallen from its frame. It is a portrait; and the brilliancy of a few tints, which have bid defiance to time, testifies that the forgotten form of the original was once clothed in gay and costly attire.

Crumbling balustrades and crazy staircases forbid the most inquisitive adventurer to pursue his investigations much farther; and the terror of the superstitious guides,—for there is no heart which does not quail in the vicinity of that terrible ruin,—urges the traveller to leave the bats and reptiles in undisturbed possession of their accustomed haunts.

For myself, I felt a strange and peculiar sentiment of enjoyment in lingering among the scattered and decayed monuments of ancient grandeur. These appear in the magnificent proportions of the buildings and surrounding grounds, though the hand of taste can no longer be discerned amid the desolate chambers of the house, or the gnarled and matted masses, which probably, in former days, ornamented the pleasure-grounds and gardens; their dark and heavy luxuriance now makes the ruin more sombre and forbidding.

The opposite side of the river is equally desolate, although tradition tells us, that, in the palmy days of splendor, when the old 'Castillo de las Torres' was the wonder and admiration of the country from Seville to Grenada, it was rendered scarcely less attractive, by a very lovely but unostentatious villa, whose former site is still pointed out.

These situations are remarkable, as having been, in by-gone times the witnesses of a most terrible domestic tragedy. The minutest particulars relating to it are treasured with care by the oldest of the neighboring peasantry, although they affect a certain air of mystery with regard to them, which caused me to inquire diligently before I arrived at the following particulars.

The Castle de las Torres, as I have said, was once the pride and glory of that portion of the country. Its master, a noble marquis, in spite of hereditary pride, was revered and almost idolized by the peasants, whose descendants describe him as the noblest and most exalted of men, perfect in the graces and accomplishments of a knight and gentleman, handsome, intelligent, brave, and generous to profusion. The lofty old walls which I have described as so startlingly desolate, were accustomed in those days to resound with music and mirth. Gay and gallant cavaliers contended upon the now matted and weed-grown lawn for the supreme beauty of their fair mistresses, whose flashing eyes and merry peals of laughter enlivened the halls, now made slimy and loathsome by the reptiles which creep over them.

The last noble Marquis de las Torres, while still in the state of bachelorship, had so impaired his finances by profuse hospitality and generosity, that he was fain to call to his aid his natural and acquired graces, in order to rescue him from his embarrassments. The reputation of these so won upon the heart of a wealthy and beautiful heiress, the Señora Isabel, whose years of discretion permitted her to dispose of her wealth and charms as she pleased, that he soon found himself a far richer if not a happier man than he had ever been.

The lady, though no longer very young, was still singularly beautiful and fascinating—her manners having attained a perfection of polish, which is rarely or never found in early youth. Her stately step and glorious black eyes were probably as attractive as her vast fortune, to her admiring husband. Her temper, however, was violent, overbearing, and vindictive in the extreme; so much so, that she became the terror as well as the admiration of the country. Many a harsh and cruel deed is recorded of her, though none so shocking and unnatural as the one which follows.

It was soon whispered that her husband, of whom she was intensely jealous, was happier any where than in his stately and sumptuous home. Any domestic contentions however were carefully concealed, and the Marquis always appeared the most devoted of husbands.

Nearly opposite the castle, on the other side of the river, arose the white walls of a less costly but very beautiful residence, whose only occupants were an old man with a maiden sister, and a lovely young grand-daughter. This girl, whom they called Eléna, attained her seventeenth birthday on the eve of the festival of Santa Catarina, which was to be celebrated with great magnificence at the castle. She was very lovely, so much so as to attract the attention of the Marquis's friends as they occasionally caught a glimpse of her graceful form on the front balcony which overhung the river. Many a sportive jest, connected with the fair neighbor, who smiled so sweetly whenever she saw the Marquis, had passed the lips of the guests, and rankled in the heart of the Marchioness. Apparently the Lord of las Torres either despised or neglected these hints, for he continued his frequent visits to the pretty rural villa, and often spoke of its fair and almost unprotected inmate, with the admiration and affection of a fond parent.

On the eve of the festival of Santa Catarina, the young Eléna de Castres sat alone on the moonlit balcony. The song had faltered on her lips, and the strings of her guitar snapt one by one, as she endeavored to elicit their wonted melody. She gazed with tearful eyes on the water, almost beneath her feet, whose unceasing ripples broke the bright moonbeams into a thousand atoms. But neither the beauty of the mirroring water, nor the serenity of the sky, nor the snow-capped chain of the Sierra Nevada losing itself in the distance and darkness, awoke any pleasing sensations in her bosom. She was thinking how very gay the castle would be on the following day, and how gracefully Don Luis de Mendoza would dance the sprightly fandango, and how very cruel her aunt was to consider her too young to go, and she almost seventeen!

A manly footstep broke the stillness. Eléna sprang up, and flew to meet the Marquis with a degree of delight, which his fair lady would have very little approved.

"Oh, I am so thankful to you for coming," said she. "My aunt has said positively I shall not go to the castle to-morrow."

"And wherefore, mi corazoncita? Is she afraid of your meeting the Señor Don Luis there?"

Eléna blushed and answered, "he will be there, and my aunt forbids me to go."

"And you cannot succeed in softening the old lady's feelings towards your handsome young cavalier?"

"Not at all," sighed Eléna, "her heart is like a flint—she calls Don Luis a dissipated boy, and me a silly child."

"Hard, hard indeed," laughed the visiter.

"But in truth," said the young lady, "I believe a little intrigue is all she desires. She cannot bear that I should marry quietly, without at least half a dozen lovers to break their hearts on the occasion, or get up some kind of domestic romance for her amusement."

"The old lady thinks she will live over again her youth in your conquests. Is it not so?"

"It is; she thinks me the image of herself, making due allowance for the degeneracy of the age, and she is continually telling me of her scores of lovers. For myself, I am quite content with one."

"And your grandfather?"

"Oh, he never interferes. He puts implicit faith in the old Spanish proverb, that 'the more a woman's will is thwarted, the better she will be;' and therefore, he leaves matters entirely in my aunt's hands to insure my being brought to perfection."

"And it seems your lover and yourself have determined to take the matter in your own hands, and elope in the confusion of to-morrow's festivities?"

"But there is no hope now, for she said positively that I should not go."

"Well, let me arrange this little affair for you. Suppose you seem to submit quietly to your aunt's decree; I will take care to have her out of the way, by sending for her to the castle in the morning for the ostensible purpose of assisting in the preparations."

At this juncture, although neither perceived it, a dark figure glided noiselessly up the river bank, and stood in a listening attitude behind a group of palmettos, which effectually screened it from view. The demon of jealousy had prompted La Señora Isabel to dog her husband's footsteps, to hear and judge for herself.

"And then," continued the Marquis, "you can come unobserved to the castle in the evening. You had better come masked, for to tell the truth, the Señora is a little tinctured with jealousy, and she is so violent that it would not be altogether prudent to meet her."

"Yes, yes."

"But meet me at the fountain of the Graces, near the western turret, and there shall this fair hand be disposed of, at least to our satisfaction."

"Noble Marquis"—

"Nay, nay, there is no time for acknowledgments—I must hasten home, or my restless Señora may perchance send hither in search of me. Adieu, mi vida. Wear this jewel to distinguish you to-morrow, in case there should be any difficulty;" and placing on her hand a diamond of rare magnificence, he took his leave.

The young girl gazed after him, till he was out of sight; and then, with a heart full of hope, and head crowded with gay fancies, she entered the house.

With very different feelings did the Marchesa wend her way homeward. Her boatmen, who with their little barge lay concealed in the shadow of the bank, were heard afterwards to say, that the appearance of their mistress, as she bared her head to the moonbeams, was that of a beautiful demon. Her eyes glissened like those of a serpent, and her delicately chiselled features assumed the livid rigidity of a corpse. Long cherished doubts had hitherto tortured her mind with jealousy, and the seeming confirmation of her suspicions now goaded her to madness.

Ere she reached the opposite bank of the sparkling river, her dark resolution had been formed. Wrapping the black mantilla around her head, she hastened to her chamber, and there, having secured herself from the intrusion of any living or moving object, save the flickering moonbeams which played upon the floor, and lighted her silver crucifix, she brooded over, and arranged her scheme of vengeance, whose very horror nerved her resolution. "Aye, aye, that fair hand shall indeed be disposed of, to the satisfaction of one whose interference they little dread."

The possibility of her mistake never for a moment entered her imagination. The increasing coldness of the Marquis had long excited her indignation, and she had ever been on the watch to discover its cause,—never for an instant suspecting that her own violent passions had alienated the affection of the husband whom she idolized.

It is exceedingly probable that the lady might have had other causes for her jealousy, than that here narrated; but this is the only one whose remembrance has survived.

The following morning rose bright and clear upon the gilded turrets and crystal fountains which sparkled in the sunbeams as they fell upon the magnificent Castello. The festival of Santa Catarina was to be celebrated with unusual splendor, less in honor of the Saint herself, than of the Knights of Saint Catharine, who were sojourning at the Castle.

Preparations for the religious and military festival were made with all the magnificence customary in an age and nation, where personal prowess was the strongest claim to admiration, and the chief attributes of religion, pride and pomp.

Thus the day wore on until the hour of siesta arrived; when, every one, wearied with the heat and fatigue of the morning, sought rest and repose. Silence prevailed throughout the mansion; the Marchioness again wrapped the mantilla around her stately person, and descended to the boat. The drowsy boatmen, who were following the example of their masters in yielding to the intense heat, were, much to their annoyance, aroused; and again the lady approached the enchanting villa of Las Castres.

She ascended the sloping bank softly, and met no one to interrupt her progress. She entered the house, and without being observed, gained the chamber of Eléna. The room was small, but fitted up with an exquisite degree of taste and neatness, emblematical of the innocence and virgin purity of its occupant. On every side were seen the simple but elegant preparations for the festivities of the evening. The gala dress lay upon the bed, and choicest perfumes were on the table. A wreath of orange-flowers for the hair, and a gold rosary with its sparkling cross were placed on a small marble table near the bed, and even the delicately embroidered slippers were ready for use. The fair mistress of the chamber breathed softly in her quiet and child-like sleep. The lady paused; and, bending over her, contemplated for a while the rare and almost infantile loveliness of the sleeper,—strangely contrasted with the turbulent feelings and violent passions which marred her own magnificent beauty. Apparently pleasant fancies occupied the mind of the unconscious girl, for a smile at that moment half parted the bright rose colored lips—a smile so sweet that it might have softened the heart of her vindictive enemy, had not at that moment a sparkle of light, from a diamond of singular beauty, gleamed upon her sight. She recognized her husband's ring on the delicately beautiful hand which hung so carelessly in its unconscious grace. This steeled her heart, and sealed the fate of her victim. With an unfaltering hand she dropped a portion of the contents of a small vial on the half open lips. This vial contained poison collected from the fangs of the Cobra de Capello. A few minutes only sufficed for it to take effect. The rich red blood quickly retreated from the cheeks, giving place to large black spots—the white bosom heaved violently for a short time, then became perfectly still—and the form of the loveliest maiden of Andalusia rapidly changed to that of a livid and blackened corpse. But the work was not even then completed. Death itself did not satisfy the cruel and vindictive woman. She drew from its silver sheath a sharp stiletto, and without quailing, without even shuddering, she severed the hand from the delicately rounded arm of the unfortunate girl. She then re-arranged the drapery in the most life-like manner possible, drew close the curtains, and withdrew from that dark and deathly chamber, with no other emotions than those of gratified revenge, and triumph. * * * *

Noblemen, bishops, knights, and ladies—the beautiful and the gay—ecclesiastics, and laymen,—the wise and foolish—the young and old, crowded around the extensive tables, which groaned under all the splendor that wealth and taste could heap upon them. The pillars were garlanded with gayest wreaths. Lights flashed around the columns, and along the verandahs, and throughout the trelliced walks. Light everywhere—and jewels of priceless value blazed, and were eclipsed by brighter eyes. Loud peals of laughter and loud and merry jests resounded through the lofty halls. Wine circulated freely, and the songs were repeated with accompaniments of trumpets, drums and fifes—and brave knights loudly proclaimed the beauty of their mistresses, and challenged the world to produce their equals. The ladies stretched forth their swan-like necks, and encouraged their champions with bright smiles and grateful applause. The Marchioness moved conspicuous among all these; for her noble bearing and magnificent beauty, coupled with the grace and affability which won all hearts, had never showed more remarkable than on this memorable evening.

"A gift," proclaimed the heralds, "a gift from La Señora Doña Isabel to her noble lord on his installation as Knight of the holy order of Santa Catarina—a badge to distinguish his person, and a talisman to preserve his courage."

"Methinks your Marquis is a loving lord," said the young Knight Don Luis de Mendoza, "he wears no colors save those of his lady wife, and places his lance in rest for no other beauty."

Every eye was turned on her with admiration, and the Marchesa smiled haughtily.

The page, at that moment, approached his Lord, bearing the gift, supposed to be a scarf embroidered with his lady's hair, or lettered with her name and motto. It was enclosed in a small box of embossed gold, on which was inscribed with precious stones the following motto: "A talisman to stir up the heart of the most noble and valiant the Marquis de las Torres." With a flashing eye, and lip wreathed with smiles, the nobleman prepared to adorn his shield with the gift of his transcendently beautiful wife. He carefully unwrapped fold after fold of the silver tissue, in which it was enclosed—but he turned cold as marble, when a small and exquisitely formed hand, with his well known ring on one of the stiffened fingers, touched his own.

Traditional records are unable to present any definite picture of the tumult which ensued. Lights were extinguished, and tables overthrown in the general confusion—with its cause very few were acquainted, but among these was Don Luis de Mendoza.

A hundred eyes sought the Marchioness, but she was gone. She had disappeared in the confusion, without leaving a trace behind. They sought her throughout the castle, the surrounding grounds, the villa of Las Castres—and there they met with an object which quickened their anxiety. But she was never found. Whether kindred evil spirits guarded her from human vengeance, or whether she found refuge in some of the many subterranean passages with which the castle abounded, cannot be told. They say she has never since been known to hold communication with any mortal agent.

The festivities at the castle were never renewed. Don Luis and the Marquis waited only long enough to cover the bier of the loving and beloved Elena with choicest and fairest flowers—then, choosing for their badges boughs of the yew and cypress, they wended their way to Mount Sinai, to guard the tomb of the saint, to whose order they belonged. Thence they never returned, and the castle was thereafter entirely deserted, for the Marquis was the last of his family, and had there been scores of heirs, none probably would have ventured to take possession of the mansion, which has been considered ever since, as the solitary abode of the dark and terrible lady. There, say the peasants, she drags on an existence prolonged beyond that of mortals, to suffer more than mortal torture—there, her shrieks for mercy, which in the days of her power she never showed, are unheeded, and her repentance is unavailing.

AN IMAGERY OF LIFE.

I love to stand beside the brook,
Beneath the sun's bright beam,
And watch each wave that's borne along
Upon its rushing stream,—

—To see its waters dashing on,
And hear its gentle roar,
And think that thus it leaped and rolled,
An hundred years before.

—It minds me of the stream of life
That rushes swiftly by,
And bearing changes on its breast,
Scarce noted, ere they fly.

—I love to watch the gentle moon,
Tracking its silent way,
It tells of holy innocence,
In every silver ray.

—And I have marked the withered leaf,
As from its stem 'tis shed,
And thought that thus, man's brightest hopes,
Have from his bosom sped,—

—That like that leaf his hopes have been,—
Have budded,—have decayed,—
Have bloomed, until misfortune's blast
Has bid them droop and fade.

—I mark the rapids, leaping by
In seeming angry strife,
And find in each, and all of these,
An imagery of life.

COROLINN: A PERSIAN TALE.

PART II.

CHAPTER V.

There are bubbles that vanish when grasp'd in the hand,
There are rosebuds that wither before they expand,
There are hopes that are blighted when brightest they seem,
And pleasures that fade like the joy of a dream.

Sketches of a Traveller.

The party of fugitives soon entered the defile of which Hamors had spoken, and wound along its rocky bed for a considerable distance without hearing any thing from their pursuers; the pale features of the trembling Corolinn were re-animated by the assurance of her Everington. Suddenly Hamors stopped and listened. All were instantly silent. No one, however, could hear any thing, except the murmur of the trees that overshadowed the deep glen, and the hollow sound of a distant waterfall. Hamors alone, by his countenance, betrayed his alarm. He threw himself from his horse, laid his ear close to the rock, and again listened.

"It is as I feared; we are pursued, and the horsemen are close upon us," said Hamors.

"We know then what we have to do," replied Everington; "I think we can make this pass good against a dozen or more Schirans."

"I am exactly of your opinion," said Hamors; "but not here can we make our defence. If the lady will ride forward, in one hour she will reach the extremity of this narrow valley, within the boundaries of Kerdistan, where she will be sure of a hospitable reception and safety."

"The advice of Hamors must be followed," said Everington to the ladies: "dearest Corolinn, escape if you can; we will join you after we have disposed of these villains."

But it was plain, the strength of the fair girl was unequal to the task enjoined, and the danger to which Everington was exposed had no tendency to tranquilize her spirits. The whole party now hastened onward to the place where the rocks approached so near together as to leave only a space sufficient for one to pass at a time; and as it was evident their pursuers were not far distant, Hamors proposed making a stand at that place, since in the narrow pass numbers could be of little advantage.

Corolinn endeavored to proceed, but a dizzy faintness came over her; and had not Everington, who was watching her disappearance, flown to her aid, she must have fallen to the ground. Everington caught her in his arms, sprinkled some cold water in her face, and while the girl Myrtila hastened to the aid of her mistress, he kissed the pale forehead of the beautiful creature he held in his arms, with a feeling of the tenderest affection.

Placing Corolinn, who had revived, on a mossy rock, which by a turn of the ravine was hid from the path they had travelled, he left her with her attendant, and hastened to Hamors, who had been preparing their arms for the expected conflict. Their position was such as to prevent their pursuers from riding them down, and they had some hope, that, by a vigorous defence, they should be ultimately successful.

Their pistols were loaded and primed, their cimatars were drawn, and in anxious suspense they listened to the rapid and approaching trampling of their pursuers.

It was but a minute, before their foe appeared turning the point of the rocks below them, and they no sooner caught a glimpse of the fugitives than a loud shout announced their gratification, and the certainty of their triumph. Though their horses were covered with sweat and foam, and panting for breath, they halted not a moment; but drawing their sabres, with shouts of praise to Allah, and invoking the aid of the prophet for the destruction of the infidel dog, advanced at a swift gallop and in single file to the assault. Everington and Hamors stood firm with their cocked pistols in their right hands, and their sabres in their left.

"We must block up the road, and they must form the barrier," said Everington to his servant; "you shoot the leader's horse and I will dispose of the rider."

"Fling down your arms, you rebel dog!" shouted the chief who led the squadron.

The only answer given was by the discharge of the pistols of Everington and Hamors, who both fired at the same instant with fatal effect. The noble beast on which the Emir was mounted, made a desperate plunge forward, then partly turned, reared on his hind feet, and while his master's hand relaxed its grasp upon the bridle, both fell lifeless in the narrowest part of the pathway.

The effect was so sudden, and the assault so rapid, that the second individual in pursuit, was unable to check the horse before he was entangled by the fallen one, and ere he could extricate himself, his rider had received a shot through the brain; while clinging with a death-grasp to the reins as he fell, the affrighted steed was instantly trampling him under foot, and by his endeavors to escape, creating still greater confusion in the body behind.

"The curse of the prophet rest on the infidel dogs," cried the second in command, as he threw himself from his horse, and, followed by three or four others, struggled forward to encounter the defenders of the pass, hand to hand.

They at last succeeded in reaching them, but Everington and his servant, who saw the coming storm, were prepared to meet it, and two more of the assailants were soon bleeding at their feet, one by the pistol of Hamors, and the other by the sabre of Everington.

At this instant, Hamors, in endeavoring to push the advantage he had gained, was thrown off his guard, and received a blow from a sabre on his head, which, to appearance, killed him on the spot. Thus encouraged, the assailants pressed forward with loud shouts of "Allah Acbar:" God is mighty; but still Everington maintained his ground, and the boldest of the assailants shrunk back from his death-dealing blows.

At this critical moment a sudden scream from the females reached his ear, which was instantly followed by a shout of exultation from the pass behind him. Turning on his heels, he flew to save his fair Corolinn from this new danger; and as he turned the point of the rock that intervened between them, he encountered a body of the foe. These, while Everington and Hamors were engaged with those in front, had retraced their steps for a few rods down the ravine, then clambering up the precipice by the aid of the mantling shrubbery, had made their way above them, and passing on a kind of projecting ledge, had intended to take them in the rear; when, on gaining the pass, they, to their great surprise, found Corolinn and her attendant alone, and completely within their power.

"Let go that maiden, villain," cried Everington, as he darted upon them like a tiger, and with a single blow severed to the shoulders, the head of the chief who was endeavoring to secure the hands of the terrified Corolinn.

By this time those of the assailants who had been held in check, came up, and those who had seized the girls finding themselves so furiously attacked, letting them go to defend themselves, Everington found himself surrounded by swords, and after a desperate struggle, was knocked down and securely bound.

"O spare him," cried Corolinn, as, forgetting her own danger, she clasped the arm of the individual who appeared to have the command.

"Our orders, sweet runaway," replied the chief, "were to spare him and take him alive, or his brains would have been, before this time, knocked out. After all," continued the officer, "I much doubt whether this Frank will feel much obliged" us for the favor we have shown him, for he has a serious account to settle for the murder of this man; and with the prince, whom Allah preserve, for running away with you, sweet blossom of the mountain."

"Then he is lost!" exclaimed Corolinn; "already lost; there is not the semblance of hope in his case."

"Not in his case, certainly," answered the Emir: "and for you—ah, you know the prince is merciful."

"If your prisoner die, I die with him," said Corolinn firmly; the undaunted courage of her disposition rising, as the danger which threatened Everington grew formidable and unavoidable; "I will never be the slave of Abbas Mirza, nor the minion of his will."

"We will leave these matters to be settled between you and his highness on your return," said the officer.

"Corolinn," said Everington, who had maintained the most inflexible silence, while they were binding him, and scorned to reply to the threats and execrations showered upon him by his captors; "I know my destiny, but I hope I have lived long enough to despise the power of a tyrant; and I shall do so, happy in believing that to the last I have retained the remembrance and love of my dearest Corolinn."

"You see," said the chief, pointing towards the sun, "that it is declining, and our work is but half done; we must now return."

His orders were immediately obeyed. The horses of both parties were secured, and great was the surprise, not only of Everington, but of the pursuers also, when they found that Hamors, whom they had left for dead, had disappeared, and that one of their fleetest horses was no where to be found. This difficulty was however soon removed by their chief, who assured his followers that Eblis had undoubtedly carried off the servant of the infidel, for his presumption in fighting against the faithful, and that the horse would probably be found somewhere down the valley: though this explanation did not prevent his carrying into effect, with increased activity, his directions for an immediate descent of the mountain. Everington was mounted on one of the horses belonging to the party, and Corolinn, who was so fatigued as to be unable to maintain her seat on horseback, was placed behind one of the horsemen, and the whole party were retracing their steps to the plain. The dead were left unburied; and the chief remarked, as he passed them, that they had fallen honorably.

A sort of undefined hope had lingered in the bosom of Everington, that Hamors had escaped, and that he would be able to rouse some of the sturdy mountaineers to their rescue: but they reached the place where they partook of the last slight refreshment in their ascent, without his wished for appearance; and here the sight of a large party of horsemen at the foot of the mountains, among which Everington not only discovered several elephants, but the black standard of Persia, convinced him at once that his hopes were utterly futile and groundless.

CHAPTER VI.

The snake's forked tongue—the dragon's fang,
Shall pierce thy side with many a twang;
The Upas gums shall run through thy veins,
And each torture us'd to increase thy pains;
Then beware, wretch! O, beware of me!
For whithersoever thou may'st flee,
I warn thee now; then stand in fear,
Nor court my young Castilian dear.—Anonymous.

The utmost care and precaution had been taken to prevent the least communication between Everington and Corolinn, during the march; he being placed in the front, and she in the rear of the detachment; but when they reached the plain, as the faithful girl passed him to be placed on the magnificent howdah which was carried by the largest elephant, she placed her white hand to her lips, and said, in tones intended to reach him and none else,

"My word is passed; if you die, Corolinn dies with you."

"Fear nothing, my dear girl," replied the prisoner, who, whatever he might have feared, saw the necessity of keeping up the hopes of Corolinn; "fear nothing, Allah will protect and bless us."

After a hurried march over the plain, night overtook them, and they encamped near the ruins of Persepolis. Closely pinioned and secured as Everington was, he was none the less carefully guarded; and his present situation, added to the prospect before him, did not suffer him to rest. The shrill cry of the hyena and jackall was heard among the ruins, as they prowled about the camp of the intruders on their domains; and from some lone and lofty column, the owl uttered its boding cry, when the twilight enabled it to venture forth in quest of its prey. Bats flitted through the gloom, and, to the feverish imagination of Everington, they seemed like the ghosts of those whose crimes had desolated and depopulated that once glorious place. The desolation with which they were surrounded, agreed but too well with the state of Everington's feelings. For himself, he knew there was nothing to hope; and if he was to be torn from his loved one, but little to fear. But for her, he trembled with horror, when he reflected that the beautiful and high-souled creature must be sacrificed to the brutal passions of a tyrant.

Morning came, and with it the march was resumed; and before noon, Everington found himself fettered, and closed within the walls of Schi-

ras. No sooner had the party, with the fugitives, entered the city, than they were met by a messenger from the prince, who held a short conference with the chief, at the close of which, Everington was taken from the horse, blindfolded, and then, with a file of men on each side, marched a considerable distance, when they suddenly halted for a few moments.

"If I am to die," said Everington, who suspected that preparations for such an event were making, "let me meet death like a man; I shall not shrink when it comes."

"You will know your destination," replied the surly voice of his conductor; and as he spoke the harsh and heavy grating of some massive door on its hinges, told Everington that they were entering some building, though what and where it was impossible to ascertain.

When the door closed behind them, the sudden transition from the hum and bustle of the city, to the total and death-like silence around them, spoke plainly of the thickness of the walls with which they were enclosed. After descending a flight of steps, another door opened, and from the hollow reverberations of the echoes, it appeared they were traversing some subterranean passage. Another flight of steps was succeeded by another space to be traversed, at the extremity of which the third and last door opened.

Everington's hands were now unbound; the irons taken from his feet; the door was partly unclosed; and still blindfolded, he was thrust through it, and the door instantly closed upon him. He tore the turban with which he had been blinded from his head, but impenetrable darkness met his eye; and he heard the harsh grating of the keys, as bolt after bolt was turned upon him.

"I am buried alive," said Everington aloud, and he started at the hollow and unearthly sound of his own voice; he remembered the accounts he had heard of the dungeons of Schiras, where kingly vengeance immured those victims it did not dare openly to immolate.

He called aloud, but was only answered by echoes gloomy as the dungeons that gave them birth. The chilliness and dampness of the air proved that he was far under ground; and the only thing that gave him hope, was, that once he fancied he felt the winnowing of a bat's wing, as it flitted around him in the pitchy darkness, and that, he thought, demonstrated the certainty of some communication with the upper air. He moved a few feet and his hand struck against a wall.

"I will at least know the extent of my dungeon," said Everington, as with his hand upon the wall, which was covered with mould and dampness, he slowly groped his way along.

The distance he traversed proved that it was of considerable extent; but the examination showed also that the door by which he had entered was the only place of ingress or egress to the dungeon. The floor was of stone, but covered with a wet, slimy matter, which convinced Everington that it was sometimes covered with water; and he remembered that once a year, at least, it was said, the dungeons were emptied of their inmates by the overflowing of the Bendemir.

To Everington it was a time of almost inconceivable agony and despair. He was brave, and could have died the death of a soldier without a murmur; but to be shut out from the cheerful light of day—to be buried alive—to die a living death, filled his mind with horror. And Corolinn, his faithful and beautiful Corolinn, where was she?

"God of mercy protect her!" he exclaimed, as, filled with conflicting emotions, he hastily strode across the dungeon—"O, protect and bless her!"

His foot struck against something upon the floor—he stumbled and fell—he turned to examine it—it was a half-wasted skeleton. He moved his hand slowly over it—there was a frightful hissing, and a large serpent crept from beneath the unrotted garments and twined its long scaly folds around his arm. With a scream he tore it from him, and springing to his feet, attempted to fly from the revolting reptile, but struck against the wall of the prison with such violence that he fell, insensible, to the pavement. How long he remained in that situation he knew not, but he was confident that a considerable time must have elapsed. With the sense of existence, a recollection of the horror of his fate came over him, mingled with a death-like depression of his feelings, and a sensation of weakness that convinced him his hours of life would be few, unless he was removed from that place. Placing his hand on the wet floor to raise himself, it rested on something which struggled violently to escape; and the carbuncled back and swollen form showed it to be an overgrown toad, which the heated imagination of Everington pictured as having attained that frightful size by living on the victims which there fell a sacrifice to tyranny.

"Not yet," said he, as he started to his feet, "am I willing to become a prey to such loathsome animals!"

How the time passed away he had no means of knowing, but a painful sensation of hunger and thirst—a sickening faintness which attended the last movement—a confusion of ideas, and debility of body, demonstrated that he had breathed a pestilential air, under the influence of which the power of life could not survive. The inclination to sleep was excessive, but he dared not indulge it, for his sleeping moments were more dreadful than his waking ones, and that dread was not wholly owing to the harassing effect of his imagination. Once when he attempted to sleep, he was suddenly aroused by finding a snake, cold and chilling, ca-endeavoring to force its way beneath the clothing of his body, and coiling its folds around his neck. The instant he was motionless, reptiles of various kinds began to gather around him, and he felt as if they had already marked him for their prey. How gladly would he have welcomed death!

At last, when hope had fled, when he thought that his feelings had been rendered callous by the intensity of suffering, a slight sound in the subterranean regions of his dungeon aroused him from his lethargy. Listening with ears which had been rendered acute by misery, he heard voices, and then footsteps in the passage that led to his dungeon. Again he heard the numerous bolts withdrawn, and at last—joyful sight!—a gleam of light darted through the opening door, and greeted eyes which had so long been deprived of its exhilarating influence. As the door opened a soldier entered, whose countenance manifested much surprise at finding the prisoner living. He held a lamp in his hand, but the vitiated air of the dungeon produced such an effect upon it, that its feeble glimmer penetrated but a few feet into the gloom around him.

"Frank," said the soldier, "you are sent for: let us first put this turban over your eyes."

Everington did not refuse; any fate would have been preferable to a longer residence in that loathsome dungeon. He was again blindfolded, and led out the same way he had entered.

At the moment of emerging into the outer air, the turban accidentally dropped from the eyes of Everington, and he often afterwards declared that he never experienced such a sensation of pure pleasure as he did at that time, when he once more beheld the glorious light of day—again breathed the fresh, pure air; and looked on the bright and beautiful face of nature. It was but a momentary glance, yet he knew he was in the gardens of the prince, for he beheld the gilded minaret of the king's mosque towering above the cypress grove near which it was standing. The turban was instantly replaced, and when it was again taken from his eyes, he was standing before the prince, Abbas Mirza, in the hall of justice. The prince did not deign to notice him, but sat with his eyes fixed, apparently, on the magnificent carpet which covered the divan. Near him, but in a less elevated situation, sat the cadi, or chief-justice of the city, waiting the orders of his superior; and a circle of the officers and guards of the prince, completed the list of persons present. In a large mirror which was suspended against the wall, Everington saw his own figure, and was shocked at the change which had taken place in his appearance;—pale and sallow—his eyes hollow and sunken—his countenance ghastly, and his person covered with the filth of the dungeon—the whole conspired to prove the pestilential and foul condition of the place in which he had been immured.

CHAPTER VII.

——If ever thou has felt
A wish to make me happy—oh! if ever half
Thou vow'd'st, was true; if ever innocence
Or virtue charm'd thee; if yet one speck
Of generous sympathy remains, spare, spare the prisoner!
William Tell.

Everington was roused from the contemplation of the persons by whom he was surrounded, and of his own haggard appearance, by a person whose business it was to act the part of public accuser, and who, kneeling before the prince, said—

"Most just and glorious prince, Abbas Mirza, the prisoner awaits your pleasure and your justice."

"He has had a taste of our justice already," replied the prince, with a nod to the cadi, "let him be brought forward."

Everington was then, by the guard, placed immediately in front of the divan, and with silence awaited the charge.

"Frank," said the cadi, (among the Mahometan nations of the East all Europeans are called Franks,) fixing his eyes firmly upon Everington, and stroking his long beard with great complacency, "it is not the habit of the children of the sun to punish offenders without giving them a hearing;—we require you, therefore, to answer such questions, as, by order of his highness the prince, will be proposed to you."

Everington remained motionless.

"Are you acquainted with Corolinn Hermans?"

"I am."

"What was your motive in endeavoring to carry her off, against her will and wishes?"

"It was to add to mine and her happiness."

"You acknowledge that it was your intention to carry her away from the dominions of the prince, whom may Allah preserve! and marry her?"

"I acknowledge it."

"It is enough," said the prince; "the presumptuous infidel stands convicted by his own confession. Proceed to judgment."

The cadi then rose, and, after recapitulating the offence, and mingling his expressions of regret, with praises of the clemency and mercy of the prince, proceeded to condemn him to the punishment of the boat.

"I little imagined," said Everington firmly, and addressing himself to the prince, "that I should ever be under the necessity of submitting to ask a favor of you, but I must request that since I am to die, I may die like a soldier; there are things that a brave man dreads more than death."

"The sentence is irrevocable; and may the curse of Allah light upon me, if it be not fulfilled to the utmost," was the reply of the prince.

At this moment a struggle was heard at the lower part of the hall; and lifting his eyes, Everington saw that it was Corolinn herself, endeavoring to force her way through the crowd that filled the lower end of the hall. There is something, however, in the distress of a beautiful woman, that overcomes the most unfeeling, and subdues the most obdurate; and the commands of the prince to carry her off were unheeded. In the stern frown of the prince, and the dejected countenance of Everington, she read at a glance the fact of his condemnation; and regardless of forms, the lovely creature threw herself on her knees before the prince, and plead for the life of Everington with an earnestness which suspended the hands of the executioners, which were already raised to seize their prey. Her hair was dishevelled and flowing around her snowy neck and bosom—the tears were trickling down her cheeks, as with impassioned eloquence she besought the prince for mercy. But the very loveliness she showed in her distress forbade forgiveness to Everington.

“Fair Corolinn,” said the prince, as he took her hand to raise her up, “ask any boon but the pardon of this rebel, and it shall be cheerfully granted you; but our royal word is passed, and he must die.”

“Then remember that Corolinn dies with him,” said the heroic maiden, starting up and throwing herself into the arms of Everington, who involuntarily clasped her to his heart.

“May Eblis seize them!” cried the prince with indignation, as he saw this proof of her faithfulness and love.

“Tear them asunder,” continued the prince, addressing the guards; “tear them apart, and away with him to his punishment. We, ourselves, will see to this fair maiden.”

Here was a pause of a moment in which no one moved; and fear of the prince seemed forgotten in admiration of the constancy and fortitude of the beautiful girl.

“Slaves!” exclaimed the prince, starting up with fury and striking the hilt of his cimeter, “am I to be thus disregarded! Am I to execute my own commands?”

Dread of consequences to themselves overcame the feelings of compassion in the attendants; Corolinn was torn from the arms of Everington; and while he was led away, surrounded by his guards, the faithful girl was carried senseless to her apartments.

The news that the presumptuous Frank, who had dared to interfere between the prince of Persia and the object of his love, was to receive a merited punishment, was speedily spread throughout the city; and Everington found the streets, through which they were going to pass, filled with spectators, anxious to catch a glimpse of the man destined to such a fate.

When the excitement caused by his mock-trial and his interview with Corolinn had passed away, he had leisure to reflect on the lingering and horrible death to which he was doomed.

The punishment of the boat was one which was reserved for those guilty of offences against the king; although it was allowed on extraordinary cases, or where by torture government wished to extort confessions.

The unfrequency of the punishment added to the horror with which it was viewed by all classes in the Persian empire. During his long residence in Schiras and Ispahan, Everington had never seen but one instance of that kind of punishment. Soon after his arrival at Ispahan, he was walking one afternoon on the banks of the Zenderhend, when his attention was arrested by a large concourse of people; and on coming up to them, Hamors informed him that they were assembled to witness the torture by the boat, of an individual, who, but a few days before, had attempted to assassinate the schah.

It was called the punishment of the boat, from the shape of the engine by which the torture was accomplished.

This resembled two small boats laid together, with holes cut at each end, in one of which was placed his head and the other his feet. The miserable wretch condemned to the boat, was, with his hands and feet securely pinioned, laid on his back in the machine, his neck and feet placed in the notches made to receive them, and then the upper part, which at those places was nicely fitted, so as to prevent the least movement, was put on and securely fastened down.

All that could now be seen was the head and the feet; the former supported by the projection of the machine, the face uppermost and exposed to the burning rays of the scorching sun, and the confined and immovable situation producing the most intense agony. Into the lower part of the machine was poured water, mixed with honey and treacle, with other ingredients, to invite the wasps and flies, with which the country abounded, and which, mingled with the excrements of the body, soon becomes intolerably offensive, and swarming with insects, by which the poor wretch is absolutely devoured alive.

The most tormenting of insects, the oriental sand-fly, which deposits its egg, if undisturbed, beneath the skin, and fills the flesh with worms, is collected in multitudes; and to increase the torment occasioned by these creatures, the body is generally fixed on the margin of some river. To add to the torment, and prolong life as long as practicable, food is furnished in profusion; and if, weary of existence, the wretched creature refuse to eat, sweetened milk is poured down, so that he is unable to make an effectual resistance. But the most intense misery was that felt by the sufferer, when, as was frequently the case, the eye-lids were fastened open, and that most sensitive organ exposed to the direct rays of a mid-day sun without the possibility of closing them. The groans seen by Everington, haunted him for he felt that the fate was the more the agony was frequently protracted tenth or eighth day, when nature bested, and death put a period to his sufferings.

the dreadful punishment Everington bore him.

He already on the banks of the Bende-strament of torture was before him—an strong had collected to witness the fearful scene. The chief ordered the attendants to strip Everington of his outer garments, a command which was at once obeyed. After he had done so, with a presence and firmness of mind which drew murmurs of applause from those around him, he stood in the position assigned him, and was firmly and immovably secured.

may take to escape the tyrant's chains.

William Tell.

He did not instinctively delight in the misery of his creatures; and a disposition to favor was manifested by those who were compelled to execute Everington's executioners. The prince's cruelly required the extremity of torture; his eyes were therefore suffered to remain unobscured, but the usual quantity of milk had been prepared; and before a day had passed, the swarms of wasps and ants, by which he was surrounded, gave him a dreadful idea of what he was yet to suffer. Fully aware of the effect of eating in aggravating and increasing his torments, he determined to refuse at once; but before the third day, hunger overcame his resolutions, and he partook of the food with the rapacity of a starving man.

On the night of the third day, as he lay in death, and in a state of half delirium, he was roused by a soft sweet voice, whispered "Everington."

The voice of Corolinn; and the tide of emotion which her appearance there produced, was beyond his control. True, he could not see her—his face blistered, his eye-lids were, it seemed, burned to crisp, and his ability to distinguish had ceased; still he could not mistake her angel voice—he felt her soft hand touch the hair on his forehead, and pressed her coral lips.

With lips parched by thirst, he could with difficulty articulate: but she listened and heard his faint accents employed in expressions of gratitude and thanks.

"Hope has forsaken me," said Everington; "nothing but the memory of Corolinn could reconcile me to living another moment—Oh this living death!"

"Hush," said the beautiful and affectionate creature; "there is some one approaching us; I must not be seen;" and hastily pressing her lips to his, she retired cautiously to a cluster of mango trees, where she was concealed from notice.

She now saw the figure she had heard, endeavoring carefully to approach Everington. She saw him put his face close to that of Everington, as if to whisper to him; and with intense interest she watched every movement, as he appeared to hold a short conference with the victim. Suddenly he left Everington, and came towards the spot where, like a timid fawn, she was standing; looking as if he was in search of some object. For a moment she hesitated whether it was best to discover herself or fly; but when she heard her name pronounced in a low, deep voice, she hesitated no longer, and was almost overwhelmed with joy when she found the stranger was the faithful Hamors.

"O, for the sake of every thing sacred, save him—O save him," said she, as she took the hand of the servant.

"If it is in the power of man to save him he shall be saved," replied Hamors; "my business this night was to ascertain whether he was living. But tell me, my mistress, are you free to follow him? Are you not bound to the tyrant?"

"No," replied Corolinn; "nor shall I ever be; my purpose is fixed; while Everington lives, I live; when he dies, I will live no longer!"

"Can you be at this place, at this hour, to-morrow night?" inquired Hamors.

"Alas, I cannot tell!" replied Corolinn; "my liberty is at the control of a tyrant—my life is my own."

"As a mark of special favor, Mirza has yielded to my request, to defer my compelled union with him, until the infidel, as he terms my Everington, shall cease to live; and then, he has sworn by Eblis, that even the command of the Prophet shall not induce him to forego it."

"Allah grant that he may be thwarted in his intentions," said Hamors: "but time wears away, and I must be gone. I will only speak one word with my master, and then for the mountain;—be here to-morrow night and you shall be saved."

So saying, Hamors softly returned to the spot where Everington lay, spoke with him a moment, and then disappeared in the gloom that overhung the river and plain.

No sooner was he away, than Corolinn took her stand beside the sufferer.

During the interview, the sentinel, whose duty it was to prevent intercourse with the prisoner through the night, was soundly sleeping on the bank of the river, beneath a thick cluster of flowering acacias, and remained entirely ignorant of what had taken place.

After the re-capture of the fugitives in the mountains, Corolinn, on her return to Schiras, was delivered over to the custody of an old woman, who had orders not to trust her out of her sight, and was assured that she should answer for her charge with her life. For several days she could learn nothing from Everington; and the prince, who daily saw her, refused to communicate any information as to what was his fate, further than that he met with a merited punishment, but was still alive. When however he had been sentenced, Corolinn, as we have already seen, learned the result, and took her resolution.

To succeed, however, it was necessary to appear submissive, as she well knew that to refuse the hand of the prince would only excite him to the use of force, to compel a compliance with his wishes. She therefore begged that the ceremony might be delayed until Everington was no more; resolved that the moment she was assured of his death, she would follow him; and the prince granted her request, using in the meantime every exertion to overcome her attachment to the victim of his revenge.

Corolinn found that the hag, to whom she had been consigned, was excessively fond of wine, and as she had plenty of it at her command, she put some stupifying drugs into it, and during the evening, managed to have her drink what she wished of it. It had the effect desired, and by the time the inhabitants of the palace had sunk to rest, the old woman was beyond being disturbed. With a trembling hand, Corolinn then took from the pocket of the old woman a key which unlocked a private door from the gardens, by which she could leave the city; and unacquainted as she was with the most direct route, hurried, on the wings of affection, towards the spot where one dearer to her than life suffered under the fearful and unmerited punishment we have mentioned.

Terrified least her attendant should awake, Corolinn, after the interview with Everington and Hamors, hastily returned to the place of her confinement, and to her joy found the old woman still insensible. Replacing the keys, she assumed the attitude of repose, where, without suspecting that any thing had been wrong, she was found by her keeper in the morning, after the fumes of the wine had passed.

That day, the prince, as usual, spent most of the time in the company of the fair Circassian, and strove, by every means, to dissipate the repugnance she evidently felt towards him. At length the conversation reverted to Everington.

"My messenger tells me," said the prince, "that the infidel whom Allah abhors, cannot live through another day. I should be sorry that his sufferings were to be so short, were it not for the conditions suspended on his death."

"Sorry," repeated Corolinn; "sorry that an innocent man has by death been mercifully relieved from a living death. Is that the boasted clemency of prince Abbas Mirza?"

"Speak not to me of mercy," said the prince; "when a man, one too who hates all good musalmen, has basely attempted to rob me of a flower, which is to be the light of my harem. There can be no mercy for him; but when you have fulfilled your promises, and on his death, have become mine, perhaps I may forgive his memory; and I can almost forgive him now, when I remember that it was the love of Corolinn that drove him on to ruin."

"Claim not my promises," said Corolinn hastily, "they were never yours."

"No matter by what name or by what means you become mine," replied the prince, "remember if he dies to-day, you are mine to-morrow." So saying, he caught the lovely girl in his arms, and kissing her, retired, repeating as he left her the words, to-morrow, to-morrow!

The lingering moments of the day at last were passed, and the dull shadows of evening came over the plain of Schiras; and though to Corolinn the minutes that intervened between the interview and the hour that was to decide their fate could not have appeared as long as they did to the tormented Everington, yet to her the suspense seemed an age. To him, however, bright hope had returned; and that kept him from sinking under his accumulated misery.

As evening came on, the bowl of wine, drugged deeper than before, was produced; and while the beautiful and anxious Corolinn assumed a cheerfulness she did not feel, a hilarity intended to deceive, she was pleased to find its contents rapidly disappearing before the unsuspecting and delighted attendant.

Before the hour fixed upon arrived, the old woman was as still as death; and with an agitated hand and palpitating heart, by the means she had before used, the maiden again found herself beyond the walls of the city, and near the spot where her presence was so anxiously expected and wished by Everington. But the guard had been changed, and a sentinel more watchful had been appointed to the station. To avoid discovery, Corolinn hid herself in the clustering trees to which she had retired the night before, whence she could have an opportunity of observing all that passed.

CHAPTER IX.

And to avoid the foes' pursuit,
 With spurring put their cattle to't;
 And till all four were out of wind,
 And danger too, ne'er look'd behind.—Hudibras.
 Speed! Malise speed! such cause of haste
 Thine active sinews never brac'd.—Scott.

Corolinn had scarcely taken her place amidst the mango trees, when she heard footsteps near her; and looking, saw that Hamors was there, followed by three or four powerful looking men, who, from their appearance and armor, she at once recognized as Kurds, or natives of the mountains.

"Allah be praised that you are here!" said Hamors in a whisper; "Is the sentinel asleep?"

"He is not," replied Corolinn; you may now see him walking on the bank."

"It would be better for him if he was," said Hamors, "for now he must die. Remain where you are until I come for you." Then speaking a few words in an under tone to his followers, they descended the bank and were soon out of sight beneath the acacias and myrtle, that hung over the banks. Soon, a dark figure was seen to emerge from a cluster of shrubbery, near the sentinel, who stood with his back towards the spot. The twinkle of a star revealed the glittering cimeter, and in a moment the deep and hollow groan showed that the silent but fatal blow had been struck. The others now sprang forward, the dead body was tumbled into the river,—the covering of the boat was, in a few minutes, loosed from its fastenings—and the half insensible Everington delivered from his horrid abode. But his limbs were useless, he was unable to stand or walk, and had not the revolting spectacle he exhibited been covered by the mantle of night, his preservers must have shrunk from the attempt of delivering and keeping him alive. After a speedy ablution in the river, and while the other attendants were putting some garments upon him, Hamors flew to Corolinn.

"He lives," said the faithful servant, as he led her to the spot where the attendants were placing Everington in a litter which he had prepared for that purpose. A moment was allowed to Corolinn to assure Everington that she was to accompany him; and then the party, with Everington borne on the shoulders of the four mountaineers, left the banks of the Bendemir. After following the direction in which they started for a few minutes, Hamors took from a thicket of shrubbery a fine horse, and mounting Corolinn behind him, the whole party proceeded at a rapid rate towards the ruins of Persepolis.

"You must consent to be governed implicitly by me for a short time," said Hamors; and if your residence for a few days is not as you could wish, we hope it will be a prelude to many days of uninterrupted happiness.

"Hamors, any place will be a paradise where I can enjoy liberty, and the company of my Everington," replied Corolinn, in accents of gratitude to her conductor.

In two hours they found themselves amid the ruins. Columns lay scattered around them, and blocked up their path. Leaving their horses, the party plunged deeper into the recess, and while the owl hooted over them, led by Hamors, they fearlessly advanced.

"This strong wind," said Hamors to Corolinn, as she hung upon his arm, "will not pass without contributing to our success, as it will obliterate any footsteps we may have made over the plain."

Suddenly he stopped where the immense pile denoted that some magnificent palace or temple had formerly stood; and removing a large stone slab which required the united efforts of the whole party, a circular opening was discovered, which led to the unknown and unseen regions below. A rope was made fast to a fallen column, and two of the company quickly descended out of sight, leaving Hamors with the other on the surface. A rope was fastened around Everington, and he was speedily lowered into the abyss.

"You must now descend," said Hamors to Corolinn; and it was not without a feeling of horror, that she found herself descending, she knew not where, and in the company of she knew not whom.

No sooner was she in the subterranean apartment than the others descended. Preceded by Hamors, Everington was borne through the several turnings and windings, until they came to a wall, in which was an opening similar to that which they had descended. This was passed, and the light of the lamp showed to Corolinn a number of apartments, connected with each other, gloomy indeed, but apparently dry and comfortable. In one of these, a mattress was placed, upon which Everington, weak and exhausted, was laid; while some wine and provisions were produced for him and the rest of the party. The opening through which they had passed was the only one that could be discovered leading to the subterranean chambers they occupied; and however doubtful the purpose for which they were erected might be, the huge blocks which formed the walls and the covering of these rooms showed that they had been built for eternity. Some pieces of carpeting were brought and spread over the stone floor; and in one of the rooms a number of skins of water and wine, with a variety of fruits and provisions, were pointed out to Corolinn by Hamors. To the inquiry of Corolinn, whether he was going to leave them, he replied he was: ten days from this time I shall come provided with every thing for a successful flight.

So saying, Hamors, with his followers, left the cell, carefully closing the opening through which they had entered.

The time-piece with which Corolinn was furnished, marked the lapse of time; but in every respect time was to them as if it had ceased to exist. From the world they were completely shut out; not a single sound which showed that any other beings were in existence reached them; day and night were unknown; the lamp alone shone its light on the dim walls, and the lovely Corolinn shuddered when she reflected that by the capture or death of Hamors, they might be there immured forever.

The pleasure, however, she took in administering to the wants of Everington—of witnessing the rapid recovery of his strength and sight—in listening to his warm expressions of gratitude and affection—and in indulging the sweet visions of fancy, which his restoration to health, and their escape from bondage and death pointed out, caused the hours to pass rapidly and delightfully away.

Everington, on the third day, with the aid of his amiable nurse was able to rise, and leaning on the beautiful girl, he repeatedly traversed the room with a feeling of satisfaction almost equal to that which would have been felt by the bestowment of a new sense. Blistered as his face and eyelids had been, by long exposure to the sun, the skin came off in large pieces; and while the inflammation in his eyes gradually subsided, he reflected on the good fortune that had prevented his eyelids being fastened open, since, in that case, his eyes, even while life lasted, would have been devoured to their very sockets.

"Everington," said the blushing girl, "you well know that you are all the world now to me."

"And shall I not always be so? May I not always be so?" said Everington with a smile.

"O yes, that I am not afraid to promise," she hastily replied, and hid her blushing face in his bosom, while he gazed on the lovely girl, with a feeling of tenderness and admiration.

The time allotted for the absence of Hamors hasted away. Nothing had occurred to disturb them in their subterranean abode, until the day before Hamors returned, when the howling of the jackall and the shrill cry of the hyena showed not only that their retreat had been discovered by these animals, but also from the cries in various directions, that the earth around them was hollowed out into apartments similar to that they occupied; and once Corolinn was alarmed by one of these prowlers, who, allured by the hope of blood, endeavored to force his way through the opening by which they had entered, but which the vigilant precautions of Hamors had rendered impracticable.

The time which they awaited with so much anxiety at last came. There was a sound of voices in the outer apartment—the blocks of stone which closed the communication between them were removed, and Hamors, accompanied by some of his happy and hardy mountaineers, entered the dungeon. Their joy at meeting was mutual, for the unwavering faithfulness of Hamors had endeared him to both Everington and Corolinn.

"We have outwitted the tyrant this time," said Hamors exultingly; "after every exertion which power or ingenuity could devise, he has been completely baffled. The mystery of your escape he has never been able to unravel—the largest rewards have proved ineffectual to discover your retreat, and the pursuit has been given over as hopeless. Once again on the Hetzerdera, and we are safe."

Preparations were immediately commenced for a removal from the retreat which had so long afforded them security and shelter.

Soon they emerged from the subterranean well-like opening, into the upper air; and never with such feelings of emotion had Everington and Corolinn beheld the bright stars as they rolled along through the heavens over spotless azure—gazed on the silver tips of Diana's crescent, as it sank behind the mountains—breathed the pure air which was filled with the incense of numberless flowers—or listened to the hum which animated nature sends forth, even in its most quiet and secluded retreat. Hamors led the way through the ruins, and when they emerged from them into the plain, they found themselves at once in the midst of a dozen of the mountaineers, who, with high spirited steeds, ready for them to mount, awaited their arrival. Not a moment was lost in continuing their flight across the plain. Corolinn was mounted on a beautiful Arabian, and Everington felt as if he had commenced a new existence, when he found himself by her side, and rapidly leaving the crumbling fragments of ancient Persian greatness far behind them.

Long before morning they found themselves among the hills, which marked the commencement of the mountainous region; and when day dawned, they were safe from pursuit amidst its deep and inaccessible fastnesses and defiles. They had left Schiras and the domains of Abbas Mirza forever; and the brave and hospitable children of the mountains welcomed them with patriarchal simplicity and affection to their rude mansions. Notwithstanding the affectionate kindness of Everington, it was impossible for Corolinn at once to break without emotions of regret, the strong ties of affection which bound her to her father; and when she remembered that she had deserted home and friends for a stranger, she felt that she was encountering a fearful hazard; and dear as Everington was to her, he sometimes caught the tear swelling in her dark eye, as these recollections came over her young and innocent bosom.

Skilled in reading the heart, Everington at once perceived the source of her regrets, and sympathizing with her grief, he kissed away her tears, and banished her fears by assurances of never-failing love and protection. Among the kind inhabitants of the mountain, Everington thought it prudent to remain but a short time; for though the country to the west of the Hetzerdera scarcely owned allegiance to the Persian crown, and the brave Kurds still maintained a tacit independence, yet his fears, added to the counsel of Hamors, induced him to place himself and his beautiful Carolinn, as soon as possible, beyond the reach of Abbas Mirza.

As soon, therefore, as Everington found himself completely restored, disguising themselves as much as possible, with Hamors as their servant, he and the fair Carolinn, accompanied by several of the natives of the mountains, proceeded by the circuitous route of the Tigris and Bagdat, to Bussorah; where they arrived without molestation, and in safety. Here Everington found himself in possession of funds, with which he compensated his kind companions from the Hetzerdera, to the extent of their wishes, and laden with every expression of his and Carolinn's gratitude, saw them depart for their native homes. At Bussorah, he found the chaplain of the English establishment at the English Gulf of Persia, and was united by the tenderest of ties to the blushing and beautiful girl, who had consented to unite her fortunes with his. A vessel was on the point of sailing for India, where they arrived, and embracing the favorable moment, and wafted by the propitious monsoon, Everington and Carolinn soon found themselves at Bombay, where the flag of Britain assured him of protection. After residing at Bombay for three years he was called to Calcutta; and as his intimate acquaintance with the Persian language, added to his knowledge of Indian affairs, rendered him a proper person to receive such an appointment, on the recommendation of several officers of the government, he was appointed by the Marquis of Wellesley, then Governor General of India, to the government of Agra, a post of great importance on the upper Ganges, whither he immediately repaired, accompanied by his admired and lovely bride.

CHAPTER X.

"The world is full of beauty. To the eye
Where'er it sends its beautiful orb, is spread
A scene of glories. Earth, air, sky,
Are mark'd with characters which he may read,
Who hath a high attunement of the mind,
A bright perception with the eternal eye,
A glowing likeness in his soul enshrin'd,
Of what is great, and pure, and heavenly."

H. Tappan.

Ten years after the events we have related had transpired, in consequence of some misunderstandings which had arisen between the Indian government and the schah of Persia, it was deemed necessary that some individual qualified for the purpose, should proceed to Teheran, then the residence of the Persian court, to make, if possible, a satisfactory adjustment of the difficulties that threatened to interrupt the harmony of the two governments.

In the opinion of the Marquis of Wellesley, then governor of the immense British possessions in the east, there was no person who would execute this important trust so well as Major General Everington—for to that rank he had risen—and a young lieutenant in the Indian army was selected to convey to him the news of his appointment. To this honorable commission of the general's was added the privilege of visiting England, (a pleasure he had so long wished, but which the disturbed state of the Indian affairs had hitherto rendered inexpedient) after the accomplishment of his commission to Teheran.

It was on a warm afternoon that the bearer of the despatches, Lieutenant McAuly, approached Agra, and entered that once large and opulent city; he proceeded without delay to the mansion of General Everington. A high wall of stone surrounded the extensive pile, and when admitted within the ample portals, none but those who have witnessed the beauty of an Indian pleasure-ground, when in its rich freshness, can have an idea of the enchanting nature of the place. The white blossoms of the pomegranate and the crimson lily of the citron, the clustering richness of the fig trees and the beautiful green of the broad leaved palm—the golden orange and the delicious mango, were all there, and united to form a whole, of which the inhabitant of the frigid north can form but an imperfect estimate. The thicket of acacias, myrtle and roses, which bordered the walks, lent their charms and their fragrance to make the place an earthly paradise. Through the avenues of palm could be seen the broad Ganges, with the blue lotus dancing on its bright waters: the Indian pheasant and the bird of paradise displayed their beautiful plumage on the overhanging branches.

Young McAuly was ushered into a splendid suite of rooms; and on inquiring for General Everington, was told by the servant in waiting that his master was out, but would soon return.

So fascinating, however, were the beauties of nature without, and so delightful was the scenery around, that McAuly was unwilling to exchange them for carpets and mirrors, though of the most splendid kind; and having drank a glass of sherbet, told his servant he would walk until the general returned. Taking his course down one of the walks which led beneath the trees we have mentioned, he followed it through several turnings and windings, until it suddenly opened upon a little green flat, over which hung some huge palm-tree branches; and in the centre of which a fountain threw up its column of pure water, that, falling into a deep marble basin, poured over its margin in a thin and sparkling sheet, to fall into the pebble-covered channel, in which it pursued its murmuring course to the river.

The refreshing coolness of the spot—the dash of the fountain—the beauty of some roses that hung over the margin of the basin, and dipped their petals in the flood, attracted the notice of the young lieutenant, and he was advancing to it, when the sweet tones of a woman's voice, and the lively, laughing prattle of children, arrested his steps. He turned his head, and saw at one side of the flat, under a bower of woven woodbines and wild roses, the general, reclining on a sofa—near him, on another, was a beautiful woman, and before them on the smooth, green turf, two lovely girls were frolicking, in all the unrestrained gaiety of childhood and innocence. The general had been reading a book which he still held in his hand, but he had closed it to witness, with a parent's fondness, the happiness of the charming girls, and enjoy the look of affectionate exultation which he read as his glance met the eyes of his beautiful wife. At that moment the youngest of the girls noticed McAuly, and running to her father, threw her arms around his neck:—

“Pa,” said she in a hurried voice; “an officer has come to meet us; may I go and meet him.”

“Certainly, my dear,” was the reply: and in a moment the little girl had hold of McAuly's arm, and was leading him towards the bower.

As the young European officers in that region, were considered, by the general, as his children, he instantly rose to meet him, and with the graceful ease for which he was distinguished, welcomed McAuly, and introduced him to his affectionate and lovely wife.

McAuly attempted some apology for his intrusion on their retirement, but was cut short by Everington, who assured him that an apology was needless, and that he was never more happy than when he had the pleasure of meeting his European friends. After enjoying the refreshing coolness, and admiring the beauties of the place, for a little while, McAuly followed the general and his charming family to their mansion, where every thing denoted the princely munificence of the owner. Sherbet was cooling in marble basins—the finest and most delicious fruits were handed about in massive burnished plate—the air, cooled by the Ganges, entered windows darkened by the richest silks of Awerpore—and the softened light fell on the most splendid carpets of Ispahan. But not here, as is too often the case, had wealth shut out from its possessors the finer and nobler feelings of the heart. That kindness which had secured to Everington and his beautiful wife the affection of all their dependents—which had caused the oppressed to look to him as the redresser of their wrongs, still retained its ascendancy in their bosoms, and showed its effects in the harmony that pervaded the magic circle of their influence.

The favorable impressions of the young officer were confirmed, and he was soon convinced that he had never seen a woman who so fully realized those beautiful creations of the fancy, the Peris of the Persian mythology.

General Everington accepted, without hesitation, the important trust conferred upon him by government, and with the promptness which distinguished him, had soon completed the necessary preparations for his journey; and with the equipages usually attached to an eastern embassy, was on his way to the Persian court. Corolinn, too, and the two charming girls accompanied him: and the difference between the manner in which they had left the dominions of the schah, and that in which they were returning to it, was not unfrequently the subject of mutual conversation not unmingled with gratitude, between Everington and the fair Corolinn.

Travelling by easy stages—received by the Persian authorities with the deference due to the rank of the individual, and the importance of his errand—and carefully observing the indications of public feeling on the extensive frontier, Everington at last arrived at Teheran. Here he was welcomed by the court, and the differences which had called him hither were soon in a train of amicable adjustment. A series of splendid entertainments were given alternately by the schah and the ambassador, at which the best feelings prevailed, and the reconciliation of the conflicting interests more easily effected. Corolinn was universally admired. The adoption of the European customs gave her an opportunity of oftener appearing with the general in public: and the believers swore by the beard of Ali, that in the person of his wife the infidel Frank was possessed of a gem worthy to be placed in the diadem of the prophet.

In the midst of these rejoicings, news arrived that Abbas Mirza, who had been called from the government of Schiras to conduct the operations of the war which the schah was waging on the northern frontiers of the empire with the Russians, was on his return to Teheran. He arrived, and was received by all ranks with enthusiasm; and by the schah, as a son who had proved himself worthy of succeeding to the throne of Persia. As was the custom, the representatives of the different powers, at the capital sent in their congratulations to the king on the event, accompanied by such presents as they thought proper; and as the influence of the prince was all powerful at the court of his father, Everington determined by the richness and magnificence of his to secure the favorable notice of the prince. He was successful, and as the successive articles were presented and displayed, Abbas requested him to advance to the divan which he occupied immediately below the throne, for the purpose of explaining to him the uses of a mathematical instrument which he had never before seen. As Everington advanced to comply with the request, the keen eye of Abbas was fixed on him, and an indefinable recollection made him start when his eye met that of the general. Concealing his embarrassments, however, he listened to the explanations of Everington with interest; and giving orders for the careful preservation of the instrument, he ordered it to be removed to make way for those presents that remained to be received from others.

The next day an Emir, attached to the train of the prince, presented himself at the palace occupied by Everington, with the information that his highness Prince Abbas Mirza would, if agreeable to the Frank ambassador, pay him a visit that afternoon. Everington, who well knew that this was the greatest condescension the prince could perform, and would be considered by the Persians as the highest honor a foreigner could receive, did not hesitate to signify the pleasure he should receive from the intended honor, and preparations were instantly ordered for his reception.

"My dear Corolinn," said Everington, as he entered the department devoted to the ladies; "Prince Abbas Mirza confers upon us the honor of a visit this afternoon. From some movements of his yesterday, I am inclined to think he remembers me, and I suppose wishes to know whether I have forgotten him."

"Have you accepted the honor?" asked Corolinn.

"Certainly," replied Everington; "I had no wish to refuse."

"Surely there can be no satisfaction in meeting that man," said Corolinn; "and I can hardly believe he comes with any but the worst intentions towards you. I shall be miserable till the interview is past."

"Nonsense, my dear," answered Everington, kissing his wife; "remember that Major General Everington is not the same poor, unprotected Frank he was, when he formerly bore the weight of Mirza's vengeance. Yet," added he, looking tenderly on the beautiful creature, he still held in his arms, "when I remember the cause of his cruelty, I am more than half inclined to forgive him; and cheerfully would I again run the same risk to secure the same prize."

"There is one thing of which I am glad," said Corolinn; "the custom of the court renders it impossible that he should see me here."

"The custom of the court prevents it, but not the custom of the Franks, by which we are governed," said Everington.

The hour fixed upon by the prince arrived, and mounted on his own elephant, which seemed perfectly conscious of the honor conferred upon him by the person he carried, and surrounded by numerous attendants, Abbas Mirza made his appearance.

Alighting from his magnificent howdah, he was received by Everington with all the respect due to the prince of Persia, and conducted to the apartment prepared for his reception.

Coffee was handed round, hookahs were smoked—the conversation was animated, but general; and not an intimation was given by the prince of the particular object of his visit. Still Everington perceived that he was closely watched. He at length requested the general to be seated near him on the divan, and addressed him in Hindostan, a language not understood by the attendants.

"Ever since I saw you yesterday," said the prince, "I have been haunted with the idea that I have seen your face before; if so, it was in connexion with circumstances you cannot have forgotten."

"Your highness is right," replied Everington; "you have seen me before, and there are some events in our lives that can never be forgotten."

"Abbas Mirza knows no deception," said the prince; "if he has done wrong, he trusts by the aid of the prophet to make ample reparation; are you the Frank that a few years since was sentenced to the punishment of the boat at Schiras, and escaped or disappeared in so mysterious a manner?"

"I am," was the reply.

"Praise be to Allah that you lived; I was sensible I wronged you; but you cannot be ignorant of the motives by which I was actuated," said the prince.

"I am not," replied Everington; "and then, as now, the motives almost made me forgive the act, cruel as it was."

"Ah, that young and beautiful Circassian!" exclaimed the prince with animation; "she would have called the prophet to earth, from the seventh heaven. I was distractedly in love with her, and you threw yourself in my very path; is it surprising that I attempted to crush you? Is it not rather surprising that you escaped my vengeance?"

"I did escape, however," said Everington with a smile.

"I know you did; but how, I could never conjecture," replied Abbas; "and I know, too, that the lovely Corolinn disappeared at the same time; I have often thought I would surrender my claim to the crown of Persia to see that beautiful creature again for one hour. One thing, however, that adventure taught me; that power has no effect in winning a woman's love, and that the attempt to confine them by walls is as futile as would prove a barrier to the white winged dove of Cashmere."

"You would not regret her escape if it had been the means of rendering her happy?" said Everington.

"Not now," replied Abbas; "but then I was unused to restraint, and I fancied it was impossible for me to live without her. When I thought of her, I turned with disgust from the fairest beauties of Persia; but the wound my pride had received was nothing to what I felt when I met the look of calm reproach which I read in the eyes of her loved father, for his lips never spoke what I knew he felt."

"Is the worthy Herman then living?" hastily inquired Everington, for his fate was involved in uncertainty; and Hamors, to whom the task of making inquiries had been committed, could only learn that he had not been seen for several years.

"He is not: he survived the loss of his daughter but a few months," was his reply. "But," continued the prince, "I understand you have your wife with you; and if that peri is your bride, and if it is not inconsistent with your ideas of decorum, I would wish to see her again. I owe her a debt I would willingly have discharged in kindness to her father, had he lived to require it."

"Corolinn is my bride," said Everington, and there was a feeling of gratified pride in the acknowledgment; "she can appear if you wish it."

"One thing further," said the prince, "I wish the interview should take place with none to witness it except yourself."

"You can be gratified in that," replied the general, "and you may also name your own time for the interview."

"Let it be now—I am impatient to see her," was the reply of Abbas Mirza.

A wave of Everington's hand was sufficient to clear the room of his attendants, an example which was followed by the prince. Everington then struck a blow on the Chinese gong which hung in the room, and directed the servant who obeyed the summons, to inform his mistress that her presence was requested. The prince remained without speaking until she was announced, when Everington met her; took her hand and led her to the prince, who instantly rose from the divan to meet her.

"By Allah! the same beautiful creature still," said the prince, as if thinking aloud, at the moment he took her hand, and with oriental gallantry knelt as he placed it to his lips.

"You have nothing to fear," said the prince, noticing the slight agitation shown by Corolinn, though scarcely less than was evinced by himself; and requested her to be seated near him on the divan. "The past is indeed remembered," he continued; "but it is I that may beg your forgiveness for acts which even the sincerity of my affections for you could never justify."

"The happiness which Allah had been pleased to bestow upon me since those days, has banished every unkind feeling from my bosom," replied Corolinn, as at the moment she cast a glance of superior affection and pride on her adored Everington.

"The blessings of Allah always rest on the virtuous and the good," said the prince, "and may he continue to do so," added he, as he took Everington's hand and clasped his and the lovely Corolinn's firmly together in his own.

"Have you no children?" asked Abbas, after remaining silent a moment.

"We have," said Everington.

"I must see them; I must know how happy it is possible for Allah to make mortals," said Mirza.

Corolinn left the apartment; and in a few minutes returned with her two beautiful girls, one in each hand.

"You have nothing to ask this side of Paradise," said the prince to Everington, with visible emotion, as he gazed on the lovely children, the picture of their mother; and he drew them tenderly to him and kissed them repeatedly.

"There is but one thing more," said Abbas; and calling an attendant gave him some directions and bid him lose not a moment. In a short time the servant returned and placed in the hands of the prince two caskets of the richest workmanship and materials.

"That casket is yours," said the prince, addressing Everington; "and this one," continued he, taking a key from his pocket, "contains something that I must beg Corolinn and her two daughters to accept."

The lid flew open, and from it he took a turban of the richest materials, one of which was a splendid aggrette of diamonds which he placed on the brow of the fair Circassian; then proceeded to decorate with a carcanet of pearls and gems the snowy necks of the beautiful and delighted girls.

At this moment the voice of the Imaan was heard from a neighboring minaret calling the faithful to prayers; and the prince rose to depart.

"The day is past, but by me it will never be forgotten, for it has relieved me of a heavy burden. I saw you," continued he, addressing Everington, "and your countenance awakened the recollection of other days. I made inquiries, and learned that your wife was with you, and you know the rest. I have seen Corolinn, I know that happiness attends her, and if she is happy, all around her must be so."

Bowing to Corolinn and her daughters, the prince accompanied to the steps by Everington, retired; and, mounting the elephant which seemed sensible that he was a favorite, returned to the palace of the monarch. His visits to the mansion of Everington while he remained at Teheran, were, however, frequent; and his friendly attentions were the source of much pleasure to them all.

After accomplishing the objects of this mission, Everington and his charming family proceeded to Bussorah, on the Persian Gulf, and from thence embarked for Europe. The beautiful Corolinn, in the circles of the metropolis, still found that admiration continued to follow her; but disgusted with the formal heartlessness of society, she sighed for the quiet happiness she had enjoyed at Agra, and her wishes on that point corresponding with those of the general, after a residence of two years in London, they returned to India.

Here, on the banks of the Ganges, they enjoyed all the happiness of which the human mind is capable; and in the smiling countenances and heartfelt blessings they received from the innocent beings who enjoyed their protection, may be read proof demonstrable that virtue is its own reward, and that happiness is diffusible.

LEONORA.

To T. W. WHITE, Esq.

The "Leonora" of Bürger is familiar to most admirers of the Ballad, through the spirited translations of Scott and others. This attempt to render it still more literal, and at the same time to adapt it, without sacrificing the original, to the spirit of our own language, will not, it is believed, prove unacceptable to your readers. It is but proper to remark, that in the present translation no reference has been had to any that have preceded it, several years having elapsed since an opportunity of reading them occurred.

Leonora starts from dreams of woe,

While yet the East is red;

"Ah! William, why so long delay?

Art false to me, or dead?"

With Frederick's force to Prague he'd gone,

Its conflict fierce to share;

Nor tidings sped, to tell, if he

Or well or ill did fare.

And now the Empress and the King,

With war's long toils fatigued,

Inclined their soften'd hearts to peace,

And all, in friendship, leagued;

And either Host, with song of joy,

With trump and kettle-drum,

And all bedeck'd with verdant boughs,

Now sought again their home.

And every where, around, about,

In pathway and on plain,

Throng'd old and young to hail the shout

Of that returning train.

"Now God be prais'd!" cried wife and child;

"Welcome," the joyous bride;

But ah! poor Leonora's tears,

Nor kiss nor greeting dried.

She hurried through the crowded ranks

And ask'd of every name;

But none could tell of him she sought,

Of all who thither came.

The army pass'd, and now with grief

She tore her raven hair,

And threw herself upon the ground,

All frantic with despair.

The mother hasten'd to her side,

And clasp'd her to her breast:—

"God pity thee! thou dearest child,

Why with such woe oppress'd?"

"Oh mother, mother, all is lost,

The world, and all is o'er.

Alas! alas! oh wretched me!

God pities me no more."

"Thy help, oh God! Look mildly down!

My child, put up thy prayer;

What Heav'n ordains is ever best,

Oh God! have pity here."

"Oh mother, mother, idle wish!

Not well hath Heaven done;

What use, what use my fervent prayer,

When now I've need of none."

"Father, thy help! who knows thee, knows

Thou aid'st thy children dear—

The high and holy sacrament

Will dry each gushing tear."

"No sacrament can quench the flame

That withers up my brain,

Nor to the dead can sacrament

Give back their life again?"

"Listen,—what, if in Hungary,

The youth hath falsely sped,

Forgetting all his vows to thee,

And hath another wed?

Tear from thy wounded heart the thought,—

He was no prize for thee;

And when his soul and body part,

He'll rue his treachery."

"Oh mother, mother, all is lost,

Forlorn, ah! most forlorn;—

The dead, the dead alone, I prize;

Why was I ever born?

Out, out my light, forever out!

Aye! quench'd in night and gloom;—

Woe's me! how desolate am I,

God pities not my doom."

"Thy help, oh God! pass judgment not

On this unhappy child!

She knows not what her tongue doth speak;

Heed not her ravings wild!

Oh! child forget thy earthly woes,

And think on bliss divine;

Then shall thy soul a bridal have,

A Heavenly Bridegroom thine!"

"Oh mother! what is bliss divine?

What, mother! torture's spell?

With him, with him is bliss divine;

Without my William, Hell!

Out, out my light, forever out!

Aye! quench'd in night and gloom;—

Nor joy be ever mine on earth,

Nor yet beyond the tomb."

Through every vein thus raged despair,

And madden'd in her brain;—

The wise decrees of Providence

She boldly dared arraign;—

She beat her breast, and wrung her hands

Until the sun was set,

And golden stars came shining forth

On Heaven's coronet.

And hark! without, sounds trap, trap, trap,

As of a horse's hoof;

Clattering alights a rider there,

Beneath the porch's roof,

And clinking soft, the door-ring shakes,

As by a spirit swept;

While through the door these breathing words

In thrilling accents crept—

"Holla, holla! unbar, my girl!

Say love, dost wake or sleep?

And keepest thou thy plighted faith,

And dost thou laugh or weep?"

"Ah, William! thou? so late at night?

Sad, bitter tears I've shed,

And grievous has my anguish been ;—
But tell me, whence hast sped ?”

“ At midnight saddled we,—from far
Bohemia am I come ;
Full late prepared, I hasten’d here
To take thee to our home.”
“ Ah, William ! rest—the whistling wind
Sweeps chilly through the thorn ;
Come to my arms, my heart’s best love,
And rest thee there till morn.”

“ Let the wind whistle through the thorn,
Aye ! let it whistle drear ;
My barb impatient paws the ground,
I dare not linger here.
Come dress thee, haste, behind me up,
My charger mount amain,
We ride a hundred miles to-night
Our bridal couch to gain.”

“ Ah ! wend we then a hundred miles
To reach our bridal bower ?
And hark ! with solemn boom the bell
Is tolling forth the hour.”
“ See here, see there ! the moon shines bright,
Fast speed we and the dead,—
And I have wager’d, ere the morn,
Thou’lt reach the bridal bed.”

“ Now tell me, where’s thy bridal bed,
And what thy bridal hall ?”
“ Six boards by two—far, far from here,
And silent, cold, and small.”
“ Hast room for me ?” “ For thee and me ;
Come spring thee up behind ;
The bridal guests await us, love,
The door we’ll open find.”

The lov’d one donn’d her mantle then
And sprang her up behind,
And round the much-lov’d rider’s form
Her lily arms she twined :—
Then ever onward—on, on, on,
At frightful speed go they ;
That horse and rider snuff the air,
And fire tracks their way.

Upon the right and on the left,
Before their straining eyes,
The thundering bridge, the plain, the heath,
The grassy meadow flies.
“ Dost fear, my love ? the moon shines clear,
Hurra ! the dead do speed :
Dost fear the dead, my love ?” “ Ah ! no ;
But talk not of the dead.”

Why yonder peal the song and clang ?
Why flaps the raven’s wing ?
Hark to the bell, the requiem sounds :—
“ The dead to burial bring.”
And lo ! a ghastly funeral train
Now nearer move along,
And carry bier and coffin there
With harsh and croaking song.

“ With doleful strain, when midnight’s o’er,
Inter ye then the dead ;
Now bear I home my youthful bride,
The nuptial feast is spread :
Come Sexton, with thy choir, come !
And gurgle me the song ;
Come Priest, pronounce the blessing now,
We would to bed ere long.”

Hush’d clang and song—the bier sweeps on,
Obedient to his call,
Clattering behind the horse’s heel
They hurry, hurry all ;
And ever onward—on, on, on,
At frightful speed go they ;
That horse and rider snuff the air,
And fire tracks their way.

How on the right and on the left,
Flew fence, and hedge, and tree—
How village, town, and country place,
On left and right do flee.
“ Dost fear, my love ? the moon shines clear
Hurra ! the dead do speed :
Dost fear the dead, my love ?” “ Ah ! no—
But leave in peace the dead.”

Behold ! behold ! a gibbet there,
And on the racking wheel
Half visible by moonlight’s glint,
The airy rabble reel :—
“ What, rabble ho ! Come on, come on,
And follow as we speed ;
Come, join ye in the festive dance
When we ascend the bed.”

On came that rabble—hush ! hush ! hush !
And rustled on behind,
Like dry leaves on the hazel bush
Shook by the rattling wind.
And ever onward—on, on, on,
At frightful pace go they ;
That horse and rider snuff the air,
And fire tracks their way.

How all beneath the moonbeams flew,
How rush’d in distance far,
Above, below, the clear sky swept,
And sped each glitt’ring star.
“ Dost fear, my love ? the moon shines clear
Hurra ! the dead do speed :
Dost fear the dead, my love ?” “ Ah ! no—
But leave in peace the dead.”

“ Barb ! barb ! methinks the cock doth call,
Our sand is nearly run,—
Barb ! barb ! I scent the morning air,
Hence, barb ! our task is done.
The goal is reach’d—the goal is reach’d—
Prepar’d the bridal bed ;
We near, we near the spot at last,
How swiftly ride the dead !”

Straight draw they to an iron gate,
And give their steed the rein ;
And with a fragile twig scarce touch’d,
Burst bolt and bar in twain.
And ringing, open swings the gate,
And over graves they bound,
And in the moonbeam glimmering now
The tombstones stand around.

Behold ! behold ! an instant pass’d,
Soul-rending scenes amaze—
Like mould’ring tinder, piece by piece.
The rider’s dress decays.
And to a scull, a naked scull,
The horseman’s head doth pass—
His body to a skeleton,
With scythe and hourglass.

High rears the steed and wildly starts,
All flaming seems his breath,
And vanishing in mist away,
His riders sink beneath.

A howl! a howl! in upper air;
 A wailing from below,
 'Twixt life and death, Leonora's heart,
 Scarce throbbing, flutters now.

Now in the moon's glint round and round,
 All dancing hand in hand,
 This solemn chorus gibbering forth,
 Appear'd the spectral band:

"Forbear! although the heart should break,
 Upbraid not God's decree;
 May He have mercy on thy soul!
 From mortal chains thou'rt free."

G. H.

MADAME DE STAEL.

BY MISS JANE T. LOMAX.

"Il y a tant à dire contre une personne telle que moi, et il n'y a qu'une réponse à tout cela, c'est l'esprit et l'âme que j'ai: mais quelle réponse pour la plupart des hommes!"
Corinne.

It is an interesting task, and perhaps not wholly un-instructive one, to scan, with thoughtful gaze, the character and the productions of the great minds, which have passed through the world with bold and upward flight, and worked out for themselves an immortality. The lesson such observation teaches is not useless in the mingled pride and humility it brings; for, while tempting us to glory in the height which genius has attained, it displays how much of littleness still clings around the lofty, to blend with its beauty, and how often the stain of the earth soils the wings which might have soared so radiantly beyond the clouds. It has been said that whatever has a tendency to withdraw our reflections from the common and depressing cares of existence, is a benefit; and, if by dwelling on the characteristics of those to whom we owe pleasant dreamings and higher aspirings, we form one better thought of human nature, or feel one throb of warmer sympathy with its sorrows or its failings, we shall have no reason to regret the idle moralizing, that, in regarding virtues and faults, looks on both, not in criticism, but in kindness. And who, that has glanced around him, en philosophe, and penetrated the lava of action, disclosing the buried world of motive, has not noted, perhaps experienced, the results which such ponderings have left on the mind where they lingered! There are moments in life when trifles give a coloring to all our future; when events, seemingly unimportant, make an era of mental change. The careless reading of some eloquent sentence may open a new source of reflection; the ardently spoken aspirations of a companion may awaken the promptings of our own ambition; or the examination of another's character may arouse our emulation, or become our warning: these are but trifles, yet the impulses and impressions springing up thus lightly, go with us among the excitements of the world, and make us what we are. We feel the effect, while the cause is unknown, or forgotten; the seed, too minute for our notice, has grown into strength, and stretches its branches afar. We can neither recall the origin, nor trace the progress of feeling, but could we penetrate the dim secrets slumbering in the sepulchre of the past, we would discover trifles to be the instigators of our most important deeds, the fountains of those hopes and beliefs and delusions, which make up the sum of human experience. The river, rolling in power, bearing wealth on its tide, or marking its way by wreck and desolation, rose first a mountain stream, unheard in its rippling murmurs, and scarcely heeded in its narrow channel. The material world is full of signs and emblems of the restless world of human intellect; we learn the moral of life in every change around us, and the heart acknowledges a lesson in the destiny of all we have known. As we look up with reverence to the stars, and marvel as we gaze, even thus we may turn with questioning to the lofty minds, that, differing from each other in brilliancy, combine, nevertheless to shed that spiritual star-light which bathes the earth in beauty, and throws a hallowing lustre over the rough realities of our daily paths. The fairy realm of genius is lighted by the radiance of these star-spirits, and Literature is the pearl-speaking magician who interprets for us the mysteries of the dream-world. We never so fully realize the value of its spell, as when it summons before us, the intellectual treasures of the past, or those of a foreign land; it brings to the writer and the reader a two-fold existence; its language is universal; and, with the inspired of old, its followers possess the gifts of "divers tongues." A fondness for transcendental literature has become the "ruling passion" of the age, and has perhaps served to deepen the long existing and wisely founded prejudice against the fictitious productions of French talent. They meet with a comparatively slight portion of the enthusiastic praise so liberally lavished on the creations of German fancy, and even the female novelists of la belle France pass beneath the rod of unmerciful criticism. Vagueness is the idol of the hour; incomprehensibility the rail-road to popularity; truth is veiled in mysticism; reason is dazzled by philosophy, and common sense forsakes the stage, where it would stalk unrecognized—the Great Unknown. There is no name among the authoresses of her own land, whose celebrity has been more widely extended than that of Madame de Staël; and, without being exempt from the imperfections which sully the works of many among the famous authors of France, we discover in hers, less to censure, and more to admire. Her faults, exaggeration of feeling, and a confirmed confidence in her own opinions, amounting almost to prejudice, are those into which a strong and self-relying mind, united to an ardent disposition, would be likely to fall. In her graver compositions where her real sentiments are apparently expressed, without the incumbrance of fiction, there is much which the generous critic would fain pass over in the "charity of silence;" but though there may be found opinions too bitter, and theories too bold, to become a woman's pen, these are decked in a drapery so graceful, we half forget to blame the impulse from which they sprang. Whatever may be their defects, her writings must always stand in favorable contrast with the style of "George Sand," and the too long list of her imitators. There is something too, that excites our sympathy in Madame de Staël's proud struggle for intellectual freedom, her battling with the persecutions, which, whether merited or not, left dark records on the disposition no oppression could subdue, and lingered to shadow and to haunt the heart they had striven in vain to humble. If, in poring over her brilliant pages, the reader sometimes pause to disapprove, he is tempted to condemn the cause, rather than the consequence, and to lament the tyranny which mingled the waters of Marah with a fountain of thoughts so eloquent.

One of the most interesting, certainly the best sustained and most powerfully written, of her productions, is that whose publication was forbidden—her work on Germany. She excels in that philosophizing sort of composition which combines the reflection of the German, with the worldly tact of the French author. Her genius is thoughtful, rather than imaginative, and more successful in depicting scenes and persons as they actually exist, than in portraying them as they might be. Her fictitious characters are too unreal; her loftiest inspiration deserts her at the threshold of fancy. The plots of her novels are generally improbable, sometimes impossible, and her personages, while reasoning most eloquently, frequently act most unreasonably. She had no talent for grasping the life-like in trifles; while seeking to disclose the concealed springs of conduct, she neglected the trivial events, the light-spoken words, which convey more vivid and accurate impressions than many lines of profound portrayal. The features in her portraits are painted from humanity, but they lack the slight touches which give the expression of life. There is always some one delineation on which the writer seems to have lavished peculiar care; some being whose more than ordinary beauty atones for any deficiency in the other actors in the novel. If, in the detail of common occurrences, and the working out of her plots, Madame de Staël sometimes falter, her success in recording the flow of feeling, and the troubled history of the heart's world, has seldom been excelled. It is a rare thing for a woman to fail in depicting the gentler attributes of human nature; she has such deep sympathy with their power, so much knowledge of their influence, and partakes so largely of the rein menschlich, that she has only to recall the traces which experience has written on her own life, and she finds a key to the emotions of others. In the picturing of her own sex in its most intellectual form, Madame de Staël has been particularly fortunate. Perhaps even there, she is too ideal; even Corinne, the high, the gifted, and the beautiful, the "martyr'd saint of lovers," is more of the heroine than the woman, yet so lovely in her dream-like loftiness, we can scarcely wish to lose that beauty in one more earthly. For those, the credulous, who have still a faith in the possibility of broken hearts, and who, like the renowned Sancha, "dote on love stories," few characters of romance possess a deeper interest, than that imparted by Corinne. The mingling of woman's illusions with more than woman's mental strength; the resistance of intellect to the deceptions of affection; the concentration of all thought and mind and feeling, in one unwise, yet most true devotion; and the gradual decline even of genius, beneath the sorrow and the ruin of that sad love, are told with a graphic power, which finds few rivals among the remembered pictures of a passion-worn heart. Madame de Staël never surpassed the grace of that portrait, the glowing delineation of the conflict between a proud and solitary soul, (whose very superiority made it lonely,) with the shackling fears and prejudices of society; the imprudence of doing a war so unequal; the wretchedness of final submission; its grief and its despair; with the ever recurring contrast, in the sufferer's thoughts, of what she was, with what she had been; of the immortality intellect might have won her, and the trial that love had brought. She tells the history of her sex in her own declaration—"de toutes mes facultés, la plus puissante, est celle de souffrir." Well might tears flow even in her triumph hour, and her cheek grow pale when praise was around her in the capitol; well might an ornament on the leaves of that garland, and her brow throb painfully beneath its pressure! Alas! too often the laurel-wreath bathed with the dew of successful tears; and, twined around the poet's life, is the sole green thing that it can boast!

Perhaps no one ever finished the last exquisite pages of Corinne, without a feeling of disappointment, that a character so rarely gifted, whose inspirations were noble, and the moral of whose destiny might have been made so beautiful, should descend from a station but "a little lower than the angels," to become a mere love-sick heroine. The transition is emblematic of the mind which depicted it, and evinces how strangely the lofty and the frivolous mingled in the writer's fancy.

A tone of exaggerated and romantic despondency is a distinguishing trait in French fiction, and one so generally displayed as to give truth to Goethe's remark, that the French is essentially "literature of despair." In our own language, the tragic seems the most popular portion of our position: almost all the imaginative works which create a vivid and endearing impression, are those in which the mournful predominates. Few of the Waverly novels end happily, and among them the saddest are the greatest favorites. We feel a truer interest in the dark career of the Master of Ravenswood, than would be excited by a gayer and more fortunate hero; the gloomy fate of Flora Mac Ivor, her wasted energies and wild self-reproach, haunt us like a troubled dream, when the happiness of Rose Bradwardine has passed from our thoughts; and we never recall Rowena in her pride and love-likeness, with half the enthusiastic sympathy that follows the pathway of Rebecca in her foreign pilgrimage, and mourns the shadowed lot of a being so beautiful. In fiction, as in reality, happiness is too transient to leave a lasting memory; we learn from experience, that the sorrowful, is the true.

"Toutes les grandes pensées, viennent du cœur," was the saying of Vauvenargue; and Madame de Staël is an example of its truth. She is never so eloquent as when she writes from the dictates of ardent feeling, and gives free way to the enthusiasm inseparable from ambitious genius. There were times when the trials of her destiny brought gentler emotions than the bitter ones they were calculated to excite in a spirit too conscious of superiority to be long submissive—when the sadness which gives wisdom was with her, and when, in the fervor of inspiration and the exercise of intellect, she forgot all of grief but its holiness. These softer moods may be traced in the varying tone of her productions, and these were the moments of her highest impulses, when thought was subdued into poetry, the sweeter for its melancholy, and she knew the depth of that calmer suffering which is the foundation of knowledge. "Qui n'a pas souffert, que sait-il ?"

Madame de Staël's dramatic writings are not favorable specimens of her powers. Though unfettered by the restraints of rhyme, they possess the artificial style and stiffness which distinguish French productions of that character; they need the naturalness, the je ne sais quoi of reality. Some German author says that in most dramas there is much which shocks good taste, but that French tragedies are one single and entire shock; a remark which, without being wholly correct, approaches very near to truth. There is certainly something bordering closely on the ludicrous, in the soliloquies of heroes who inform the public of their difficulties and despair, through the medium of heroic measure; and, while about to commit suicide, pause to perpetrate rhyme. It requires all the grace and eloquence of Corneille, or Racine, to preserve the spirit of tragedy, amid such disadvantages. The praise of excelling in various styles of composition can scarcely be ascribed to Madame de Staël; her genius is exclusive, rather than universal. She is loftiest, when, looking on the world with calm, philosophic gaze, she paints life in all its earnestness and sublimity, and scans sadly, yet kindly, the troubled depths of the heart, and reveals the workings of passion, or the sorrows of feeling. The gift of "many-sidedness" is one rarely if ever possessed by a woman. The nature of her existence, in a manner, prevents it; she is apart from excitements of a general character, and, moving in a sphere comparatively contracted, she seldom experiences vivid and permanent interest beyond it. Her inspiration is the consequence of ardent emotion oftener than the result of profound reflection; she dwells among the charms of thought and love, and her genius is brightest and truest, when, with reverence, it draws aside the temple's veil, and teaches us the deep mysteries within our own hearts. The fault of monotony is frequently attributed to the writings of intellectual women; it is one, which, without affectation, they can scarcely avoid. We should not expect the attractions of varied excellence in the compositions of those, whose impressions and associations change but little, whose experience moves in a circle, and whose life is a dream made up of many dreams, a passing scene of illusion, affection, suffering and resignation—voilà tout !

The works of Madame de Staël are not calculated to convey any important or original instruction; for they appeal more to taste and intellect than to the judgment. They seem to have been composed less for universal approval than for self-satisfaction, and are the channel for sentiments too bold and stirring to be still, and for feelings whose deepest enthusiasm found no resting place in the allurements of common life, and no satisfaction in its aims. The desire for celebrity must have been intense, in a mind like hers, where the pride of high and acknowledged endowments was combined with an unusual share of restless vanity; yet her's appears to have been the wish for fame, not the search for it. She wrote much that was likely to render her unpopular, and which a spirit less self-relying would have suppressed; yet with all her faults and prejudices she has won a reputation that will probably be as enduring as it is brilliant.

If her pages leave us no dazzling lesson, they at least lead us to reflect with profounder earnestness on the nature and the destiny of our moral being, and we recall their writer as one who taught us something of that self-knowledge whose end is wisdom. We remember her, when experience realizes and brings back to us some of the striking truisms she scattered so lavishly; the spell of romance which her genius has woven will long linger to bind young hearts with its intellectual beauty.

SONG—THE HAPPY HUSBAND.

BY JAMES ALDRICH.

No longer seek in me to find
The fire of youth's spring season;
I loved thee once in passion blind,
I love thee now in reason.

Haply the pleasing trance is fled,
What's left is more enduring;
The blossom of my love is dead,
The fruit is now maturing.

Notices of New Works.

THORNTON ON SLAVERY.*

[Recent events, and the discussions growing out of them, which now occupy the public mind, will make the subjoined notice particularly interesting. The writer handles his subject with vigor and originality.]—Ed. Mess.

This is a work of very considerable labor and research; and is the most extensive investigation, that we have seen, of the important subject of which it treats. It ought to be attentively read by all the citizens of the United States. Our relation to the large class of people, of the African race, who exist among us, chiefly in a state of slavery, is one of the most delicate and difficult in our political condition:—it is that for which all safe remedies must be necessarily slow; and through which we are exposed to the severest injuries that foreign nations can inflict upon us.

Had our forefathers been able to prevent it, we should never have been placed in this relation. But their remonstrances, when colonists, were vain. It suited the policy and cupidity of Britain to introduce slavery into our country.

The reverend author of the work before us has availed himself of these facts, to show how entirely free the people of the Southern States are, from all responsibility as to the original introduction of slaves among them,—and with what an ill grace Britain now interferes in a matter which, of right, no longer concerns her; and in which she can have no other motive but our injury.

Referring the reader to the work itself, for an extensive and luminous detail of what generally belongs to the subject, we shall confine ourselves to a few observations on the temper and conduct of England in relation to us; for we fully believe British influence to be the chief incentive to the operation of the abolitionists among us.

Many, among the influential classes in England, hate us cordially. All discerning Americans, who have visited that country, must have seen evidences of the fact. The memory of our revolution, brought about by British injustice and impolicy, rankles in the bosom of Englishmen. Our rapid growth in population and strength—above all, our prowess on the ocean, has inspired fear for her naval supremacy; without which, she would speedily sink to the condition of a third rate power.

The fact too that we have been enabled to undersell her in foreign markets with some of the products of our manufacturies, touches her on another tender point.

It is a little extraordinary that England, after having been the greatest slave trader in the world, should thus suddenly become so zealous in the cause of emancipation. It reminds us of the Parisian bawd mentioned by Parent Duchatelet; who, after having amassed a fortune in the infamous atmosphere of the stews, retired to her country-seat, and set herself up as a model of chastity and religion.

If England were influenced by motives of pure humanity, one might think her efforts could be fully employed in relieving distress at home. The situation of starving millions of her own subjects would absorb the efforts of the most active benevolence. "Adam Smith," says the Edinburgh Review, "states the definition of poverty, to be, living from hand to mouth. In this sense, all the laboring classes—that is to say, nine-tenths of the inhabitants of England, are poor."¹ Among these, multitudes are unable to support themselves; and it was a part of English policy, until lately, to sell them for a limited time, at public auction.

"At Yardley Hastings, in Northamptonshire," says Mr. Richardson, "all the unemployed men are put up to sale weekly; and the clergyman of the parish told me, that he had seen ten men the last week knocked down to one farmer for five shillings. There were about seventy men let out in that manner, out of a body of one hundred and seventy."

The last system, according to the same authority, which has been tried with these unfortunate persons to reduce their numbers, is thus described:

"There remained, therefore, a third plan, which, abandoning the idea of rendering parish subsistence less abundant than wages, or parish labor more severe than that exacted by an individual employer, proposed to connect the relief of the able-bodied with a condition which no man not in real want would accept, or would submit to, when that want ceased. Our readers are aware that the condition thus selected as a test, was, that the able-bodied applicant, with his family, should enter a work-house; should be supported there by a diet, ample indeed in quantity, but from which the stimulants which habit had en-

"deared to him, were excluded; should be subjected to habits of cleanliness and order, be separated from his former associates, and debarred from his former amusements."²

The reviewer does not inform us what kind of food was used in these cases; but we may fairly presume it was of the meanest description, as it proved more intolerable than scant diet and overwork had done. If we were allowed to conjecture, we would suppose it was saw-dust, as that has been ascertained to be capable of supporting human life, by "conversion into a substance bearing no remote analogy to bread."³

It is added, "wherever this experiment had been tried;—at Bingham, at Southwell, at Cookham, and at Uley, it had succeeded." Nor is it all surprising, for there are few men who would not prefer to encounter every evil, whilst at large, to imprisonment on such a diet.

With such a mass of misery at home, England busies herself about the condition of negroes in America; who, in fact, are better supplied with all the comforts of life, than a large majority of her own people. She entirely reverses the maxim, that charity begins at home. She incarcerates her own poor, on a diet altogether intolerable; and sends missionaries into foreign lands to preach universal emancipation. She pays one hundred millions of dollars to liberate the negroes of her West-India islands, whilst want and misery of the most hideous kind cover almost the whole of her own soil.

The solution of her conduct will be found in the fact before mentioned, from the Edinburgh Review, that only one-tenth of her population are in comfortable circumstances, the other nine-tenths living from hand to mouth; and this tenth, that holds the power, under the plea of benevolence and religion, is, in truth, influenced by the most selfish and inhuman political motives.

If the British West-India islands had been situated in any other part of the globe, we should have heard less of their freedom. Britain takes no steps to remove slavery from her possessions in India. But the negroes in the West-Indies are near the American coast, and may be made efficient agents in an invasion of our Southern States; and her aristocracy, who feel the factitious foundation of their wealth and power, are anxious, at any cost, to cripple a rival.

Unable to raise a sufficient supply of bread for her population at home, whenever a season the least unfortunate occurs, she is compelled to purchase largely from foreign nations. This her extensive commerce now enables her to do. But if any thing occur to curtail that commerce, she will no longer be capable of buying from abroad, and then her starving millions will rush into revolution. Her commerce rests chiefly for its support on her naval supremacy, and she therefore looks with extreme anxiety towards every people whose marine is at all likely to rival her own. From the nations of Europe she has little to fear in this respect; but the United States have shown a capacity to beat her on the ocean;—and their large and increasing nursery for sailors, with their rapidly advancing population, and growing resources of every kind, are constantly adding to their power in this respect.

To cripple such a people is an object exceedingly desirable to England; and experience has taught her that this cannot be done by a war waged in the ordinary manner. Should, however, a large portion of our population unite with her in hostile efforts, the prospect would be much better. The slaves constitute the only part from whom any co-operation could be expected—and they would not join a white army; yet, if we were invaded by a black force under British command, they possibly might. This has led her to arm and discipline the negroes of her West-India islands, and to throw a net-work, with her steam packets, in this direction. Not that she is destitute of white men and men-of-war in abundance for such purposes,—her redundant population at home, and her "wooden walls" abroad, prove the contrary;—and it would be far more humane to employ her able-bodied paupers as soldiers, than to incarcerate and starve them, as she now does. But they would not serve the purpose of exciting insurrection in our Southern States, and therefore are not suited to her views. Sending her regularly fitted men-of-war into our smaller and less protected ports, would excite suspicion. Therefore she builds a new class of men-of-war; calls them 'steam packets,' but puts her navy officers to command them, that they may learn the pilotage, the strength, and weak points of our harbors—and be ready at any time, and at the shortest notice, to foment a servile war. And the people of the South are so infatuated as to be actually 'lending her a stick to break their own heads;' for cracked they already are, if we may judge from the eagerness with which facilities, inducements and persuasions are held out for these vessels to touch at Southern ports. There are now, or soon will be, no less than fifteen or twenty of the largest class of English steamers—all man-of-war built, and commanded by British navy officers, actually running, as packets, in and out of the Gulf of Mexico, and plying between the West-Indies and the Southern States. Thus our own people are actually assisting Great Britain to maintain a steam navy, which in case of war, she will turn against us with tremendous effect. With the knowledge which her officers in command will soon possess of our Southern coast and its harbors, the 20,000 black regulars which she maintains in the West-Indies, may be transported in these steamers, and landed at any point between Louisiana and the Carolinas, with only two or three days' notice—Are the present relations between the two countries such, that the South may court observation upon her weak points and defenceless condition?

The abolition policy of England has already produced some of its intended effects on the blacks of the Union. "Many of our colored people," says the African Repository, "who had been the most decided opposers to all emigration, looking upon the British as the peculiar friends and protectors of their race, readily consented to engage for the West-Indies."⁴

To suppose her sincere in her professions of regard for human freedom, is to be utterly blind to her whole history:—for whenever her avarice or ambition has been directed towards any object, and she has had the power to gratify it—in the language of one of her own poets,

"Hope withering fled—and mercy sighed farewell."

A glance at her conduct in China, where she is waging a desolating war, because the Chinese are unwilling to poison themselves with her opium, is enough, one would think, to open the eyes of the most credulous.

That any portion of our people should coöperate with her in a policy so fatal in its designs to their own country, is an instance of wickedness, or infatuation, unmatched in the history of mankind. We earnestly entreat the abolitionists to pause and consider who they are, that are exciting them to the mad course they are pursuing,—to reflect whence the spy Thompson came—and whence that Sturge, who has recently had the impudence to send an address, professedly intended for them, to the various members of our Congress.

Our limits compel us to compress our observations in as small a compass as possible, and we will conclude by referring our readers to the recently published protest of the officers and crew of the American brig Creole; and to the kind of military force used at Nassau, in the island of New Providence, as well as to the course of the English government itself with regard to this matter, for a specimen of British policy towards us.

TALES AND SOUVENIRS OF A RESIDENCE IN EUROPE.

By a Lady of Virginia. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard; 1842. Mrs. Wm. L. Garrison.

Although the work, the title of which stands at the head of this article, has been already noticed, we believe, by most of our literary contemporaries, yet we should do ourselves and our readers, and even the fair authoress herself injustice, if we did not describe the impressions which its perusal produced on our own mind. As the work itself, when its publication was first announced, was known to be the production of a very accomplished lady, whose opportunities of literary culture had been by no means incon-

⁴ For December 15, 1840.

siderable, it might be supposed by some that so propitious an origin would at once have commended it to public favor. We are inclined, however, to take a somewhat different view of the subject. It is more than probable that, with many, the distinguished paternity of the book was in itself calculated to excite undue expectation, and may have accordingly led to corresponding disappointment.—but this we apprehend is neither the only nor the most serious disadvantage which it has had to encounter. Favorably as we understand the work has been received, we do not entertain a doubt that had it appeared some twenty years since, its reception would have been still more cordial and its popularity still more extensive. And why? Because in that period of time great changes have been wrought in our country—not only in its moral and physical condition, but in the tastes and habits of our multiform and expanding population. It would be idle to suppose that, in the race with which our countrymen have pushed their progress in every variety of pursuit—renouncing, as they have done, even the simplicity of manners which lingered among us a quarter of a century since,—and, yielding without a struggle to the irresistible influence of foreign sentiments and vices,—we say it would be idle to suppose that in this general mutation, literature and literary taste should not have shared the common destiny. When the immortal author of Waverley had established by his writings a purer standard, both in England and America, the puling sentimentalism which had previously characterized the school of romance was no longer tolerated. Men began to reason, and reason truly, that the pictures of fiction were not the less edifying and enchanting, for being faithful copies of truth and nature. Love, with its sorrows and trials and eventual triumphs, though constituting a material element in our social existence—was no longer considered as the master-passion which, in the hands of the novelist, should control and absorb all others, or should form the only clue by which the labyrinth of plot and counterplot could be penetrated. If boarding-school-misses, or even full grown readers, had wept and sighed over the cruel but not very perilous disappointments and sorrows of Amanda Farnallan—emotions of a far more sublime description were awakened in the contemplation of the stern but simple virtues and heroic intrepidity of Jeanie Deans. Walter Scott not only imparted true dignity and character to romance, but he opened a new and delicious fountain of moral improvement as well as intellectual pleasure; and by occasionally blending history with fiction, he invested even the barren hills and moors of his native Scotland with classical interest and beauty. That, however, for which his memory will be longest cherished, is the pure morality of his writings. He had none of the gloomy misanthropy of Byron—nor the bewildering skepticism of Shelley; and he would sooner have suffered the martyrdom of his fame, than have given circulation to that subtle poison which flows from the pen of Bulwer. That the writings of this last mentioned author, as well as of others of the same stamp, have had a strong tendency to vitiate public taste, and degrade it even below that point which it held prior to the ascendancy of Scott, is what few, we suppose, will deny. Bulwer has inflicted the more mischief, because of his acknowledged genius. He has covered up the germs of pollution with the flowers of a brilliant fancy, and clothed the most dangerous sentiments in language of exquisite beauty. Nor have the works of Charles Dickens, in our humble opinion, contributed materially to restore the existence of a sound and correct taste. Dickens is unquestionably a most minute and suspicious observer of human nature. He is piquant, humorous, pathetic, and frequently sublime; but we doubt whether the merit of recording the virtues of humble life, will altogether counteract the danger of unveiling its iniquities.

There is another objection, we think, to his writings, which will probably prevent their maintaining a very protracted hold on public favor; and this objection we state more in the spirit of regret than reproach. We have not, or we think we have not, discovered enough of what we must be permitted to call the religious principle, lying at the foundation of his works. He seldom refers the suffering victims of poverty, disease and misery to the hopes and consolations of the Christian's faith. He writes as if the grave closed over the immortal spirit, as well as over the tabernacle of flesh. No feelings of piety seem to have soothed the anguish and disappointments of Kate Nickleby, or to have sustained Little Nell in her multiplied sorrows.

It is time, however, to retrace our steps, and to devote some attention to the more immediate subject of this article. We have endeavored to make good the proposition—that works of the character of that before us will not and cannot be justly appreciated at the present time by the great public. The nation has become epicurean in its literature as well as its food. Plain wholesome viands are now unpalatable, without the garnish of fragrant spices,—and a volume of unpretending but beautiful morality is not sufficiently stimulating for appetites depraved by habit. Mrs. Rives' book is distinguished throughout for its moral and elevated tone. Its style, which perhaps in some instances may be rather luxuriant, is generally chaste, fluent and graceful; but as we shall perhaps receive more credit for our praise if mingled with a little fault-finding, we beg leave, most respectfully, to dissent from the too frequent introduction of foreign phrases, which cannot be familiar to the majority of readers. We are aware that this is not only sanctioned by custom, but that there are in truth innumerable thoughts and sentiments which are more expressively rendered in European languages than by our own;—still we have a kind of instinctive reverence for our good old vernacular, which makes us somewhat jealous of too much foreign admixture. We deem it hardly necessary to present any thing like a detailed analysis of the book, as this has been already done by several literary journals. A glance at its contents, however, may be acceptable to some of our distant readers, who have had no opportunity of procuring it. The first and longest story, "A Tale of our Ancestors," is founded, we are told, on truth. The scene is first laid in Europe in the age of Louis XV., but is subsequently shifted to our own mountains and valleys. Some of the scenes in this tale are exceedingly well depicted, and some of the characters, of which there is no lack of variety, are drawn with a skilful pencil. The glimpse with which the reader is favored, in the hunting scene, of the beautiful and unfortunate Marie Antoniette, of whom Burke said "that there never lighted on this orb a more delightful vision," is too interesting to have been so transient.

Following the "Tale of our Ancestors," the authoress has given us "Fragments" of her own journal in Switzerland and a part of Italy; and very acceptable fragments they are. Her descriptions of Alpine scenery correspond with the sublimity of the subject, and, if we mistake not, in gazing on the summits of the "Sovran Blanc" her feelings must have been strongly imbued with the devotional spirit of Coleridge—

"Oh dread and silent mount! I gazed upon thee
Till thou, still present to the bodily sense,
Did vanish from my thoughts; entranced in prayer
I worshipp'd the Invisible alone."

Interwoven with the incidents which the authoress has journalized are two other tales, the "Soldier's Bride" and the "Valley of Goldan," which, we are also informed, though embellished of course by the writer's fancy, are substantially founded in fact. Whilst both are calculated to awaken deep interest in the reader, we confess that our own preference is for the last mentioned story. It appeared some time since in the Literary Messenger, and we well remember to have been strikingly impressed at the time with its excellence—nor has a second perusal had any other effect than to deepen that favorable impression. The fate of Olivia will forcibly remind the reader of the kindred destiny of the poor blind girl in the "Last Days of Pompeii." The volume concludes by a successful imitation of an old English ballad.

We cannot close this article without cordially thanking the authoress for adding so verdant a leaf to the almost withered chaplet of Southern Literature. Why is it that our accomplished and educated females do not more frequently try their strength in some of the lighter, if not the more grave departments of composition? Is there less fervor in our sunny clime, or less poetry-inspiring beauty in our mountains, streams and valleys, than in the colder regions of the North? Those who, by their influence and standing in society, or by their superiority to all considerations connected with pecuniary gain, have it in their power to set an effective example in this matter, and will exercise that power, will be entitled to the praise of the present generation, and will most assuredly, we think, receive the commendation of the next.

AHASUERUS. A Poem. By a Virginian. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1842.

The story of the Wandering Jew has been treated with indifferent success by some of the principal poets of the age. Croly, in his brilliant but unequal romance of "Salathiel," has exerted his fine powers, in the attempt to clothe this remarkable popular legend with the embellishments of an affluent fancy and a glowing style. Wordsworth has a little poem on the subject, which would be undeserving of notice but for the name of its author. Mrs. Norton's "Undying One" is founded upon the same "wild and wondrous" tale: but in her hands, it has not been moulded into a form that promises to be any more lasting than those it has assumed under the plastic fingers of her predecessors.

Few legends seem to have taken a stronger hold of the popular fancy than this. Ever since the twelfth century—farther back than which it is difficult to trace it—it has been a rich theme for credulity to speculate upon, and for imagination to build upon. The simple legend is, that, at the time of the crucifixion of the Saviour, one, the most inveterate of his Jewish persecutors, was singled out by him for this awful and tremendous sentence: "Tarry till I come." Various names have been assigned to the imaginary personage, who was thus signally punished, by the several writers, who have availed themselves of the fable; but that of "Ahasuerus" appears to be one of the oldest and most authentic. Singular as it may seem, this extraordinary legend has, for ages, obtained considerable credence among the unenlightened classes in many parts of Christendom. Even so late as the last century, we find frequent allusions to his existence and appearance in some of the principal cities of Europe. Count Cagliostro was believed by many of the marvel-mongers of Paris to be no one else than the fated Jew. Even in our own day, the traces of the belief may be found in the popular mind. We remember, in crossing the Atlantic, not many years since, encountering an old Danish sailor, who, in one of his night-watches at sea, gravely assured us, that he had sailed in the same ship with the "Undying One"—and that the mysterious personage would pace the deck day and night without taking rest. We allude to these facts to show that the elements of the wonderful and poetical are contained in this impressive legend to an unusual degree; and the circumstance of its being so repeatedly selected as a topic by the poet and novelist, is a sufficient proof of this.

Notwithstanding, therefore, that the field, which Mr. Tyler has chosen for his first poetical tilting ground, has been trodden by other competitors, we know of no one who has left the lists with richer trophies and a more honorable result. The mould in which he has recast the ancient legend, is not only a beautiful, but a strictly original one. He has treated the subject in a new, philosophical and religious spirit; and, if he has not exhausted it, he has given to it its best and highest direction: for he has made it subservient to the conveyance of a true and impressive moral.

The poem of Ahasuerus opens very beautifully with a description of the birth of the Saviour—the appearance of the “orb of promise” to the shepherds,

“Amid their snowy flocks on Chaldee plain,” and their visit to the holy infant in the manger, where “Beth’lem’s bright star shone o’er his smiling face,
And by its light they hail’d the infant God!”

The effect of the preaching of Jesus on the Mount of Olives,

“Unto Judea’s congregated tribes,” is described in verses of singular power and melody of diction:

“Dust on his shoes, the cord about his loins,
The Saviour moved, on his high mission bent,
To save a world, to win his Father’s smile.”

One of the most exquisite passages in the whole poem, is that descriptive of the Crucifixion. It opens in a tone like the solemn peal of an organ. Few lines can be found in the language more melodious and poetical than the initial one. We have taken the liberty to place in italics others which have impressed us with their harmony or beauty of thought:

“Pale rose the moon o’er Calvary’s fatal mount.
A sign of mourning seem’d to fill the sky,
Yet rather felt than seen; a gloom, a cloud,
An incubus of night sat on men’s souls.
Was it the dawn that, rising o’er the hills,
Look’d on those sodden mounts with sadden’d gaze?
Was it the stream, whose gloomy waters lie,
Frowning ’neath light than darkness yet more dull?
*Was it the cloud that o’er the city hung,
Through which the sun’s rays feebly found their way,
Gleaming around with an unusual glare,*
While glows the Temple’s dome with blood-red fires?
Was it the wind, whose swift wings rushing by Strike forth funeral notes that freeze the soul,
While visions gather o’er the darken’d mind
Of greater horror than night’s dreams may paint?
*Nor cloud, nor palish dawn, nor fiery dome,
Nor moaning winds, nor Fancy’s visions dark,*
Through that dense multitude of anxious forms
Which throng’d the city’s ways, awoke such fears,
And wrapp’d each brow in livery of wo.
Lo! bending ’neath the burden of the cross,
Through the dark crowd, the patient Sufferer comes,
*The cruel thorns upon his gory brow,
The foam of thirst upon his whiten’d lip,*
Swaying from side to side, with straining nerves,
Beneath a weight that bows him to the dust.
O vengeful man! shall Pity weep in vain,
And Mercy have no tongue to reach thy heart?
*Shall the soft gaze of that love-speaking eye,
Mild as the azure sky when shines the moon
Through the calm firmament on summer’s eve—*
Shall pity, mercy, and the bitter tear
That torture wrings from his o’erburden’d soul,
Not turn you from that speechless act of wo,
Which spreads o’er universe a veil of gloom?
In vain may Justice speak, and solemn Fear,

With anguish’d voice and supplicating look;
In vain God’s frown is seen in earth and heaven;
In vain are prayers’ and tears’ appealing power:
*No care has Passion for Prayer’s burning words,
No eyes to see the tears that Mercy sheds:*
They seize him, bind him, nail him to the cross.
Forth from his hands life’s ebbing torrent flows;
His quivering feet are agonized with pain;
The dews of death start on his clammy brow;
And mid the shouts of that mad multitude,
While hisses, sneers, and fiendish jests and cries
Appall’d the very air, that caught the sounds,
The Son of man drinks full his cup of wo.”

This passage of itself will justify Mr. Tyler’s claim to the title of a poet in the highest sense of that word. In a vein no less powerful is the fine description of Ahasuerus; to which some of the most elaborate and successful lines in the whole poem are given. We will quote only the concluding portion, where the phrenzied Jew is depicted in the commission of the terrible crime, for which he is doomed to walk the earth till the second coming:

“On to the mount he came,
On to the cross, with flashing, glowing eye;
Revenge lay like a serpent on his lip,
And Hate was writhing on his cruel brow;
And on his forehead bold a frown lay coil’d,
Dark as the malice of his cruel heart.
Smiling in scorn, he raised on high his hand,
And smote the fainting Saviour’s ashy cheek,
Then spat upon him with a fiendish ire.
A flush of agony pass’d o’er Christ’s face,
And they who nearest stood heard these low words,
‘Ahasuerus, tarry till I come.’”

What can be more graceful and mellifluous than the lines descriptive of Jerusalem after the terrors consequent upon the Crucifixion had passed away?

“Again Jerusalem was clad in light,
And peace dwelt there in that sad, wondrous land.
Without a cloud the amethystine sky
Look’d smiling down upon the fragrant earth.
Through palm and olive groves the gentle gales
Play’d on their wind-harps wild, unmeasured strain,
While Luna’s love-tuned bird with folded wing
Sang to the stars, and all those starry skies
Seem’d full of light, and joy, and God’s pure love.
How calm the scene, how bright and beautiful!”

In the concluding scenes of Ahasuerus the originality and beauty of the author’s conception are strikingly manifested. The unhappy wanderer is represented as the last man. The freshness and glory of creation have passed away. The unbalanced earth—

“The music of her circling motion lost,
Through space unlimited, wheel’d feebly on,
Moonless and sad, and wrinkled o’er with woe.”

What a picture of an inanimate and silent world have we in the following remarkable passage!

“Gnarl’d, leafless, and barkless on that last day
The forest-trees uprear’d their branchless heads
Amid the breathless winds, and naked stood.
Spectral and bleach’d, fast crumbling into dust;
And solitary in those vast, sad groves,
Sat tongueless Silence on her ebony throne,
O’ercanopied by black and stirless clouds,
While her hush’d reign makes darkness yet more still.
Jesu! how strange that not a sound was there;
Nor pace of crouching cat, nor tiger wild,
With stealthy spring and balls of living fire,
Nor lone owl’s drowsy horn from hollow tree,
Nor ploughman’s plaintive song on plodding way,

Seeking at sunset his sweet cottage home.

Th' oppressive stillness burden'd Nature's ear,
Attuned to notes of perfect melody ;
And the soft sweep of a small insect's wing,
Swift-flying there through air's deep solitudes,
Would, with a storm-cloud's thunder-trumpet's sound,
Have smote upon the ear."

Let us infringe too freely upon the author's copy-right we must forbear quoting other passages of not inferior power, and come to that where Ahasuerus is represented as the last living habitant of a blasted and desolate earth :

"On a huge rock that reared its hoary crest,
Close by the ebbless margin of the sea,
Worn by his curse, and weary with old age,
Furrow'd with care, Ahasuerus stood.
Time had not spar'd the Jew, for heavily,
With feeble steps, he urged his painful way
Along the crumbling ascent of the mount ;
And, when at last he sadly sat him down,
His weak frame shook as with his dying pangs,
And hideous pain convulsed his ghastly face ;
His head was bent upon his drooping breast,
And his thin, shrunken hands, together clasp'd,
Writhe'd with the fire that ate his quiv'ring heart ;
And now and then low, moaning sounds escaped
His wither'd lips, yet none articulate.

His bitter cup of punishment was full.
No ray of sunshine on his forehead shone,
A gleam of joy to warm his fading soul ;
No sympathizing voice fell on his ear
To break the waste of that dark solitude ;
Not even a sound, save the harsh thunder-crash
Of mountains toppling from their heights above,
Stunning the stupid sense, broke silence there.
O ! what a blessing would a word have been,
A single word, from lips however strange ;
A human sound in that deep wilderness
More precious would have been than countless gems,
To the despairing wretch who craves for food,
And, hungry, perishes with want and cold.
One friendly tone, Affection's tender sigh,
In the dark madness of that last lone hour,
Would ecstasy have been as sweet as Heaven.
One beam of sunshine glancing through the air,
One note of some bright song-bird heard on high,
One draught of water from some silvery fount,
One throb of joy to feel he had a heart,
One memory of blessed by-gone hours,
One happy thought of rest, one hope of change,
The desolation of the world had made
A paradise for him. But drear his lot,
Drear, sad and dark, in fear and in despair,
No voice, no sound to comfort his distress,
The past all gone, the future boundless wo ;
One round of misery, one eternal thought,
Continuous pangs of ever-ceaseless pain !

From where he sat upon the crumbling mount,
He gaz'd around with a dull, sickly stare,
And mutter'd to himself like one who dreams ;
But sudden, as he gazed, a fire seem'd stirr'd
Through his dull veins, and then a spirit came Unto his thought, and from his stagnant mind
The clouds roll'd off, and he arose upright,
And walk'd with form erect, and gazed abroad
Upon that scene of desolation there,
Like one who wakes from an appalling sleep,
To fiercer horrors than his dreams had brought.
He press'd his hands upon his face, and tried
To waken Memory from her torpid sleep ;

And then the gathering furrows on his brow,
And the dilation of his fervid eye,
The quick contortions of his trembling lips,
The throbings of his heart, that shook his frame,
Gasping and writhing then in horrid pain,
The truth, the hideous truth flash'd in his mind.
He knew himself, he felt his hand grow red
With the unpiteous blow ; he saw Christ's dying form
Struggling upon the cross in mortal throes,
He saw his holy brow stain'd with his blood,
He saw his dovelike eyes upturn'd to heaven,
He heard the shouts of that tumultuous throng :
What's he who strikes that dastard, cruel blow !
What words are those that pierce into his brain ?
'Ahasuerus, tarry till I come !' "

Rent by remorseful emotions, Ahasuerus at length sinks upon the earth and pours forth his soul in prayer ; and here the author again shows himself equal to the grandeur of his subject. The prayer is a fine specimen of fervid and passionate devotional poetry. We will not mar it by breaking it into extracts.

The moral of the whole poem bursts upon the reader in the noble climax with which it concludes—the gracious answer to the penitential supplications of the wretched Ahasuerus. His stubborn knees are bent. Prostrate and humbled he bows in adoration and remorseful tears. His prayer is heard. Infinite as was his sin, infinite mercy can pardon it :

"When thus the fated spake, in fear, in faith,
In heartfelt penitence, he bow'd his head,
And, at his feet, upon the thirsty ground,
The sacred tear of sorrow gently fell ;
And softer then than human thought conceives,
Softer and clearer than the sweetest note
That spring's light breeze, or summer bird e'er sang,
Yet swelling like the thunder's volumed tone,
Glided a voice into his listening ear ;
While universe through all her shining spheres
Ceased her loud music then, and trembling heard.
Hush ! 'tis the voice of the Almighty God !
Across the skies a dazzling radiance sweeps,
The clouds roll back, and earth is bathed in light ;
The sea leaps up unchain'd through all his depths,
And laves his shores with amaranthine waves ;
Down from their sources rush the volumed tides,
And rivers sparkle in the heavenly beams,
And lakes reflect the dimpling smiles of morn ;
The sod puts forth its turf, the tree its leaf,
And flowers spring up from the sweet, fragrant soil,
Enamelling the land ; and Spring's soft winds
Bear to the violet the rose's breath,
And clouds of perfume fill the amber air.
Hush ! 'tis the voice of the Almighty God !
A crown of mercy circles his calm brow,
And sad Ahasuerus sleeps at last.
Upward on wings of penitence, his soul
Hath sought the pure realms of eternal rest ;
And with the bow of glory set on high,
With flashing seas and smiling azure skies,
With purple mists and golden-banner'd clouds,
Millennium comes, and Earth, harmonious all,
Rolls slowly through her silver-beaming sphere,
And swells the music of the choral stars !

The high poetical beauty of these lines, and the sweetness, vigor and majesty of the versification, will be appreciated by every true lover of poetry. Indeed, we could name few contemporaneous poets, who have shown themselves masters of the blank-verse measure, equally with Mr. Tyler. In the fluency of his diction, and the stately march of his verse, he often reminds us of Shelley, whose "Alas-tor" is in a vein not dissimilar. The eight closing lines of the last passage from Ahasuerus form an appropriate finale to the whole solemn chaunt. They present a remarkable specimen of rich, melodious, rotund versification.

We have contented ourselves, thus far, with pointing out the beauties of "Ahasuerus" without carping at the defects, inasmuch as the latter are far the least frequent. Occasionally we meet with an imperfect line, an obscure expression, or a prosaic phrase—but these are faults which the author can correct with a few dashes of his pen, and which, in the next edition of his poem, will probably be amended. They dwindle into insignificance before the many graces of thought, expression and versification, which may be profusely found on every page of this elegantly printed volume. Mr. Robert Tyler is, we believe, yet quite a young man; and, if we mistake not, this is his first considerable essay in verse. To say that it has proved completely successful—that it has been received by the public and the press with a degree of favor rarely bestowed—and that a large edition of the poem has been rapidly exhausted—would be but to state notorious facts. Mr. Tyler has, at a single stride, obtained a high rank among the poets of his country; and if the extraordinary promise of this production be duly redeemed, there will be few between him and the first.

AMERICAN CRIMINAL TRIALS. By Peleg W. Chandler.
Boston: Little & Brown; 1842.

There are scenes of almost daily occurrence in courts of justice, which, in point of moral interest, and often in dramatic effect, exceed the boldest flights of the novelist. Of late years, the newspaper reports of important cases have excited a degree of public attention, which is proof enough of the essential attractiveness of the general subject. In the hands of skilful writers, the court of justice has often been made the scene of as powerful delineations as the battle-field or the palace. Witness the trial of Effie Deans in Scott's most beautiful tale; or, to instance a lighter example, the celebrated case of Bardell vs. Pickwick. The rich material thus afforded by the judicial tribunals, is often sacrificed, either from its being chronicled in the form of dry and technical reports intended solely for the use of the legal profession, or carelessly set forth in the hasty sketches of a daily journal for the mere purpose of gratifying public curiosity. The author of the volume before us alludes to a successful experiment, in the way of improvement upon these methods, in France, where a work, entitled 'Causes Célèbres,' has long commanded the favor of the reading public. In emulation of so useful a design, Mr. Chandler has produced an interesting and most instructive work of a similar character; but in all respects adapted to our own country. He intimates, in his preface, an intention of continuing his labors, if sufficiently encouraged. We cannot doubt the good sense and taste of the public so much as to admit a question on this subject. We have examined the present work with attention, and find it singularly clear, free from unnecessary details, and full of important and entertaining facts. Sketches of the individuals, and of the circumstances connected with each case, are judiciously wrought into the main narrative. The trials themselves, seem to have been wisely selected, on account of their intrinsic interest, and of the light they throw on the history and social feeling of the periods of their occurrence. To give an idea of the kind of cases described, it is sufficient to mention the trial of Amce Hutcheson, whose name is so often mentioned by the early New-England annalists,—the celebrated trials for witchcraft; those connected with the persecution of the Quakers by the colony of Massachusetts Bay; and that of the soldiers concerned in the Boston massacre on the fatal 5th of March. From cases like these, illustrated and condensed with the care and judgment of

Mr. Chandler, the reader obtains a better idea of the state of popular feelings during the most exciting epochs of our history, than any formal account can possibly afford. The volume is executed in a style of great neatness, and should ornament the library of every intelligent American.

DR. MOTT'S TRAVELS. The Messrs. Harper have recently published, in an elegant octavo volume, the Travels of Dr. Valentine Mott, in Europe and the East. The celebrity of this gentleman, in the profession of which he is so active a member, will give his journal an attractiveness beyond the generality of similar works. Dr. Mott was absent about five years; during which time he visited England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Germany, Italy, Greece, Egypt and Turkey. In his introduction, he speaks, we think, with great reason, of the advantages of travel in cases of nervous disease, and especially that long train of ailments incident to an overtasked brain. In a subsequent part of his book, he protests, with equal justice, against the custom of sending pulmonary invalids abroad to die. In Great Britain, Dr. Mott renewed his acquaintance with the medical instructors of his youth. Among others, he saw Sir Astley Cooper, by whom he was presented with an exquisitely wrought case of surgical instruments—made from the wood and iron of old London bridge. In Paris, the Dr. surveyed, with much care, the various hospitals and medical schools, and relates numerous anecdotes of the leading physicians and surgeons of that gay metropolis. In Switzerland, the numerous cases of goitre attracted his attention; and, in Tuscany, he saw much of Dr. Segato, the discoverer of a method of petrifying human flesh, who unfortunately died without revealing his secret. In Greece and Turkey, our author made numerous interesting observations on the climate, dietetics, and physical resources of various localities. His professional suggestions are, however, judiciously blended with descriptive sketches, and comments on men and things. He occasionally borrows from the journals of his companions, and turns aside, from time to time, to indulge in a reminiscence, or hazard a conjecture. We should think Dr. Mott's Travels would interest the members of his profession generally. He has evidently returned full of American feeling and scientific enthusiasm, which augurs most hopefully for the success of his labors in the excellent institution, where he is now engaged in imparting the results of his experience, and giving constant proofs of his professional skill.

THE ROLLO BOOKS. We have hitherto called public attention to these admirable specimens of juvenile literature, and set forth what we deemed their peculiar claims to the support of all interested in education, and the success of excellent works designed to improve and attract the young. These works have recently appeared in a new and beautiful dress, under the auspices of Hogan & Thompson of Philadelphia, and of T. H. Carter of Boston. Two new volumes, "The Rollo Philosophy," have been added; and two more are in preparation, which will appear in the Spring. Thus completed, the series will constitute a uniform and charming library for children, at a reasonable price, and abounding in moral teaching and useful knowledge, conveyed through the medium of pleasant narrative.

ESSAYS ON LABOR AND PROPERTY. The popular Editor of the Encyclopedia Americana, has furnished the public with a very useful volume, in these Essays. They throw much light on the most important branches of political economy. The basis of property, and the principles which regulate labor, are discussed in a clear and practical style. The work constitutes another excellent addition to Harper's Family Library.

PROGRESSION.

BY MRS. SEBA SMITH.

Hope on, hope on, O restless heart!
Though dark the hour may be—
For e'en in all thy struggles know
A glory waits for thee!
O keep thou still the dew of youth—
Still hold thou fast unto the truth.

What though thy strong desires sent forth
Unequal ends attain—
And thy intensest thought result,
That all of earth is vain—
O not in vain, if truth and right
But arm thee with heroic might:

Toil on, for like the pillared stone
O'er which the moss hath crept,
And veiled the record there inscribed
While ages round it slept—
Thus, thou mayest on thy tablet read
A truth to meet thine utmost need;

That thou, in this unequal strife,
But tenderest to a goal,
Whose object realized shall fill
The vastness of the soul—
These ardent hopes, these wishes high
Belong to that which cannot die.

MORAL AND MENTAL PORTRAITS.

FITZ GREENE HALLECK.

Halleck has enjoyed a reputation for a longer period than any of the living poets of America. When he first began to write, it was unusual to find even passable original verse: native poets were regarded with distrust; perhaps with a more ignoble feeling: we had no faith in our own literature, and we imported opinions, as we did broadcloths, from England. These times are happily changed, and a worthier and loftier tone prevails among our people. During the last twenty years, under numerous disadvantages, we have made rapid strides; and in works of fiction especially, we have won a high rank in the Republic of Letters. To us the time seems not very distant, when the rate of exchange, to speak in mercantile phrase, will be in favor of this country.

In 1813, a poem appeared in the Columbian—a New-York newspaper then in existence—under the signature of "A Connecticut Farmer's Boy;" the Editor introduced it to his readers with a remark to this effect: "We are informed that the following verses are really the production of a Connecticut farmer's boy, but we doubt it—they are too good to be original." This was Halleck's first appearance in print! Partaking of the martial enthusiasm which the war aroused, Halleck joined the "Iron Grays"—a company famous in its day: an ode addressed to that corps, was the second poem he published. In Fanny, he remembers his old comrades in the following satirical strain:

"And Swartwout's gallant corps, the Iron Grays,
Soldiers that met the foeman hand to hand,
Or swore, at least, to meet them, undismayed."

As Halleck has excluded these and others from his volumes, it would be improper to copy them here; yet we are assured they would do no discredit to his muse. Justice insists that a poet should be tried by his acknowledged writings, not by his "first rude numbers," which maturer judgment disavows. "Twilight" appeared in the Evening Post of October, 1818; and this is the earliest poem we have found that he has preserved: it is imbued with a sweet pensive feeling, but it does not appear to have attracted much attention at the time. The next year Halleck suddenly became famous. His young friend, Dr. Drake—a poet of lively imagination and brilliant wit—sent in March, 1819, to the Evening Post, some verses "To Ennui," under the signature of Croaker. Coleman, the Editor, thus mentions them: "Lines addressed To Ennui, by Croaker, are received, and shall have a place to-morrow. They are the production of genius and taste. A personal acquaintance with the author would be gratifying to the Editor." A day or two afterwards, the same Editor says: "We have received two more poetic creakers of merit from our unknown correspondent Croaker, which shall appear all in good time. His promise to furnish us with a few more similar trifles, though he tells us we must expect an occasional touch at ourselves and party, is received with a welcome and a smile."

These poems satirized with great cleverness, public characters, and passing events: they were read by every one in the city; and curiosity searched eagerly to discover the author. They attracted so much attention, that Drake communicated his secret to Halleck, and asked his assistance to amuse the town. With characteristic modesty he pleaded inability, but was at length prevailed upon to make the attempt—in which, succeeding under the signature of Croaker, jr., the two friends wrote afterwards, in most instances, as Croaker & Co. These poems commanded general attention, and awakened a spirit of emulation; and small wits, suddenly stricken with the mania of rhyme, ventured, but unsuccessfully, in the same vein. Coleman remarks: "We have received several imitations of Croaker, but none of them partake in any degree of the inspiration which marks every effort of his pen. One of them very sagaciously observes that there is a great falling off in Croaker, jr.; now, I venture to say, it only requires a single glance to discover they are both by the same pen."

We do not find that the sarcasm of the Croakers, though very keen, gave offence to any one, except to John Lang, Editor of the Gazette, to whom No. 13 of the series was addressed. This was from the pen of Drake, and for true wit is perhaps the most brilliant of the whole. The American Flag, also by Drake, was one of the series. The poetic firm kept their own secret, while unceasing efforts were made, by nearly all the town, but in vain, to discover the persons who composed it; the mystery added greatly to their celebrity. At length chance revealed the secret. Halleck was in the habit of sending a young fellow-clerk to the printing office to ask for "the proof," which he received in a blank envelope, ignorant of its contents. From this circumstance it began to be whispered abroad, that the author of Croaker & Co. was some one in the counting-house of Jacob Barker—public opinion fixed on one of the clerks—it was not Halleck! His assiduity to business, and taciturn disposition, turned suspicion from him. At last Coleman, who had for sometime before been in the secret, disclosed the author's names, and Drake and Halleck suddenly became renowned as poets. The publication of these poems commenced early in March, 1819;—at first they appeared in quick succession—no less than sixteen were published during that month—and afterwards, at longer intervals, till the close of June;—in July only two appeared, both by Halleck. The last bore the title of "Curtain Conversations," and was introduced with this remark: "The extravagant price of Leghorn hats in London, as mentioned in your paper of this evening, suggests the annexed lines. You will observe that part of the first stanza is an almost literal quotation from Milton." This, Halleck has inserted in one of his volumes, with the new title of "Domestic Happiness." The poem beginning was also one of the Croakers, and published in July. These are the only ones that Halleck has preserved in his first volume.

"The world is bright before thee,"

It appears that the public placed a higher value on the Croakers, than the authors did. Halleck's own opinion of them, may be gathered from a line in Fanny, where, speaking of the heroine's learning, he says—

"And read the Croakers when they were in fashion."

In 1819 Fanny was published, and in 1821 a new edition, with additions, appeared. This dashing, Beppo-like poem, was sought after with amazing avidity—every body read it, and all praised it. In a very short time there was not a single copy for sale; yet the demand was by no means exhausted. Halleck, however, would not consent to republish. In consequence, the book was lent by friend to friend; its scarcity made it eagerly sought for; and those who could not borrow, paid five dollars, and even more, for a single copy. This poem was thought by many to be a personal satire: every one imagined that he knew the original, while in fact, it was purely ideal. In stanza 170, towards the close of the poem, the author says—

"If in my story of her woes, or plan
Or moral can be traced, 'twas not intended."

Fanny's father, an humble retailer of dry goods in Chatham street, having amassed a little money, moved into Hanover Square, to follow the more respectable calling of a jobber, in the wholesale line. As his wealth increased, so also did his desire to mingle in society, and to indulge his daughter in fashionable life: then followed the common fate—bankruptcy! This is the simple thread of the story, round which "are woven" a thousand fancies, of his daughter, whose name the poem bears,—of men, manners, politics, as well as several conceits and fashions of the day.

In 1825, "Alnwick Castle and other poems" appeared; in 1836, a second edition was published; and lastly, in 1830, a new edition of "Fanny and other poems," issued from the press of Harper & Brothers. All the poems contained in these volumes, were originally published in the periodicals or souvenirs of the time. With the exception of two stanzas—a translation from the German—which appeared in the Knickerbocker magazine some twelve months ago—we have not seen a new poem from Halleck's pen in many years. This is a rapid sketch of his literary career: let us now glance at his personal history. His school-days being over, Halleck was placed in a store of his native village—Old Guildford, Connecticut—and there performed, with alacrity, the various duties of his station. In 1804, he arrived in New-York, and soon after found employment in the counting-room of Jacob Barker.* A correct account, capable in every task, and faithful to every trust, Halleck, from the grade of youngest clerk, advanced to the station of first book-keeper—in this, and various offices more important, he continued during the chequered career of his employer, whose confidence and esteem he never ceased to enjoy. We should remark, that, for a short time, he was established in the ship-chandlery line; but the liabilities to government, which his good nature incurred, as security for his first business friend, oppressed him so heavily, that we believe he never commenced business again. In 1822 he visited Europe, and travelled a year in Britain, France and Switzerland. On his return, after spending some time, chiefly in literary leisure, he accepted, and still holds, an office of high trust from John Jacob Astor; by whom he is much respected. In conjunction with Irving, Brevoort and others, Mr. Astor has selected Halleck as one of the trustees of a noble public library, which he has appropriated a large sum of money to establish:—and the trustees, we understand, are now engaged in the selection of books, &c.

* Jacob Barker—perhaps the most remarkable merchant of his day—a man of untiring industry—boundless ambition and curious subtlety of mind—more fertile in expedients than desirous of pursuing the right—possessed either of great mental courage or a heart of stone. Voluble in speech and plausible in argument, he often seemed anxious to promote your interests, while his object was to win your confidence and make a profitable bargain. He studied jurisprudence, to stand on the "windy side of the law," or if arraigned, plead his own cause. This wonderful man, when all his extensive mercantile and banking operations failed, went penniless, it is said, to New Orleans. Then, at an advanced age, but still vigorous in mind, he practised law, and holds a distinguished place at the bar. Jacob Barker should have a biographer. Were his character truly drawn, and his motives justly scanned, he would appear a much better man than his enemies are willing to credit.

In early life, Halleck was so much engrossed by labor at the desk, that none suspected him of a devotion to the muses. It does not appear that in those days he had a confidant, or that he ever revealed his secret aspirations: in fact, on all matters relating to himself, he was singularly unobtrusive and reserved. But in 1812, he met a friend who was the means of opening a new source of pleasure to him—one that led to the literary co-partnership of Croaker & Co. During the summer of that year, Dr. James E. Dekay* rusticated in Old Guilford, and while there was introduced to Halleck's sister. Returning to New-York, she gave him a letter of introduction to her brother. In Dr. Dekay, Halleck found a good friend—one who could appreciate intellectual worth, and sympathize with the poet's feeling. To him, at last, Halleck unburdened his mind, and revealed the soarings of his fancy. On one occasion, Dr. Dekay mentioned that he had a young friend, a man of strong enthusiasm, of brilliant imagination, and withal a devout worshipper of Shakspeare and Campbell—Halleck's favorite authors. This man was Dr. Drake! The two poets were congenial spirits,—an ardent feeling, a warm attachment soon grew up between them, which lasted during the life of Drake. Halleck has never forgotten if not his earliest, perhaps one of his sincerest friends. We all remember the beautiful lines—

“Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days,
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.”

In the summer of 1819, while the Croakers

* Dr. Dekay, Zoologist to the State of New-York—author of Travels in Turkey, &c.—a gentleman of extensive scientific attainments, and refined taste in literature.

“were in fashion,” Drake's health began to decline; and in the autumn of that year he visited New Orleans, where his mother and two sisters then lived, in hopes of restoration. In the spring of the following year he returned to New-York, with health unimproved, and died on 21st September, 1820.

When Halleck first arrived in New-York, he was diffident—nay bashful in manners, and seemingly unfitted to win his way to eminence amid its busy throng. Years after, when his fame as a poet was established, his society was courted, and in the best circles he became a welcome guest. Mingling freely with society imparted a self-confidence, which gradually taught him to appreciate his worth and feel his power. Though easy and graceful in deportment, he is still reserved and unobtrusive. Though he seldom leads conversation, he is always entertaining, and enters into discussion with a pleasing animation. He delights to take that side of a question which is either unpopular, or has the fewest supporters; and advocates it generally with naïveté, often with ingenuity, and always with good temper. Yet if he meet an ostentatious fool, he will sometimes lead him into a labyrinth, and there leave him, bewildered in ignorance: and sometimes he will humor or defend the quaint conceits of a man of genius, credulous and sincere, and inwardly smile at his easy, unsophisticated nature. Mirthfulness of disposition, at least in company, makes him a pleasing antagonist—Though he may conquer, he never offends; or if defeated, he submits with a smile. Few men will be without one advocate, when Halleck is present. Gentle and kind in heart, he would rather avoid a question than speak an unpleasant truth; while in general society, he is witty, satirical or serious, as the humor or occasion prompts. He possesses much worldly wisdom and strong common sense. On literary subjects he has a large store of pleasant memories—but for the pursuit of science or philosophy, he evinces little inclination. His studies have been the fanciful rather than the solid: he is too paradoxical to be very profound. He has wandered more widely in the regions of fiction, than in the paths of philosophy. Halleck is a good belles-lettres scholar, not a searcher after scientific truths. The simple rudiments of a common English education, were all the school learning that he received. In Fanny, he says—

——“he had left off schooling ere the Greek

But now he reads and speaks French fluently: he studied Italian to enjoy Ariosto, and Portuguese to understand Camoens. Unfortunately he is unable to open the door of classic antiquity, and, by the severe models of ancient writers, chasten his style, and refine his taste. But free from ostentation, he makes no vain pretensions to learning which he does not possess.

During his whole life, Halleck has devoted his leisure to books. Among the living poets, Campbell is an especial favorite, and on the instant he will repeat from his works almost any passage suggested. In "The Recorder" he has paid a beautiful tribute to Bryant—

"Bryant, whose songs are thoughts that bless
The heart, its teachers, and its joy,
As mothers blend with their caress
Lessons of truth and gentleness
And virtue for the listening boy."

To Hillhouse also, he has paid in the same poem, a fine compliment.

Halleck has many general acquaintances who respect him highly: with them he will discuss pleasantly the news of the day, or a literary novelty, but seldom unbosoms his feelings, or reveals his anticipations. There is something like isolation in his heart; and strange to say, it is without morbidity. In Fanny we find a passage which may show what were his "young thoughts," and years have perhaps confirmed them:

"But if you are a bachelor, like me,
And spurn all chains, even tho' made of roses,
I'd recommend segars."

Of generous feelings, he triumphs over envy or fear of rivalry—he never thinks that applause bestowed on others will detract from his own merit. He has no disposition to wrestle in politics: he smiles alike at the "ins" and "outs," for he deems that the strife of party is more for the honor or emolument of office, than for the good of the country. An admirer of the British constitution, he, half jestingly, avows himself to be a monarchist; and professes little confidence in the intelligence and integrity of the people, or their fitness for self-government.

Let us now speak of Halleck as a poet. While we shall judge him, impartially, by the highest standards, we admit that he is not an author by profession: he wooes the muses for pleasure rather than profit, in hours spared from his ledger. Yet we shall speak of him with a free and fearless judgment; for, in some circles he is named in the same breath with the greatest of American poets: his title to that proud distinction has never, to our knowledge, been critically determined. When first we read his musical lines, we were impressed among the troop of his admirers. We cared not then to examine the source of our pleasure: we gave ourself no concern, whether our feelings were really exalted, or whether our ear only was charmed. We never asked our judgment to explain the means by which he imparted delight to our youthful fancy; but lately, taking up his volumes to draw his mental portrait, we closely investigated his claims as a poet, and examined his style as a writer, with a disposition more willing to be pleased than dreaming of disappointment.

To estimate the poet justly, it is necessary to consider, first, the quality of his mind, and the depth of its resources; second, his enthusiasm, his invention, and truth in delineation; and lastly, the language in which he expresses his thoughts and emotions. In these, so essential to the great poet, few indeed have reached a high degree of excellence. Some are imbued with intense feeling, impulsive, impassioned, wild,—whose language is too feeble to express, and whose resources are too limited to illustrate their lofty conceptions. Others, with a rare felicity of diction—with a pleasing collocation of tinkling words, clothe weak or common thoughts, or ungraceful similes, in a garb so attractive, that the pauser reason, is misled, and sound usurps, for a time, the throne of sense.

One secret of Halleck's popularity lies in the concord of sweet sounds: he is a delightful euphonist. But harmonious lines, though they captivate the ear, never satisfy the judgment—versification, however smooth it may be, is of an humble rank: the poet's aim is a higher and a holier one. Standing upon his sacred eminence, his vocation is to soothe and refine the heart, to instruct and exalt the mind—to lift us on the wings of his imagination above the dull realities of life, and make us sharers of a truthlike fancy, that adorns and sanctifies the realms of thought. And, whether he entice us with a smile, or subdue us with a tear, or compel us in the stern sublimity of his power, his vocation is still the same. Burns, whose portrait Halleck has so skilfully drawn, felt the full value of his lofty gift—he felt it even when a boy, and every faculty of his manly and unselfish heart, was bent with an unfaltering energy to win for Scotland and himself a distinguished name. In his poem "On Early Days," with a feeling worthy of his great intent, he writes:

"E'en then a wish, I mind its power,
A wish that to my latest hour
Shall strongly heave my breast,
That I for poor auld Scotland's sake
Some useful plan or book could make,
Or sing a sang, at least.
The rough burr-thistle spreading wide
Among the bearded bear,
I turned the weeder-clips aside
And spared the symbol dear."

Halleck never seems to have felt this enthusiasm; on the contrary, his gift, such as it is, he uses chiefly for amusement—to beguile an idle hour, or to win a transient smile from the unthinking crowd. He never inculcates a pure morality, a virtuous patriotism, or an humble adoration of

"The radiant beauty shed abroad
On all the glorious works of God,"

like him, the greatest among our own, from whom we now quote.

Halleck has not adopted a poetic creed, and worshipped by it; he never seeks to explore the hidden sources of thought or action, but seems contented with the effect. He does not abstract himself from "this bank-note world," and dwell in the regions of imagination; but he delights to sit, as it were, in populous thoroughfares, searching for the ludicrous; and, with a humor, in some respects peculiarly his own, finds mirth and amusement in every thing. He never draws a tear, but often wins a smile: he says himself,

"I rhyme for smiles and not for tears."

And at another time tells us—

"It is too true, I'm somewhat fond of fun
And jesting."

He loves to ridicule a foible or a fashion of the day; to mingle with a serious thought an air of levity; to draw a grave picture grotesquely. Yet he sketches with a grace and good temper that never offend. His forte, however, is the quizzical rather than the satirical—the humorous rather than the witty. He is of the school of Hogarth, not of Angelo—of Constable, not of Claude. In two or three instances he has hit, with a happy thought, a prejudice of the hour, or a feeling of the heart, in phrase so appropriate, that once read it is not easily forgotten. But though he is sometimes warm, he is not unfrequently cold—glittering like the icicle in the sunbeam; in fact, he is so very dazzling, that he would capture us by stratagem, not subdue us by the sweet influences of feeling and affection.

A dreamy indistinctness blurs his descriptions of external nature—he sees the outlines of beautiful scenes—few perfect in form. But with a quick perception he looks on men, and observes their peculiarities; and finds strong contrasts everywhere. This feeling leads him to indulge in antithetical phrases, in alliterations, and in a play upon words; sometimes he succeeds admirably, but the mannerism betrays the labor by which they are produced. This talent so frequently exhibited by Halleck, is not of the highest order; yet we are inclined to believe, that, with his exquisite harmony, it is the true secret of his popularity. Though it be effective, it is artificial—not like enthusiasm, innate; in fact, his writings, with a few exceptions, bear evidence of being produced slowly, after great labor; and their object is, to attract and astonish, not to soothe and instruct. He is too fond of tropes and similes to be either passionate or pathetic: his style is florid; his metaphors are sometimes confused, and his accessories are not always tastefully disposed. But we have a good caricature of men and manners in Fanny—a clever semi-serio sketch of an Indian in Red Jacket—an excellent satirical likeness in The Recorder—In Burns, we have the very man standing before us, in moral and mental grandeur. He is breathing, blood-warm, alive in healthy vigor and manly strength.

This is indeed a full-length portrait, worthy of a master: for this, above all else he has painted, we admire the genius of Halleck. Let us quote some of the best stanzas:

"The memory of Burns—a name
That calls, when brimm'd her festal cup,
A nation's glory and her shame
In silent sadness up.

There have been loftier themes than his,
And longer scrolls, and louder lyres,
And lays, lit up with Poesy's
Purer and holier fires.

Yet read the names that know not death,
Few nobler ones than Burns are there;
And few have won a greener wreath,
Than that which binds his hair.

His is that language of the heart,
In which the answering heart would speak—

And his that music, to whose tones
The common pulse of man keeps time,

On fields where brave men 'die or do,'
In halls where rings the banquet's mirth,
Where mourners weep, where lovers woo
From throne to cottage hearth?

What sweet tears dim the eyes unshed,
What wild vows falter on the tongue,
When 'Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled'
Or 'Auld Lang Syne' is sung!

Pure hopes, that lift the soul above,
Come with his Cottar's hymn of praise,
And dreams of youth, and truth, and love,
With 'Logan's' banks and braes.

And when he breathes his master lay
Of Alloway's witch-haunted wall,
All passions * * *
Come thronging at his call.

Imagination's world of air,
And our own world, its gloom and glee,
Wit, pathos, poetry, are there,
And death's sublimity.

And Burns—though brief the race he ran,
Though rough and dark the path he trod,
Lived—died—in form and soul, a Man,
The image of his God.

He kept his honesty and truth,
His independent tongue and pen,
And moved, in manhood, as in youth,
Pride of his fellow men.

Strong sense, deep feeling, passions strong,
A hate of tyrant and of knave,
A love of right, a scorn of wrong,
Of coward and of slave.

A kind, true heart, a spirit high,
That could not fear, and would not bow,
Were written in his manly eye,
And on his manly brow.

Praise to the bard! his words are driven
Like flower-seeds by the far winds sown,
Where'er, beneath the sky of heaven,
The birds of fame have flown.

Praise to the man! a nation stood
Beside his coffin with wet eyes,
Her brave, her beautiful, her good,
As when a loved one dies.

And still, as on his funeral day,
Men stand his cold earth-couch around,
With the mute homage that we pay
To consecrated ground."

Second only to Burns, is the airy, graceful sketch of Connecticut, or rather of her people; for whenever he touches external nature, he fails. There is a playfulness in this poem, and a quaint humor, half serious, half satirical, that please us much:—the likeness, though exaggerated, is very striking—so much so, that a native of that good old State is willing, with a self-complacent smile, to acknowledge his portrait. We shall quote a few stanzas:

"Theirs 'is a pure republic,' wild, yet strong,
A 'fierce democracie,' where all are true
To what themselves have voted—right or wrong—
And to their laws denominated blue.

* * *

A justice of the peace, for the time being,
'They bow to, but may turn him out next year;
They reverence their priest, but disagreeing
In price or creed, dismiss him without fear;
They have a natural talent for foreseeing
And knowing all things;

* * *

They love their land, because it is their own,
And scorn to give ought other reason why;
Would shake hands with a king upon his throne,
And think it kindness to his majesty;
A stubborn race, fearing and flattering none.
Such they are nurtured, such they live and die:
All—but a few apostates, who are meddling
With merchandize, pounds, shillings, pence and peddling;
Or wandering through the Southern countries, teaching
The A B C from Webster's spelling-book;
Gallant and godly, making love and preaching,
And gaining, by what they call 'hook and crook,'
And what the moralists call over-reaching,
A decent living.

* * *

But these are but their outcasts. View them near
At home, where all their worth and pride is placed;
And there their hospitable fires burn clear,
And there the lowliest farm-house hearth is graced
With manly hearts, in piety sincere,
Faithful in love, in honor stern and chaste,
In Friendship warm and true, in danger brave,
Beloved in life, and sainted in the grave.

And minds have there been nurtured, whose control
Is felt even in their nation's destiny;
Men who swayed senates with a statesman's soul,
And looked on armies with a leader's eye;
Names that adorn and dignify the scroll,
Whose leaves contain their country's history,
And tales of love and war—listen to one
Of the Green-mountaineer—the Stark of Bennington.

When on that field his band the Hessians fought,
Briefly he spoke before the fight began—
'Soldiers! these German gentlemen are bought

For four pounds eight and sevenpence per man,
By England's King—a bargain, as 'tis thought.
Are we worth more? Let's prove it now we can—
For we must beat them, boys, ere set of sun,
Or Mary Stark's a widow.' It was done."

In the last stanza, the often-told story is related with a very pleasant ease.

The "Field of the Grounded Arms," although the ear is unaided by recurring rhymes, is, as a whole, perhaps one of his most musical poems: its merit is in the harmony alone. It calls up no picture before us. We look in vain for battalions advancing with hostile front;—we see no flash, and hear no rattle of artillery—no bustle, and fury, and agony of war are there. A dense smoke, to speak figuratively, spreads over the whole field,—we may be told that in its heavy masses, a battle rages, but no stretch of the mind may give vision to the eye. We have scarcely a glimpse of the victors of Saratoga receiving the arms of the conquered enemy. In a word, the conception is feeble—the language felicitous.

Fanny is indeed a pleasing poem: like the Croakers, it may live a day, not an age. It has no depth of thought to perplex the mind—few flights of imagination to tire the fancy. It is a very discursive production, and entirely local in its character—Caught by a word at the close of one stanza, the author gets a new hint, and dashes on with a heedless jeu d'esprit, and in a vein, at times semi-serious, then comical, satirizes men, manners, and politics alike. The good temper that prevails in every stanza—the absence of envy, malice and hate, make this poem, at least where the characters are supposed to have lived, a general favorite. When those who engage its theme, however, are forgotten, as already most of them are, Fanny, like a faded belle, will sink

"Where cheeks and roses wither in the shade."

Yet there are some excellent passages in the poem. The following is very gracefully and feelingly expressed:

"There are some happy moments in this lone
And desolate world of ours, that well repay
The toil of struggling through it, and atone
For many a long sad night and weary day.
They come upon the mind like some wild air
Of distant music, when we know not where,
Nor whence, the sounds are brought from, and their power,
Though brief, is boundless."

Another passage, Weehawken, which gives a frontispiece to his latest volume, is also good; but its beauty lies in the richness of expression, not in the correctness of drawing:

"Weehawken! in thy mountain scenery yet
All we adore of nature is her wild
And frolic hour of infancy, is met;
And never has a summer's morning smiled
Upon a lovelier scene, than the full eye,
Of the enthusiast revels on—where high

Amid thy forest solitudes, he climbs
 O'er crags that proudly tower above the deep,
 And knows that sense of danger which sublimates
 The breathless moment—when his daring steps
 Is on the verge of the cliff, and he can hear
 The low dash of the wave with startled ear,
Like the death-music of his coming doom,
And clings to the green turf, with desperate force,
 As the heart clings to life; and when resume
 The currents in his veins their wonted course,
 There lingers a deep feeling—like the moan
 Of wearied ocean, when the storm is gone."

The above passage, often quoted by the admirers of Halleck, is, in some respects, a fair example of his style; which, though it will not stand the test of criticism, has captivated many readers. We have italicised some words,—the reason will be apparent at a glance.

Let us now turn to Marco Bozzaris, a poem which we are told many have praised as one of the noblest odes in the English language. It is a specimen of some of Halleck's greatest beauties and most glaring faults. The opening stanza is an admirable one; its grace and dignity please us so much, that we are disposed to overlook a false trope in this line:

"Then pressed that monarch's throne—a king!"

or, to notice the ambiguity of the phrase, which leaves the reader in doubt whether the Turk was dreaming of the throne of his liege, or of that to be erected in conquered Greece.

The second stanza begins thus:

"At midnight in the forest shades,
 Bozzaris ranged his Suliote band,
 True as the steel of their tried blades,
 Heroes in heart and hand."

The two first lines afford a pleasing contrast to the Turk in his guarded tent: the third line, by reason of its monosyllables, is unmusical, and the fourth is common-place. The rest of this stanza is not only inelegant, but it is incorrectly constructed; and the thought is overloaded with words. Let us examine it closely:

"There had the Persian thousands stood,
 There had the glad earth drank their blood
 On old Plataea's day;
 And now there breathed that haunted air
 The sons of sires who conquered there,
 With arms to strike and soul to dare
 As quick, as far as they."

As who? Let us render this passage into prose. In the forest shades the Persians fought at the battle of Plataea, and thousands were slain: now, the descendants of the conquerors stand on the same spot, as brave and daring as their forefathers. This we understand to be the meaning of the passage, but the author's verse does not express it.

"The sons of sires who conquered there,
 With arm to strike and soul to dare."

Are the patriots,

"True as the steel of their tried blades,
 Heroes in heart and hand?"

The same thought repeated in the same verse in different words. Besides, the attributes of the "arm" and "soul" are placed ungracefully in the line; and to "dare far" is an incorrect trope.

"As quick, as far as they."

They is ungrammatical: the author intends that "they" should relate to "sires," but it agrees with "sons"—for the phrase

"The sons of sires who conquered there"

does not in any manner identify the ancient warriors, but is merely a complimentary addition to the Suliote band.

The third stanza is beautiful, its language nervous and spirit-stirring; it is indeed worthy of high praise. On reading it, especially the closing lines, we feel as Sir Philip Sydney said he did on reading Chevy Chase. We cannot speak of the succeeding stanza in equal commendation:

"They conquered—but Bozzaris fell.

* * *

Then saw in death his eyelids close,
 Calmly, as to a night's repose,
Like flowers at set of sun."

This simile is not in good keeping: we may easily believe that a brave man, like Bozzaris, might die calmly, having done his duty nobly;—but we cannot imagine that his eyes would close at midnight, in the hour of battle and carnage and victory,

"Like flowers at set of sun."

The mind cannot be supposed to dally with flowers—not even to think of them, at such a moment. The figure is incorrect for another reason—it is not true: flowers do not close at set of sun.

The apostrophe to Death, prolonged through the two stanzas that follow the last referred to, are in themselves good, but we cannot commend the taste which introduced them where they appear. They stop the current of our feeling, and mar the unity of the ode. The concluding lines of the second, are musical in the sweetest degree: we cannot forbear to quote them, yet confess we should have praised them higher, if we had found them in a place more appropriate:

"Thy sunken eye's unearthly light
 To him is welcome as the sight
 Of sky and stars to prisoned men:
 Thy grasp is welcome as the hand
 Of brother in a foreign land;
 Thy summons welcome as the cry
 That told the Indian isles were nigh
 To the world-seeking Genoese,
 When the land wind from woods of palm,
 And orange groves, and fields of balm,
 Blew o'er the Haytian seas."

These, to our ear, are unquestionably the most musical lines that Halleck ever penned: we remember nothing superior to them, in harmony, in the whole range of modern verse. And yet, while praising them, we, almost unconsciously, ask ourselves, whither is the imagination hurried? Anywhere save to Greece, a midnight battle, and the death of a patriot hero.

The last stanza is cold and studied, and too redundant of honors to the hero's memory. It contains four lines which grate on our feelings very harshly, viz :

"She wore no funeral weeds for thee,
Nor bade the dark hearse wave its plume,
Like torn branch from death's leafless tree,
In sorrow's pomp and pageantry,
The heartless luxury of the tomb."

Our taste recoils at this image, stretched to its utmost : read the passage omitting these lines, and it is vastly improved. We shall not quarrel with some instances of loose construction in this stanza, nor with the couplet, so often quoted, which concludes the ode, viz :

"One of the few, the immortal names,
That were not born to die."

Names are never born, and what is immortal cannot die. Marco Bozzaris is nevertheless a very effective poem. A martial spirit and a lofty feeling pervade it, in parts, that have won troops of admirers. He who reads for pleasure only, while his judgment is not too critically enlisted, may be delighted. Again, to borrow an illustration from a sister art—it is scene painting, strong in colors, charming in effect, but not a cabinet picture.

In Alnwick Castle, the constant straining after contrasts and antitheses is very apparent—it lures him to place in anti-climax order, ancient and modern times. If the aim of poetry be to exalt and refine, then, this change from the virtuous and heroic days of the past, to the mean and mercenary trading of the present, is a fault—a fault not only in itself, but in its sudden, and we may add, its unnatural transition. Doubtless the author intended exactly what he achieved, but that does not affect the justice of our remark. We may be reminded, that Pope has said,

"A perfect judge will read each work of wit
With the same spirit that its author writ ;"

Or again—

"In every work regard the author's end,
Since none can compass more than they intend."

We admit, at once, the sageness of this advice ; but while we do so, maintain that we have a right to judge not only of the merit of an author's intention, but also of the manner in which he has accomplished it : and, if neither the end proposed, nor the mode of attaining it be worthy of praise, we may say so. Alnwick Castle, then, is not a poem of a high grade of excellence. Art, rejecting nature, may delight some, and startle others for a time ; but the world very willingly allows it to slumber with the forgotten past. Let us quote from this poem :

"Home of the Percy's high-born race,
Home of their beautiful and brave,
Alike their birth and burial place,
Their cradle and their grave."

The second and fourth lines simply repeat, by a sort of pleonasm that we cannot praise, the idea expressed in the first and third.

Another passage :

"And babe and sire, the old, the young,
And the monk's hymn, and minstrel's song,
And woman's pure kiss, sweet and long,
Welcome her warrior home."

And another :

"Of beings born and buried here,
Tales of the peasant and the peer,
Tales of the bridal and the bier,
The welcome and farewell."

In these quotations the alliteration and antithesis, if effective, are unnatural ; and if pleasing to the ear, do not convince the judgment. This style and taste characterize nearly all the writings of the author ; and with his harmony, as we said before, have won him an enviable reputation.

It would be a vain task, and perhaps an ungrateful one, were we to examine each poem separately. In support of some of the opinions which we have already expressed, it is, however, necessary that we should make a few brief quotations. They follow :

"Where skies are blue, and flowers are green."

———"o'er his head
The eternal flowers, whose root is in the grave.
The flowers of fame are beautiful and green."

"The rainbow beauty of the forest leaves."

"And wreath their light and shade o'er plain and mountain, O'er sleepless seas of grass, whose waves are flowers."

———"around her waist
A girdle of the hue of Indian pearls
Was twined, resembling the faint line of water
That follows the swift bark o'er quiet seas."

"There ever is a form, a face
Of maiden beauty in my dreams,
Speeding before me, like the race,
To ocean of the mountain streams."

"'Tis dim as the wandering stars that burst
In the blue of the summer heaven."

But why search farther ? These quotations, isolated ones we confess, show either inaccurate description, or unnatural similes.

The philosophy conveyed in the following quotations, we dare not commend. The first lacks delicacy of feeling, and the incongruity of images is apparent :

"Then crush even in their hour of birth
The infant buds of love,
And tread his glowing fire to earth
Ere 'tis dark in the clouds above."

*Cherish no more a cypress tree
To shade thy future years,
Nor nurse a heart-flame that may be Quenched only with thy tears."*

"Who will believe? Not I—for in deceiving Lies the dear charm of life's delightful dream."

Here must our extracts end. Having drawn the portrait of the poet in a light somewhat different, perhaps, from that in which he is generally seen, at least in one region, we have taken some pains to show from his writings the ground upon which we have proceeded: part of our paper, therefore, may appear more like a criticism than a picture. Some differing from us in judgment, may say, that we have not, like a true critic, remembered the lines of Dryden—

*"Errors like straws upon the surface flow,
He who would seek for pearls must search below."*

We have carefully examined every stanza that Halleck has published, and, with a feeling more willing to praise than disposed to censure, have, in the spirit of poetic justice, freely expressed our opinion. He has said himself—

*"I rhyme not for posterity,
Though pleasant to my heirs might be
The incense of its praise."*

*"No: if a garland for my brow
Is growing, let me wear it now
When I'm alive to wear it;
And if, in whispering my name,
There's music in the breath of fame,
Like Garcia's, let me hear it."*

He has indeed heard the voice of praise, certainly longer, and perhaps louder, than any other living poet of America—and yet we have never met with a critical analysis of his works. From this, as well as from his subjects, and the time selected to publish them, we have sometimes thought that his popularity is local, not general. He has not written enough to place him, hereafter, in a lofty station; nor will the themes which have engaged his pen, claim much attention from a coming age. He has written for the day; and in the peculiar vein which he has chosen, he is frequently very happy—but that vein is of a second-rate order. Halleck will not rank among the great poets of the land; but he may be remembered among the minstrels, when in after ages some compiler shall select from the writings of the early poets of America.

LOYALTY.

When the Marquis of Montrose, was condemned by his judges to have his limbs nailed to the gates of four cities, the brave soldier said, that 'he was sorry he had not limbs sufficient to be nailed to all the gates of the cities of Europe, as monuments of his loyalty.' As he proceeded to his execution, he put this thought into beautiful verse.

THE CIVIL LAW.

BY A LAWYER OF NORTH-CAROLINA.

An eminent historian has ventured the remark, that the Civil Law is doomed to speedy oblivion. How far an assertion so broad and unqualified in its character will compare with the uniform faithfulness of Mr. Hallam, can, with more correctness, be estimated, after we shall have examined the real excellence of this law; the many advantages attendant upon its growth and formation; its universality, as adapted to the necessities of nations; and the many revolutions, in government, religion, and learning, through which it has passed.

The worth of this system of laws is attested by its long existence, abounding with usefulness; by the pure philosophy contained in its elementary principles; and by the tenacity with which men and nations have adhered to these principles, as the great conservative power, amid the convulsive ebullitions, which, from time to time, have disorganized their social compact and relations.

No system of laws—so far as the memory of man extends—has ever existed, in which reason can claim a greater share; in which humanity has been more decorously consulted; and in which justice, their concomitant, has been more liberally infused. The grand distinction that prevails between the Civil and the Common Law, is, that in the formation of the one, its authors, taking for their guide the wisdom and integrity of a learned and moral people, arrived at the 'perfection of reason.' In the other, its early artificers were not unfrequently shrouded in the ignorance which characterized their age; and thus, very often, permanent enactments were made to effect temporary objects, favoring some particular individual or class. The cause of these enactments, in many instances, was soon forgotten; but their effects remained; and ever since, it has been the study of ingenious men to invent a reason for every such law; which reason, in all human probability, never entered into the calculations of the legislator who enacted it. Though the Common Law may arrogate to itself all that is beautiful and perfect in reason, its advocates may ransack philosophy, in order to find an established principle applicable to every rule therein expressed; yet to the contemplator of that venerable structure, it too often appears, when surveying the patchwork resorted to, to prevent conveyances in mortmain, and the many unexpected resources which the Statute of Uses introduced, that very much of this law is the result of accident. So complicated is that stern and inflexible system, that the introduction of a new regulation has often conflicted with standing rules of law; and the application of a remedy has been perverted, by the finesse of ingenious men, to the creation of still sorer evils than those it was intended to correct. These inconveniences, which perplexed the early writers on the Common Law, may safely be attributed to the slavish deference with which they regarded the Feudal Constitution. In this respect, at least, the Civil Law stands preëminent. No cumbrous relics of a barbarous age were blended with its foundation;—no time-honored monuments of ignorance and superstition remained to be battered down;—no privileged and intriguing associations had to be warred against. Unresisted in its progress, it gathered strength from its multifarious sources; and, impressed with the purity of the virtuous people for whom it was formed, it wielded a commanding influence, as well over the obdurate as the willing, over the contumacious as the obedient.

These sources of strength were principally the following:

The Leges. These were laws of the highest authority. They were enacted by the general voice of the Roman people, assembled together, and voting by centuries, or detachments of an hundred citizens each. This mode of legislating may, upon a superficial observation, appear to partake too much of that turbulent democracy, the progress of which, in later days, very justly excites the fears of those who are solicitous for the happiness of men. But sentiments of a far different character will be entertained, when the nature of this institution is better understood. These comitia, or assemblies, were divided into one hundred and ninety-six centuries, the bare moiety of which number—ninety-eight—was so arranged, as to contain, each, a majority of Patricians, Knights and wealthy citizens; and, when unanimous, the fate of all laws rested in their own hands. This was a most salutary regulation, and did more to protect property from violation by the hands of the ruthless and inconsiderate, than any feature that appears in the other institutions of antiquity.

That such was the very object intended to be effected, by those who constructed the comitia centuriata, may be justly inferred, from the words of Cicero himself—“Eosque ita disparabit ut suffragia non in multitudinis sed in locupletium potestate essent: curavit que, quod semper in Republica tenendum est, ne plurimum valeant plurimi.” The class thus distinguished were the only persons who at that period possessed any considerable amount of property; and it was nothing but justice to them to place in their hands the power of protecting it. The voice of the common people, however, was not entirely drowned, as will presently appear. This institution seems to partake somewhat of the American principle of checks and balances. The privileged orders and wealthy citizens acted as a check upon the violence and indiscretion of the mass; and the common people held the balance of power, whenever the ninety-eight centuries were divided upon any law of doubtful policy, which, in the nature of things, must have frequently been the case. Thus was blended, in the formation of an institution that contributed so largely to the structure of the Civil Law, an admirable proportion of arbitrary and democratic principles. The wisdom displayed in the construction of this noble institution cannot but be appreciated; and, as naturally as the cause follows the effect, the laws which emanate from this source must bear upon them the impress of the soundest reason.

The Plebiscita, or laws passed upon in the comitia tributa, formed, by no means, an insignificant contribution to the great body of the Roman law. These were simple assemblies of plebeians, in which the votes were taken per capita; they were formed for the purpose of protecting the common citizens from the encroachments of Patricians. Laudable as the objects of this institution may have been, yet our congratulations at the triumph of human liberty are wholly neutralized by the disappointment to which we are subjected, upon seeing how far this object failed of being attained. Nor is it surprising, when it is recollected that the laws passed in this assembly were binding only upon their authors; and, hence they could in no wise reach or affect the class of persons against whom their very existence was directed.

An amendment to the tribunitial power was deemed absolutely necessary, in order to render it of any avail whatever; and it was accordingly so effected, as to extend the influence of laws enacted in these assemblies, as well over Patricians as Plebeians. Even in this form it was objectionable; for it was wholly and thoroughly a democratical institution, and one that might have been highly injurious and tyrannical in its operations, had it not, contrary to the general disposition of such bodies, been impressed with its total inadequacy, to the task of enacting laws for a great people. To the very weakness of this body then, are we indebted for one of the most invaluable boons that the prodigality of past ages has conferred upon us.

It was at the solicitations of this body that the Senate was prevailed upon, in conjunction with the magistrates, to entertain the project of a written code, which should serve as the foundation of all Roman legislation. For this purpose, a deputation was appointed; and the result of its labors, as returned to the Senate for confirmation, was the famous Twelve Tables. Wise men, of every age, have paid a homage and reverence to this code, that entitle it to our respect and attention. The Romans clung to it with an affection that can only be accounted for by the soundness of its reason and the excellence of its philosophy. Old age loved it, because there the venerable in years read, among the accumulated wisdom of ages, lessons of experience, that found a congeniality within his own bosom. Youth revered it, because the diction was pleasant; and from infancy the young man had been taught to rehearse it, as a "carmen necessarium." The Ecclesiastics turned aside from their religious learning and doctrinal disquisitions, to behold in this code a solid blessing to the human race. In the general consternation of the Empire, they withdrew it from the rude approach of the barbarian, and fostered it with a reverential care, highly creditable to their enlightened understandings. Even men of the present day—an age of arrogated wisdom and originality—are constrained to acknowledge the fact, that much of the material that is contained in the Twelve Tables has, by the adroitness of modern ingenuity, been clad in a more exuberant robe and fascinating attire, and sent forth with the stamp of a later-day improvement upon it; being, in fact, only a corruption of the original purity and simplicity of this code.

Such being the general admiration of this body of laws, it is not to be wondered at, that many of its principles are to be found embodied in modern polity. But, notwithstanding the liberal manner in which men have borrowed from this code, there never have been wanting persons ready to denounce it as cruel and inhuman, adapted only to the government of semi-barbarians. This censure, though harsh in the extreme, may appear just to those who never sound deeper than the surface. The Twelve Tables might very justly warrant such a conclusion, by all those who only construe the law according to the simple letter. The reasons that we would urge, contra to this unqualified condemnation of the Twelve Tables, are the following:

That as only a portion of this law—the clause affecting insolvent debtors—bears the least semblance to cruelty, it would be inconsistent, and widely at variance with the general mildness of the whole, to give this illiberal construction. Such is the position occupied by Aulus Gellius; and no where have we, in clearer terms, the light in which the Romans themselves viewed this clause, and the manner in which it was actually administered, than in the following lucid extract, from that author—"eo consilio tanta immanitas poenae denunciata est, ne ad eam unquam perveniretur; dissectum esse antiquitus neminem equidem neque legi neque audiri."

The offence, too, which this so much stigmatized clause was intended to correct is of all others most prejudicial to trade. It may, at that particular time, have grown to an extent highly alarming to the legislators of the day, and was only to be checked by fierce and unrelenting remedies. In all probability, the bare existence of these remedies (as is frequently the case,) may have had the intended effect, without, for a single time, being put in requisition. Instances of a similar character, under similar circumstances, are of frequent occurrence in the English Law. Of this number, were the bloody statutes, making it a capital offence to all those who were found associating with wandering Gypsies for a longer time than two months. Yet this offence, taken singly and unconnected with others of the kind, was comparatively of little importance; but when it became as frequent as it was at the enactment of this law, it assumed a different character, and demanded a penalty sufficiently severe to prevent its repetition; which is a matter of discretion with the legislator. In like manner may be numbered the statute making capital the offence of stabbing without murder, although provoked to it by the insolent. This statute was caused by the frequent rencounters between the Scots and English, about the Court of James the first. But the cruelty of no law finds a parallel in the horrible punishment of the "peine forte et dure,"* which so long endured in the English Law; and for an offence which, at the present time, would be called slight and frivolous. From these instances it may be clearly inferred that the fixed rule of legislation, "that punishments should bear a proportion to crimes," is not always correct; but that punishments should be sufficiently rigid for the prevention of crime, will be found the more rational maxim.

These features of a law that has received universal praise and admiration, and whose supremacy of reason approaches the most skeptical with the imperious edict, non disputandum, will go far towards eradicating those feelings of aversion which may be engendered, when reading kindred clauses in the Romish Polity. And in fact, rather than condemn the severity of the jurisprudence of these respective states, men should receive it with the veneration to which an age of centuries entitles it, and draw therefrom lessons of wisdom flowing through channels of the purest philosophy. They should learn that inasmuch as the crimes of men are sore and unsightly, so also must harshness and severity pervade the whole frame of every wise and political system of laws. Penal enactments are never intended to operate upon the just and upright, but only on those, who, disregarding the dictates of morality, traverse all law, both natural and prescribed, and war against the dearest interests of society. Men who wilfully place themselves in such a position of defiance to social obligations, need only expect retaliation for injury; they cannot complain of the severest animadversions of the community. No matter what the offence may be, whether trivial or aggravated, society is invested with the right, inseparable from its very existence, to inflict just such an amount of punishment as is necessary for its prevention. From a combination of circumstances, punishments for the same offence must vary among different people. Statutes that are competent to prevent robbery in the highways about London, would be an insignificant barrier to the same offence in the mountains of Wales. So, also, laws which might check the fascinating practice of gaming among the cold and inexcitable inhabitants of Norway or Sweden, would be laughed at by the dissipated populace of the French Metropolis. In like manner the same regulations that are requisite in this age of perfected knowledge in commercial transactions, to secure creditors from the frauds of their debtors, and thus indirectly to prevent bankruptcy, would, for aught we know, have given but poor consolation to the distressed creditor, among the gambling and deluded speculators of the Roman Republic. With no severer laws than at present, the "superb bankrupt" might truly have dashed the mud from his chariot wheels, into the face of his ruined creditors.

* Peine forte et dure. Unless recently amended, this dreadful judgment is, to this day, required by the laws of North Carolina; for, if we mistake not, the terrible sentence of peine forte et dure was inflicted by one of her courts only a few years ago. When the prisoner was arraigned for trial, he stood mute and refused to plead either 'guilty' or 'not guilty.' Whereupon, he was laid on his back, upon the bare floor of the court house—great weights, as great, and greater than he could bear, were placed upon his body, and, in this condition, he was fed with ditch water from a spoon, till he died. We challenge the universal jurisprudence of modern Christendom to out-Herod this. We call upon our correspondent and every other friend to humanity to use their influence in erasing from the statute book of the good Old North State this disgraceful and barbarous penance.—[Ed. Soc. Lit. Mess.

Let none therefore, decry the law "de inope creditore," which was comprised among the collection of the Twelve Tables, till he be satisfied of the injury which the Republic sustained from that class of individuals, and of the quantum of punishment, that was necessary for the prevention of this evil.

The legislation of the tribunitial assembly, (which survived this period,) was very limited, so far as it relates to the Civil Law.

The "Decreta Senatus," or enactments of the Senate, comprehend many of the richest treasures of the Roman Law. And this institution, though one of the most important that marked the splendor of that day, needs but a short comment here; for the prejudices of men are apt to be enlisted in favor of laws emanating from that source; inasmuch, as a marked similarity may be observed between that body and modern legislative assemblies, that are in such high favor.

Yet, however much these bodies may be esteemed, I apprehend that the tinsel gloze of half their praise would vanish, were the mass of men aware of the fact, that more than three-fourths of the law by which their lives and property are protected, is manufactured by the interpreters themselves of the law. It is within the province of the judges, to place a construction upon legislative enactments, in the administration of the law, consonant to their own judgment: and in this construction they very frequently change the meaning, misdirect the purpose, and draw inferences, (and act upon them too,) that never entered into the calculations of the legislator. But however this may be, it is certain, that the Roman Senate, from the aforesaid cause, is extremely popular in modern times; and that part of the Roman law, at least, which owes its origin to this source, will be received with general admiration, without the assistance of any high wrought eulogy or tedious panegyric. Nor do we believe that it has acquired an unjust celebrity, for it may with propriety be termed the great palladium of Roman liberty. And in proof of the justice of this eminent distinction, not all the eloquence of the historian nor pathos of the orator will weigh so much with the discriminating mind, as the preponderating fact of its long endurance in the Roman State; for it was not consonant to the spirit of that people to break an alloy to their liberties. The same thunder which sounded the knell of monarchy, terminated the reign of the Seven Kings, and prostrated the family of Tarquins beneath the feet of private citizens,—these thunders would have hurled into atoms this institution also, had not wisdom, temperance and general usefulness marked its career. If the great Cæsar, with all his glittering honors and solid power, knew not how to rule a tyrant in Rome, what less than a supernatural power could have upheld, by any high-handed measure, a single political institution, whose very existence depended upon the favor which its merits created!

The constitution of the Senate was partly judicial and partly legislative. Though the combination of these two elements of government, is deprecated in the present advanced age of political wisdom, yet we will venture the remark, that the craft of man has kept pace with the most thrifty improvements in the science of government; and that that institution, though not impregnable to modern criticism, answered the ends of its creation more fully than those of modern refinement and perfection. The most notable instance of it, in a judicial character, is evinced in the prosecution of Cataline and his coadjutors by Cicero: and examples of its legislative character are abundant in the great collection of laws upon which we are now commenting.

The Responsa Prudentum were among the highest authorities which the Roman lawyers recognized; and when we reflect upon the manner in which these were prepared and published, we will be disposed to consider them of no little importance. After the plan of these legal opinions, has the whole of the Common Law of England been expounded, and presented to us, in its present tangible form. Bracton, Britton, Littleton and Coke are among the many who have followed the example of the Roman lawyers, in publishing Responsa Prudentum. Upon this point, hear Sir Edward

Coke himself:—"In the eleven books of our reports, we have related the opinions and judgments of others; but herein, we will set down our own." In the same manner that Sir Edward Coke "set down" his own opinions in the Common Law, so did the Roman lawyers set down theirs in the Civil Law; and three things, above all others, recommend them as possessing intrinsic value.

1st. By an edict of the Emperor Augustus, all persons were not allowed the privilege and distinguished honor of volunteering their opinions, for the purpose of embodying them, among the regular Responsa Prudentum; in this manner, all crude and imperfect opinions were excluded from that systematic arrangement of reason. 2nd. These opinions were gratuitous, and not shaped to suit the particular cases, and supply the demands of purchasers. No consideration was expected for them; and no action could be preferred, for the promise of reward for any such opinion; in this respect, they even excel the commentaries on the Common Law, for all of which a copy-right was secured at their publication. These are the principal reasons why the Responsa Prudentum were unbiassed in every respect; why they were looked upon as the true and unsophisticated sentiments of their respective authors; and why they were considered indubitable authority upon all matters of law. 3rd. The most exalted order of talents was engaged in publishing its opinions to the world; the occupation was esteemed highly honorable in the state; and it was a suitable employment for aged men, who had passed the greater part of their lives in the excitement of the Forum; and who, to prevent the mind from falling into too sudden a calm, would traverse, with the "mind's eye," the various scenes through which they had acted, and draw reflections therefrom, which, added to the store of their wisdom, contained vast and deep knowledge of the law.

To verify this conclusion, Cicero, as we are told, anxiously anticipated that period of his life, when, throwing off the immense responsibility that rested upon him, and subject no longer to the high expectations of a numerous train of clients, he would be at leisure to classify and expand the vast amount of legal information, acquired by diligent study and observation.

Nor did the Responsa Prudentum extend merely to the advancing of crude and theoretical opinions, but not unfrequently entire branches of the law were admirably commented upon by a single individual: that which from time immemorial had been practiced as law, was classified and arranged in such a manner as to be accessible to all: the customary constructions were placed upon ambiguous clauses, reasons were expounded for those passages which were otherwise unmeaning. In this manner the whole Civil Law was reduced to a system, as perfect as human invention could devise.

The imperfect idea which may be formed from this abridged sketch of the writings of the Jurisconsults, will serve to convince that they were by far the most valuable tributary to the Civil Law. They were the great reservoir to which was directed every channel of the Romish polity; they purified those portions which had suffered from ignorance and misconstruction, and ministered the whole, free from contamination, to all who turned to drink at the fountains of justice.

Thus have we noticed, severally, the principal sources whence the Civil Law derived its origin; and severally have we tested them, and proved them to be good. The inference then must force itself upon every one, that a system of laws which has so much of wisdom and justice in its formation, must be based upon a never failing foundation. For it is not the part of true wisdom to create that which will be smothered in the germ by its own imperfections. Ephemeral and transitory works alone are the offspring of an uncalculating rashness. And it would be contrary to the rules of cause and effect, if the Roman Law should meet with the early doom, which the English historian has prejudged as its fate.

The third division of our remarks brings us to the consideration of the universality of the Civil Law, as adapted to the necessity of nations. Montesquieu has remarked generally, that laws are peculiarly adapted to the particular nations which gave them birth, and are capable of influencing the social relations of no other nation, with the same harmony and effect. The general truth of this remark, we do not pretend to deny, but its total inapplicability to the Roman Law scarcely need be mentioned, in order to be seen. That law, which grew and flourished on the banks of the Tiber, and for fourteen centuries directed the destinies of a great people, which expanded at every step of advancement in society, and adapted itself to every change in the political system, has since pervaded the whole civilized world, and descended to some of the most enlightened nations of Christendom: it is replete with established truths and tried principles; and is considered as an invaluable legacy of the wisdom of former ages. The destinies of nearly every Catholic country on earth are swayed, at the present day, by its influence. From the mouth of the Tiber to that of the Mississippi, the Civil Law may be traced through multifarious nations of various governments, exercising over the whole its healthful and genial influence. It is as admirably adapted to those nations, where the mandate of the King is heard and obeyed with fear and trembling, as to those where all other authority is drowned in that of the voice of the people. Instead of being exclusively and inseparably connected with a city whose glory is fast fading from the earth, the Roman Law has become blended with the fate of many people; and its existence is coupled with the existence of nations that are yet in the vigor of youth. What revolution in the social organization of the world will be sufficiently great to exterminate a law that is so generally disseminated, and so admirably adapted to the necessities of the human race?

But there are other considerations connected with this subject, of a weightier character than any that have yet been touched upon;—arguments more forcible than any that ingenuity can invent. What are the varied scenes through which this law has passed? Empires have sprung into existence and again passed away, shocking the world with the throes of their last agonies: Monuments of human greatness have been reared, have flourished for a season, and tottered to the earth, leaving nought but a mournful sound to fill their place: Sciences have been introduced, disseminated and died: Theories have been formed and forgotten: Inventions have been made, continued for a season, and been superseded or neglected: Religion, with fierce destruction, has scourged the earth, in forms as various as the hues of the rainbow, and ephemeral as the stays of that misty covenant itself: In fine, while all else was changing, successively coming into life, and passing into death, there might be seen a monument, stern and inflexible, whose commanding eminence, unapproached by the resistance around, controlled circumstances, and shaped the course of events.—That monument was the Civil Law.

We have seen it sway the destinies of the Roman people, when Kings were their rulers and crowned heads their sovereigns. And that law, to which they gave birth, connived at the destruction of their successors, when they became unworthy of Rome. For a series of years have we seen it the guardian of the Republic, cherishing with tender care the growth of liberty, and administering to the various wants of a free people;—yet that law shrunk not, when the great Cæsar deprived his country of her liberties. We have seen it under the dynasty of the Emperors, securing to the subject the same invaluable blessings, and increasing, as ever, its own strength and effectiveness;—yet it died not, when the Roman people became extinct, but was grafted in the polity of many nations.

But its stability is more striking and instructive, when viewed in relation to the revolutions in religion, which it has withstood. Governments may change, and rulers pass into oblivion; but the laws of the governed remain: yet stable must be that polity which can withstand the current of religious enthusiasm; firmly set that law which in the same embrace can protect and cherish the Christian and the Heathen.

The laws of the Romans have, from time to time, tolerated every religion that a free people demanded, and regulated every moral code which they might select, to meet the wants and necessities of the Republic. We have seen them, with the wisest discrimination, appointing the dies fasti et nefasti, a priesthood and corps ecclesiastical, and erecting a temple to every god that a creative fancy might invent, or a superstitious people sanction:

—“fuit hæc sapientia quondam
Publica privatis secernere sacra profania.”

The same law that led the ox to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, offered burnt offerings upon the altars of the living God. The same law that persecuted the early advocates of the Christian faith, was seen directing the gloomy dominion of the same religion, while thundering its stern dictates to a trembling world. Whatever transformation the church of Rome underwent, this law always remained the same, pursuing the transcendently wise policy, that, let the people choose what religion they would, it was within the province of the law to obtain the best practical results, without assuming a hostile position towards the people whom it was intended to protect.

But there was another more general and terrific revolution, through which the Civil Law successfully passed. The gloom that brooded over the mind of man, after the sun of science had cast her last lingering rays back upon the shores of Italy, and set in the republics of Greece, had a destructive influence upon the learning of the world. Little escaped, unscathed by the universal wave of barbarism, that, through that night of darkness, storm and desolation, fearfully rolled over the seats where learning and order were wont to dwell. Not a ray of intelligence was left to guide the weary traveller through the dreary waste that stretched boundless, wherever the eye was turned. No school of philosophy existed in those tumultuous times. The beautiful symmetry of science was distorted into a thousand hideous forms. Her precepts, once connected in a regular gradation, were disjoined and isolated, in such a manner as to confound the wisdom of man. Favorite theories lost the beauty of their mechanism, and the practical results of their design were defeated.

But where, in this general confusion, was that Father of Sciences, the Civil Law? Did it yet exist, or had it long since perished in the great fall of empires? The strong arm of destiny had sustained it, and its genius, when emerging from the incumbent gloom that oppressed it, might have exclaimed, with the weatherbeaten Trojan:—

Quæque ipse misserima vidi,
Et quorum magna pars fui—
Quanquam animus meminisse horret, luctuque refugit.

When force was substituted for law, men had no farther use for the salutary regulations of this, the greatest of all laws; and then it was abstracted by the wise, from the prevalent pollution of the times, and deposited in the retired and peaceful abode of some religious house, to await the auspicious day when a peace and order-loving people should recall it from exile.

Finally, as the spell that bound the world for centuries dissolved, it emanated from its obscure retreat, dignified and glorious, like the great Father of Light rising from the waters of the ocean, dispelling the deep mist which the turbulent storm has left in its wake, and rendering to the weather-beaten mariner a genial ray, to redeem him from his misfortunes.

Not many years elapsed from this period, before the influence of the Civil Law was felt in almost every portion of the enlightened world, and was adopted by many nations, mutatis mutandis, as the great code by which their destinies should be swayed; and even the most supercilious finally conceded, that truth is not entirely destroyed by a change of venue, and, however paradoxical it may seem, that "reason in Italy is reason in England."^{*} Thus we see what the Civil Law has been; and, from the circumstances connected with its history, we at least fancy we see the hand of destiny, pointing to a far off period in the great arcana of the future, for the termination of its career. Many of the excellent truths contained in this system have become so vitally connected with the science of government, that it is morally impossible they should be entirely exterminated. And in view of this, we deem it a bold assertion in any one to pronounce a "speedy oblivion" to this noble science. On the contrary, it would be more compatible with reason to assert, that a law which has all the constituents of durability, so admirably blended—a law, stern enough for justice, yet mild enough for merely a law,—which claims for its authors the sages of Rome, the learned lawyers as its great support, will, while reason exists upon earth, have a place among men; will, as long as justice is respected, be consulted by the wise. Rome in its splendor has faded from the earth. What she was, is as a dream that haunts the memory of years past; but in her departure she has left more than the mere song of her glory. A twinkling star yet remains above the horizon, casting the light of ages around it, and gloriously reflecting upon the wisdom of the ancients.

TO MY OWN LITTLE GIRL.

BY MRS. E. J. EAMES.

"Now look on life—be strong!"—Mrs. Hemans.

Smooth, smooth are thy features my own little girl—
Gay, gay is the toss of each golden-hue'd curl—
Fair, fair is thy brow, and fresh thy young cheek—
Blue, blue doth the violet from thine eye speak—
Thy lips are like leaves from the dewy rose torn,
And thy breath is as sweet as the May scented morn.

Light, light are thy spirits my own little girl—
Pure, pure are thy thoughts as a sea-enshrin'd pearl—

* See Sir Wm. Jones on the Law of Bailments, p. 20.

Deep, deep in thy heart lies the fountain of truth—
Clear, clear it reflects thy most innocent youth.
Thy nature is gentle, confiding and warm,
And a mother's love circles thy step like a charm.

But the beauty and bloom of these hours will fade,
The cheek must grow pale, and the brow wear a shade,
The blue light of childhood will pass from thine eye,
And the rose on thy red lip all withering lie.
The spirits must droop, and the strong heart grow faint,
And thy thought may be sullied by earth's evil taint.

And the mother who shields thee so carefully now—
O! the Angel of Pain, hath mark'd on her brow,
In many a weary and unfailing sign,
That "dust unto dust" will its own soon consign!
And little thou know'st in a strange world like this,
What evils befall the poor motherless!

But when the cold clods of the valley are pil'd
Above me—O wilt thou remember my child,
The prayer that I taught thee, and still look above
To Him who will watch thee with unceasing love?
O worship and trust Him my own little girl,
And His Wing of Protection will o'er thee unfurl!

THE HAMADRYAD.

BY JOHN M'MULLEN, OF NEW-YORK.

The Sea-God sat in his cave so deep,
Where the troubled waves of ocean sleep,
And the storms forget to rave.
His sea-green robe from his shoulder hung;
The trident, across his knee, was flung,
That symbol of power, the waves among,
To ruin, or to save.
His beard was white as the foam of the sea,
And fell on his ample breast;
His white locks flowed on his shoulders, free;
On his brow was a crown all fair to see;
And the emerald-stone flashed brilliantly
That fastened his flowing vest.

But brighter far, was the Sea-King's eye,
All things in the wide, wide deep to spy—
From the uttermost wave, where the golden sun
Laves his foaming steeds when their race is run,
To the ocean-waters of far Cathay,
Where rosy Aurora leads in the day;
The rocks of earth, the clouds of heaven
By his piercing glance, at once, were riven;
The thronging deities, saw he all
In the home of Gods, high heaven's hall;
And deep 'neath the earth, all plain, I wis,
Were the hated realms of the gloomy Dis.

But now, that eye was beaming with good;
For the barks of Æneas, on ocean strewed,
He had saved from wreck by the tempest rude,
Which Æolus stern, for Juno, brewed,
And led them to Afric's shore.
He rested now on a throne, all grim,
Which ocean's waves had worn for him,
Where the surges loudly roar;
Nor hand of man, nor Elfin sprite
Had shaped the form, or the carvings light;
With ceaseless dash, did the waters lave
The fine blue rock, till a throne it gave Befitting the Lord of the Ocean-Wave.

On a throne of shells by Neptune's side,
 Amphitrite sat, his ocean-bride ;
 As bright in her beauty, as on that day
 When she stole the Monarch's heart away,
 As she bathed her limbs in the salt-sea spray,
 And Triton and Nereid thronged to pay
 Their court to the Ocean-Fair.
 Then, changed to a dolphin, he won her love ;
 And never, as hap'd in the heavens above,
 Did cause of quarrel their anger move,
 Or their fond truth impair.

The Water-Sprites and Ocean-Fays,
 Before them, sang their varied lays
 More sweet than tongue can tell.
 On Ocean's floor, the Nereids danced,
 So gracefully, the soul they tranced
 Like Circe's magic spell.
 And on the glassy sea, 'tis said,
 When Luna's silvery light is shed
 Upon the West's slight tint of red,
 From Sol's departed rays,
 The sailor-youth, at times, doth see
 Their Ocean-dance and revelry,
 Through twilight's dreamy haze ;
 And fitting forms before him gleam
 More gay and bright than youthful dream.
 Then thoughts of home and early love
 Have vanished like the clouds above.
 With thrilling frame and fixed eye,
 Of mad'ning joy one piercing cry,
 He plunges in the deep.
 Above his form the bubbles rise,
 The dancing waves enjoy the prize,
 And then the waters sleep.

Beyond these forms so bright and gay,
 The Ocean-Monsters were at play :
 Behemoth there, from his distant lair,
 Awaited his Lord's behest ;
 And the sea-snake wound his scaly round
 And reared his blood-red crest ;
 'Bout the island-back of the sluggish whale,
 The Nautilus roamed with its tiny sail ;
 And the large round eye of the sea-calf there,
 Gazed on the pride of the ocean-fair ;
 While amongst them all, at his mistress' call,
 The Dolphin doth lightly skim,
 Her message to bear to earth or air,
 Or obey her slightest whim.

But a form is moving on ocean's sand,
 That claims it not as her father-land ;
 Her vesture light is a leafy green,
 And the garland that decks her brown locks sheen,
 Was plucked from the olive tree.
 Her hazel eye is glistening bright,
 Like the star of eve in the van of night ;
 Her form is glowing with beauty's light ;
 Her step is firm and free.
 But her brow is bent with a look of fear,
 And her eye is bright with a gleaming tear,
 Her dark brown hair hangs loosely down,
 And frayed and torn is her olive crown.

She moved in haste through the waters blue ;
 'Mongst the Ocean-Monsters, she darted through ;
 And, his warning shell as the Triton blew,
 She stood amid the throng.
 "Who art thou of another mould
 "That darest to tread in our watery wold
 "And our Ocean-Halls among ?"

The fear that before, her nerves unstrung
 Broke out at length on her faltering tongue,
 In his ears her voice all sweetly rung,
 As she dropped the pearly tear.

"Oh ! Help me God of the waters wide
 "That check'st the streams in their gushing tide ;
 "Oh ! Mighty King, give ear.
 "I am the nymph of an olive tree
 "That flings its fruitful branches free,
 "On a mountain old in Arcady,
 "By the side of a tumbling rill.
 "But the rains have swollen the streamlets tide,
 "And nothing now can its fury bide,
 "Or check its wanton will ;
 "The rocks, though huge, it is rolling along,
 "And is stronger e'en than the oak so strong ;
 "Full soon it will reach my olive tree,
 "And its fall, thou knowest, is death to me.
 "Then haste, oh ! haste thee, King of the Waves,
 "And make me humblest of thy slaves."
 "Thou ! thou wast born Minerva's slave ;
 "Why dost thou come to the Lord of the Wave ?
 "Go to the Goddess of learning and looms,
 "Where at Juno's taunts she frets and fumes,
 "And flings her flute away.
 "When for Athens we strove, the Olive she made,
 "And the crooked decree of the Deities said
 "The bounding steed yields to the olive tree ;
 "To her then, haste, and pray."

Amphitrite marked his visage stern,
 And milder purpose doth discern.
 Her throne she left, adown she flung,
 His knees she clasped, her loved voice rung.
 "Nay, cast unworthy thoughts aside,
 "And be as thou hast been, my pride.
 "Oh ! give not way to jealous hate ;
 "Nor anger, on the helpless, sate,
 "Save from the roaring torrents' flood ;
 "For I know thy heart delights in good."

The Monarch smiled as her voice he heard ;
 For ever his inmost soul it stirred,
 As he gazed adown on her beauteous face,
 Of anger departed the slightest trace.
 "Thy quest is granted thee ; hie away
 "To thy native realms in the upper day,
 "The dreaded wave shall flee."
 With a cry of joy, she bounded away,
 In haste, to the realms of upper day,
 And trod the greenwood joyously.

Dread Neptune gave the awful nod
 That stamps the sanction of a God ;
 A trembling goes through the vasty deep,
 And the troubled monsters of ocean creep
 From their beds in the oozy slime.
 The surges roared with a louder roar,
 As they dashed the wave against the shore
 And flung aloft the brine.
 And quaked the earth at the mighty sign,
 And bowed beneath the will divine.
 And the mountain old in Arcady,
 Where dwelt the nymph of the Olive tree,
 Was cloven wide where the torrent gushed,
 And into a cavern grim it rushed ;
 That led to the Ocean strand.
 And still, 'tis said, that cavern grim
 Its rushing waters flow within,
 And flow beneath the land.

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

To T. W. WHITE, Esq.

Editor Southern Literary Messenger.

SIR:—As the happy consequences of our Revolution expand and multiply, interest in its history naturally increases. As the feeling which prompts this is laudable and useful, to gratify it seems to be equally a duty to those who achieved, and to those who enjoy the success of our great struggle. But in one respect the same fate, to some extent, attends all great events as well as great personages. The importance of neither is sufficiently felt, before the traces of their earlier progress begin to be obliterated. Could Shakspeare's fame have been foreseen at his birth, what minute accounts should we now have of him through all those stages of existence, which he has so happily portrayed, from "the nurse's arms," to the "last scene of all that ends this strange, eventful history!"

And how does the world regret that all the information we have of him amounts to so very little! So too of empires that have passed away. How are monuments examined, tombs explored, ruins excavated, deserts traversed, hieroglyphics studied, papyri unrolled, to find slight traces of the generations that have passed, and of works which adorned them! What would not the world now give for a letter from the elder Brutus, or for articles of an association to resist the tyranny of the Tarquins! Yet, if we may judge of its ultimate consequences from those which have already followed our Revolution, it appears certain, that a deeper interest must hereafter attach to its history, than now belongs to that of the kingdom of Sesostris, or the Commonwealth of Rome.

If this be so, it is a solemn duty to posterity, for the present generation to preserve all the memorials it possesses, of the origin and progress of that event. It is believed that diffidence, indifference, or a spirit of procrastination which is akin to it, permits to remain amidst the lumber of old papers, and in the perishable shape of unmultiplied manuscripts, letters and documents, which would be valuable materials to the historian; and, through him to the artists, who, with the pencil, the chisel, and the pen, reflect to the eyes or the fancies of mankind, the light of exalted example, and the glory of illustrious deeds. Historical societies are formed for the preservation of such records; but old M.S.S. are almost as hidden and insecure in their archives, as in those from which they are thither removed.

The best way to preserve a document is to multiply it; and that may be done with convenience to the owner, and benefit to the public through the popular periodicals of the day. The originals of the papers thus published, might then properly enough be placed in possession of historical societies, college libraries, or the collections of the curious in such matters.

Actuated by the views above expressed, I offer for publication, to the Literary Messenger (which seems to be the most appropriate periodical for the purpose,) four papers. The first three will perhaps establish that the earliest organized and actual opposition to the Stamp Act, (the first step in the attempted tyranny of the mother country,) which was made in Virginia, and perhaps in any of the Colonies, took place in the county of Westmoreland.

The first of these papers appears to be the rough draft of the resignation of the magistrates of that county. It is without date or signature, and in these words:—

"We, the undersigned, magistrates of Westmoreland, think it highly expedient to give your Honors this timely information, that after the first day of November next, we are resolved, no longer to act in that capacity. Because, from that period the Act for establishing Stamps in America commences, which Act will impose on us a necessity of either not conforming to its directions; or, by doing so, to become instruments in the destruction of the most essential rights and liberties of our country. Therefore we are compelled, although animated by the firmest principles of loyalty to his Majesty, and veneration for the excellent constitution under which we have hitherto lived, to decline an office, which honor and virtue forbid, but which, as magistrates, our oaths would enforce the execution of."

From the contents of this paper it is obvious that it was written before November 1765—that being the period when the Stamp Act was to go into operation.

The next is a letter from Mr. Thomas L. Lee, in these words—

"MY DEAR BROTHER,

"I have conferred with T. Mason, W. Brent and C. Bullett, upon the subject of your letter, and we have concluded that the most effectual, and in all respects, the most advisable method will be to pay Mr. R. a visit; and to insist on a declaration from him in writing, expressing the deepest sorrow for having formed so execrable a design, and promising in the most solemn manner, never to use the Stamp Paper unless authorized by the Assembly of Virginia. The two gentlemen first mentioned are gone this day to Prince William, Fairfax and Loudoun, to engage a band of choice spirits. I shall send an express to morrow to T. Bullett in Fauquier, and will, besides, communicate the plan to such others in this county as I think worthy to be employed in so noble a business. We propose to be in Leedstown in the afternoon of the 27th inst., where we expect to meet those who will come from your way. R's profligacy is rather to be esteemed fortunate. The genius of liberty requires to be awakened; and this wretched Scotchman has afforded the sons of freedom a just occasion to rouse that generous fire, which is thought to be extinguished among us. Something too should be done with eclat, to restore us the esteem of our brothers on the continent. Another advantage will arise from it. Every infamous favorer of the Stamp Act, must know, that active minds are not wanting, who watch over their country's safety; and that every attempt, every declaration of the abandoned purpose, will surely expose to danger and disgrace. In short, nothing contributes more than achievements of this kind, well timed and prudently conducted, to animate the virtuous and deter the profligate.

"It is proposed that all who have swords and pistols shall ride with them; and those who choose it, a firelock. Some precaution of this kind may be necessary, as R., should he get intelligence, may, if surrounded by his fierce North-Britons, sustained by the crews of some vessels, with arms in their hands, reduce us to the necessity of a shameful retreat. This is not very probable; but the infant struggles of freedom should not be exposed to the possibility of a defeat.

"This will be a fine opportunity to effect the scheme of an association, and I should be glad you would think of a plan.

"The boy will bring you the grafts and check reel. We are all well here, and have the kindest wishes for you and Mrs. Lee, not forgetting my little blue eyed Amy, Ludwell and Bess.

I am, my dear brother's,
most affectionately.

(Signed) THOMAS L. LEE.
Thursday night."

The next document contains, probably, the scheme of the association referred to above. It is interlined in one or two places in the hand-writing of Richard Henry Lee, and he is the first subscriber. It is therefore, probably, from his pen; it is dated Feb. 27th, 1766. From this, we ascertain that the brother to whom the above letter was addressed, was R. H. Lee; and that it was written previously to Feb. 27, 1766. The articles of association are as follows—

"Roused by danger, and alarmed at attempts, foreign and domestic, to reduce the people of this country to a state of abject and detestable slavery, by destroying that free and happy constitution of government, under which they have hitherto lived. We, who subscribe this paper, have associated, and do bind ourselves to each other, to God, and to our country, by the firmest ties that religion and virtue can frame, most sacredly and punctually to stand by, and with our lives and fortunes, to support, maintain, and defend each other in the observance and execution of these following articles.

"First. We declare all due allegiance and obedience to lawful Sovereign, George the third, King of Great Britain. And we determine to the utmost of our power to preserve the laws, the peace and good order of this Colony, as far as is consistent with the preservation of our Constitutional rights and liberty.

"Secondly. As we know it to be the Birthright privilege of every British Subject, (and of the people of Virginia as being such) founded on Reason, Law, and Compact; that he cannot be legally tried, but by his peers; and that he cannot be taxed, but by consent of a Parliament, in which he is represented by persons chosen by the people, and who themselves pay a part of the tax they impose on others. If therefore, any person or persons shall attempt, by any action or proceeding, to deprive this Colony of those fundamental rights, we will immediately regard him or them, as the most dangerous enemy of the community; and we will go to any extremity, not only to prevent the success of such attempts, but to stigmatize and punish the offender.

"Thirdly. As the Stamp Act does absolutely direct the property of the people to be taken from them without their consent expressed by their representatives, and as in many cases it deprives the British American Subject of his right to trial by jury; we do determine, at every hazard, and, paying no regard to danger or to death, we will exert every faculty, to prevent the execution of the said Stamp Act in any instance whatsoever within this Colony. And every abandoned wretch, who shall be so lost to virtue and public good, as wickedly to contribute to the introduction or fixture of the Stamp Act in this Colony, by using stamp paper, or by any other means, we will, with the utmost expedition, convince all such profligates that immediate danger and disgrace shall attend their prostitute purpose.

"Fourthly. That the last article may most surely and effectually be executed, we engage to each other, that whenever it shall be known to any of this association, that any person is so conducting himself as to favor the introduction of the Stamp Act, that immediate notice shall be given to as many of the association as possible; and that every individual so informed, shall, with expedition, repair to a place of meeting to be appointed as near the scene of action as may be.

"Fifthly. Each associator shall do his true endeavor to obtain as many signers to this association, as he possibly can.

"Sixthly. If any attempt shall be made on the liberty or property of any associator for any action or thing to be done in consequence of this agreement, we do most solemnly bind ourselves by the sacred engagements above entered into, at the utmost risk of our lives and fortunes, to restore such associate to his liberty, and to protect him in the enjoyment of his property.

"In testimony of the good faith with which we resolve to execute this association we have this 27th day of February 1766 in Virginia, put our hands and seals hereto.

If it be interesting to discover in the earlier poems of Milton, indications of that imagination which lavished its superlative treasures on the Paradise Lost, and the very expressions which sound along the lines of that sublime poem, it cannot be less so, to remark in the beginnings of a great event, the spirit which produced its consummation, and the phrases which were watchwords of its success! Every reader of the foregoing resolutions will discern in them that tone of feeling and eloquence, whose fuller development elevated their author into being chosen to move the declaration of Independence; and will remark too, characteristics of the phraseology of the renowned instrument which embodied it. Taken together with the resignation of the magistrates, and Mr. Lee's letter, this document sufficiently establishes the fact of an organized resistance, in the county of Westmoreland to the first act of the mother country, in that series of attempted oppressions which ended in the overthrow of her authority. To Mr. Henry seems to belong the immortal honor of first raising his voice against them. This occurred in the session of the General Assembly preceding the date of this instrument, which was held in May 1765. But the resolutions he then introduced and procured by his matchless eloquence to be passed were confined to a remonstrance against the Stamp Act, and can scarce be said to have pointed at violent resistance. The gentlemen of Westmoreland appear to have gone further, and to have arrested the operation of the obnoxious law in that county; of which it may be said that it never, for a moment, at any period of its history, has submitted to unconstitutional government.

TO COL: LANDON CARTER OF SABINE HALL.

Chantilly, June 22nd 1765.

DEAR SIR: Is it true, that one of the best friends, as well as one of the most able of the community, intends to quit the service of his country at this most important crisis; when every mental, every corporeal faculty, that America possesses, should be strained to support its falling rights, against tyrannic power, in opposition to the most palpable privileges of human nature, the legal rights of America, and the constitutional freedom of British subjects? I yet hope, my friend, that you have only thought, not determined, on declining to take a poll at the ensuing election. When the cause of our dissolution is known, will ministerial cunning fail to suggest, that the people of Virginia disavow their Burgesses' claim to freedom, if a considerable change is made by them in their choice of new Representatives? Let us remove from despotism, every show of argument, and let us endeavor to convince the world that we are as firm and unanimous in the cause of Liberty, as so noble and exalted a principle demands.

The enclosed pamphlet is said to be written by the first Minister of Britain. If no better reasons can be assigned to support the measure he contends for, a strong proof is to be drawn from thence, of its intrinsic vileness. It shows indeed, that systems calculated to destroy Human Liberty, can only be maintained by vain sophistry and an idle affectation of wit, without one single ray of wisdom; and that such doctrines are as far remote from true policy, as they are closely connected with the futile genius of a dealer in expedients, who never is able, and seldom willing, to draw the necessary supplies of govt. from such sources only, as are consistent with the end of all govt., the safety, ease, and the happiness of the people.

I would recommend the pamphlet to your attention, not for its merit, but that it may receive a proper answer; and such an one it easily admits of as would make its author blush, if it be possible for a Minister to blush. But though an answer might fail to do this, it will certainly have weight with the cool and sensible part of mankind, and thereby perhaps, prevent the future extension of arbitrary unconstitutional power.

I am with the most perfect esteem, dear sir, your ever affectionate friend.

(Signed) RICHARD HENRY LEE.

Chantilly, Aug. 15th 1765.

DEAR SIR: I accidentally met with your favor the other day, and have now sent the book you were pleased to lend me in town. 'Tis well written, and should be well studied in these times, when the true nature of that Liberty should be understood, which our enemies beyond the water are so unjustly depriving us of. I am told that a gentleman in the North has so effectually and forcibly answered G. Grenville's pamphlet, that even the Minister himself, supported by his crew of hireling miscreants, dares not attempt a reply. In time to come, it may be known, and sensibly felt, I hope, that America can find arms as well as arts, to remove the demon slavery from its borders. If I should live to see that day I shall be happy; and pleased to say with Sydney, "Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

Farewell, that you may be happy as you can wish, is the earnest desire of your affectionate friend.

RICHARD HENRY LEE.

From the same to the same.

Chantilly, Feby. the 2nd 1766.

DEAR SIR: Tired at length with vain expectation, I have determined to make that opportunity I have so long waited for, to answer your obliging favor of Novr. last. I am not surprised that your good sense should lead you to disapprove the proceedings that gave rise to the Gazette extraordinary. Absurdities are there too plain to be missed, nor do I hesitate to agree entirely with you in sentiment on that affair.

But what, my friend, is to be the issue of all this? Are we really to be enslaved by part of our own community, as a grateful return for the benefits they have derived from the danger and enterprize of our fathers? And have we hitherto been suffered to drink from the cup of Liberty, that we may be more sensibly punished by its being withdrawn, and the bitter dregs of servility forced on us in its place? This truly will be adding wanton cruelty to excessive injustice. Indeed, every account seems to confirm their intention of abolishing our Liberty by the establishment of the most oppressive Acts,—for laws I cannot call them, as I agree altogether with their own maxims, Nihil quod est contra rationem est licitum, quia ratio legis est anima legis. This rule of judging the law should be applied to the making it also. Unhappily for us, Fortune, or whatever Being presides in such cases, seems to favor these detestable designs. Else, why are Devonshire, Cumberland and Churchill numbered with the dead, whilst Bute, Grenville and Townshend (I mean Charles), not only live, but live in power? You may judge what profit we can propose to receive from memorials, however fraught with reason, or filled with justice, when a gentleman, well informed, writes me from London in October last—"That every argument which zeal and reason could suggest was urged in vain to oppose the Stamp Act whilst it was under consideration; and that one of the Ministry being much dissuaded from specifying the mode of taxation—the Minister replied passionately—"G—d d—m them; we will shew them that we have power to tax them, and will tax them." I think this is more the breath of brutality than it is the voice of reason, and when brutes are allowed to govern men, deplorable, no doubt, must be the consequence.

I want greatly to see you, that we may converse seriously on this greatly important business, and I think of waiting on you as soon as my shoulder (lately hurt by a gun), permits me to travel.

I sent your packet for Mr. Green by a safe hand with charge not to let it contribute to establish despotism by going into the Post-Office. The bearer brings a letter for your son, which please deliver him with my compliments. The family at Sabine Hall have always my best wishes. I am, my dear sir, your ever affectionate friend.

(Signed) RICHD. HENRY LEE.

P. S. Can you spare me, for a short time, Churchill's Prophecy of Famine, and his poem on Retirement?

R. H. LEE.

The fourth and last of these papers is unconnected with the transactions to which the others refer, but it is addressed to one of the chief actors in them, and refers so agreeably to another, that this may be as appropriate an occasion, as may speedily occur of submitting it to the public; and so few of the letters of Patrick Henry are in existence, and they are so eagerly sought for, that an apology would be rather necessary for withholding than for publishing it. It is addressed to Col: R. H. Lee, and is as follows:

Wmsburgh may 20th 1776.

DEAR SIR: Your two last favors are with me; and, for them both, I give you many thanks. Ere this reaches you, our resolution for separating from Britain, will be handed you by Col. Nelson. Your sentiments as to the necessary progress of this great affair, correspond with mine. For may not France, ignorant of the great advantages to her commerce, we intend to offer, and of the permanency of that separation, which is to take place, be allured by the partition you mention? To anticipate therefore, the efforts of the enemy, by sending instantly American Ambassadors to France, seems to me absolutely necessary. Delay may bring on us total ruin. But is not a confederacy of our states previously necessary? If that could be formed, and its objects for the present be only offensive and defensive, and guaranty respecting Colonial Rights, perhaps dispatch might be had, and the adjustment of Representation and other lesser matters, be postponed without injury. May not the Fishery be a tempting object? I think from the great French force now in the West Indies, some person, of eminent rank must be there to guide it. The Mississippi should be tho't of. I thank you for the hint of the back lands. I gave an opinion, as a lawyer, to Brent on the subject of his and Croghan's purchase, and notwithstanding solicitations from every great land company to the West, I've refused to join them. I think a general confederation of Royal and British property should be made. The Fruits would be great, and the measure, in its utmost latitude, warranted by the late act of Parliament. The great work of forming a constitution for Virginia is now before the convention, where your love of equal liberty and your skill in public counsels, might so eminently serve the cause of your country. Perhaps I'm mistaken, but I fear no great a Bias to Aristocracy prevails among the opulent. I own myself a Democratic on the plan of our admired friend J. Adams, whose pamphlet I read with great pleasure. A performance from Philaa. is just come here, ushered in, I'm told, by a colleague of yours B—— and greatly recommended by him. I don't like it. Is the author a whig? One or (two) expressions in the Book make me ask. I wish to divide you, and have you here to animate by your manly eloquence, the sometimes drooping spirits of our country, and in Congress to be the ornament of yr. native country, and the vigilant determined foe of Tyranny. To give you colleagues of kindred sentiments, is my wish. I doubt you have them not at present. A confidential agent of the matter to Col. Tom desiring him to use it according to his discretion, might greatly serve the public and vindicate Virga. from suspicions. Vigor, animation, and all the powers of mind and body, must now be summoned and collected together into one grand effort. Moderation, falsely so called, hath nearly bro't on us final Ruin. And now those who have so fatally advised us, still guiding, or at least sharing our public counsels, alarms me. Adieu my dear sir, present me to my much esteemed F. L. L. and believe me

Yr. very affect. and obliged

All the above papers, except the letters of Richard H. Lee, were found among others, obtained by the late Genl. Henry Lee, from his illustrious relative R. H. Lee, probably at a time when he contemplated a more extended work on the Revolution than he accomplished in his limited memoirs. From him, they descended to his son Henry, from whom they came to me. The letters of R. H. Lee were obtained from Col. R. W. Carter of Sabine Hall, to whom they descended from Col. Landon Carter, to whom they were addressed. As materials for history, and to preserve them, I offer them to the public, Mr. White, through your valuable periodical. To authenticate them it may be proper to add my name. If so, you can do it.

CHARLES CARTER LEE.

THE ENTHUSIAST—AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

BY J. ROSS BROWNE.

It cannot be too deeply impressed on the mind, that application is the price to be paid for mental acquisitions; and that it is as absurd to expect them without it, as to hope for a harvest where we have not sown the seed.—Bailey's Essays.

I.

While many, of higher pretensions than I can boast, have passed away much of their life in the refined circles of fashionable society, I have been content to spend my leisure hours in solitary and pleasing thought. Nevertheless, it has been my fortune through life to be associated with a great variety of characters—from the political lion, whose stentorian voice resounds over the Union, to the most insignificant biped that 'ever trod shoe-leather.' My catalogue of acquaintances has many oddities of character in it. By far the most numerous of these, however, consist of poets, painters, critics, amateur musicians, and scribblers for fame. Without an exception, ambition is their ruling desire; and each secretly indulges in the hope, that he is destined to outstrip his fellows in the march of intellect. Surrounded from early youth by such persons as these, it cannot be wondered that I have imbibed many of their peculiarities, and shades of thought. My object in giving this cursory autobiography to the world, is to show the varied effects of an enthusiastic temperament, and to delineate, in some measure, the class to which I belong.

What little I know of my genealogy, would be uninteresting to the reader. I shall therefore dispose of this part by simply referring to the fact, that before I was fifteen years of age, Providence, at the death of my parents, left me to shift for myself. Unfortunately, I was not what is termed a quick-witted youth, being shy and silent, though sanguine in my disposition; and hence my education had been entirely neglected. No one could discover in any thing I undertook, whether to wrestle, jump, or deliver an extemporaneous speech in a Juvenile Lyceum, of which I was a member, the slightest promise of future excellence, physical or mental. This did not discourage me. I secretly enjoyed the belief that I was destined to be the envy and the admiration of mankind. For hours would I, in some pleasant alcove near my native village, indulge in those delightful flights of fancy which have tended so much to mislead me through life.

I have alluded to the neglect of my education. It must not be inferred, however, that I was altogether illiterate. How I learned to read, I can hardly say. If I may be excused a little egotism, I think I never did learn to read; for it strikes me I always knew something of that branch of a literary education. The village library, to which I had access, contained many tempting productions. Among the most useful of these were biographies, and sketches of distinguished poets, painters, and musicians. I had a peculiar taste for this sort of reading. Nothing in the range of fiction, possessed half so many charms for me, as the romantic career of a neglected genius—especially as I imagined my own life was destined to be fraught with similar interest.

The great Italian painters, whose history afforded me most unbounded pleasure, I looked upon as men inspired and godlike—to whose merits, no human tribute could do justice. Those quaint English poets, from the time of Chaucer to that of the great dramatist, seemed to me to be touched with the true spirit of poetry and romance; and in their lives, I found but a realization of the ideals which existed in their works. Mozart, Hayden, and all the great masters of harmony, were men for whom I entertained the most enthusiastic admiration. I needed but to read their biographies, and find myself transported into a world of euphony, in which the soul could revel in harmless yet intoxicating delight. Hoffmann, who combined so many of my favorite attributes, was an author whose devotion to music, and strange, eventful career, filled my mind with a thousand conflicting sensations. I almost adored him for his genius; and while I deprecated his vices, I must confess they afforded me the most intense interest. Thus, caring little whether my heroes—for the exuberance of my imagination caused me to view them in that light—were of the Sunny South, of the land of mystic fancy, or of that hallowed by the great masters of philosophy and song—I lived in a world, whose shadowy, spirit-like inhabitants, were my Vinci. But here it was that the little god Cupid stepped in and frustrated all my arrangements.

The old gentleman who took such an interest in my welfare, was not only generous but wealthy. I believe I have hitherto omitted to mention his name, which was Belfin. Owing to his kindness, I spent many happy hours at his house; and it was there I first met her, who may be regarded as the heroine of my narrative. The practice of describing a beauty has become somewhat trite; but as a description is generally looked for, I cannot evade paying a slight tribute to the charms of my dulcina.

Fayette Belfin—a pretty name, by the way—was of course a most bewitching little creature. If I should describe her as my heart dictates, I would be thought very extravagant; but I promise the courteous reader, what I intend to say, shall be pure matter of fact.

Imagine her about the height of Pauline Bonaparte, or, to be classical, of Cleopatra—just sufficiently tall for a perfect beauty. She was perfectly formed—the first and most important consideration. A full, snowy, voluptuous bosom; a most exquisitely rounded arm; and, altogether, a cast of enbon-point truly captivating, were the chief characteristics of her person. Her face was purely classical in its contour. I think I never saw features more delicately chiselled. The lips were just of that delicious shape and color, which an enthusiastic admirer of beauty would delight to press in a “Long, long kiss of youth and love.”

She had a fair skin; and a complexion of that warm, loving richness,

“Which wakes the wish, and melts the heart.”

Her eyes were blue. I have a partiality for blue eyes. Within Fayette's, sat the mischievous little god, shooting arrows of love into every tender heart. Her heart was formed, phrenologically speaking, for love and poetry; and her brilliant brown hair indicated the warmth of her temperament. I soon discovered that her disposition was exactly in accordance with this description.

To make an end of the matter, I fell desperately in love with this little goddess of beauty. But ‘the course of true love never did run smooth,’ and circumstances made it necessary that I should leave N—— forever.

V.

Slender as my resources were, I managed to reach the place of my destination—a village most romantically situated on the Ohio. I had heard so much of the scenery surrounding this place, and was so ardent an admirer of the picturesque, that I made it my embryo residence. I was not disappointed in my expectations, respecting the scenic beauty of the village. It was really a spot upon which nature had lavished her choicest charms.

There was one moonlight scene, and an event connected with it, which I can never forget.

Having succeeded in procuring a situation as assistant teacher in the village school, I found myself at leisure every evening to indulge in my favorite rhapsodies. I usually devoted an hour to traversing the neighboring cliffs, and admiring the splendors of a Western sunset; or musing in some leafy glen, over undefined aspirations of future greatness. The scene to which I have alluded, was one well calculated to inflame my romantic imagination.

Late one night, I wandered to the highest cliff in the neighborhood of the little village in which I sojourned. The moon was just peeping over a distant hill, giving a ghost-like appearance to the tall trees intervening; and gilding the Ohio, which swept in graceful curves beneath me, with such brilliant light, that it well merited its title—the “Silver Wave.” Immediately back, was a deep, dark ravine, echoing at intervals with the ominous cry of the owl. A range of craggy cliffs emerged from the gloom on the opposite side; the moonlit rocks, jutting up in various forms, looked like so many turrets and abutments of a magnificent city of palaces. At a distance of several leagues, in a bend of the river, which wound through the woods like a stream of pure silver, a steamer was pursuing its swift career, leaving behind it a long brilliant string of scintillations, producing a striking and beautiful effect. The measured sound of the steam echoed from hill to hill, with a thousand reverberations; between which, ever and anon, dying strains of music were borne to the ear. In a leafy glen to the left, the village of W—— could just be discerned—its white cottage-roofs glancing modestly through the surrounding foliage. Away on the distant horizon, were ranges of mystic hills—each growing fainter as they receded, till all were lost in a rich silvery haze. Over the whole, was a sky so calm—so delightfully illumined with pale, sleeping stars—so vast in its serene beauties, that the soul was awed and elevated with indescribable sensations, acknowledging the might and majesty of the Creator. Well might an enthusiastic admirer of nature feast his senses upon such a scene as this! Well might he seek to imbibe from it, that inspiration which would prompt the glory he desired to attain!

While I gazed in mute admiration on the sublime scene before me, I heard a rustling among the leaves close by. Before I could turn, to ascertain the cause, a tall ghost-like form rushed past me to the very verge of the cliff. His features were distinctly visible in the moonlight. They were noble, and beautifully chiselled, but deathly pale. His person was erect, yet too emaciated to be perfect. It was evident that he did not belong to the neighborhood. There was something about him which had the air of a city debauches; and the scene I have endeavored to describe, seemed to fill him with remorse for a mis-spent life. Inspired with the serenity and grandeur of every thing around him, he turned his face to the orb that was rising from the distant hill, and poured forth an apostrophe so sublime—so eloquent, that I was transfixed to the spot. I had never listened to such language from human lips. It was powerful—beautiful—godlike. In a deep, melodious voice, he concluded with an affecting allusion to the death of hope, and to our final release from the troubles of this life. A presentiment of something terrible seized upon me. Before I could guess his purpose, the mysterious stranger cast one lingering look on the scene before him, and dashed headlong over the precipice! There was a wild, unearthly shriek—the dull echo of a falling body—a crashing sound among the rocks below—and all was still!

With sensations of the deepest horror, I hurried back to the village. Next morning the body of the unfortunate suicide was found crushed and mangled, beyond all hopes of identity. No clue was ever discovered to his name or history. A few scraps of impassioned poetry, without date or title, were found upon his person. Thus died one who was evidently gifted beyond the common lot of humanity. A lesson of the dreadful effects of intemperance was taught me, which I never forgot, or ceased to profit by.

VI.

The five years ensuing, formed somewhat of a hiatus in my life. It is true, they were not without incident; but that was of a nature uninteresting to a reader, fond, as I presume mine is, of romance. There are few things in the life of a village school-master, calculated to attract attention. The ample leisure which such an avocation afforded me, for reading and cultivating my favorite art, was the only inducement I had for remaining so long in W—; although the primitive manners, and simplicity of character of the villagers, were not without their charms for a reflective mind like mine.

Tired, at length, of the monotony of my life, I removed farther west, to a town proverbial for the refined taste of its inhabitants. I there set up a drawing-school on a new system. Among my pupils was a lady of a somewhat uncertain age, who had long enjoyed her single blessedness. This appeared to me rather strange, as she was not ill-looking; and, moreover, had a considerable fortune to recommend her. Poverty had cramped my mental energies long enough; so I thought there was no readier method of bettering my condition, than connecting myself with my pupil, Miss Claudia Langua. My advances were received with great favor; and in less than a month after first sight, I was a married man. Alas, how soon was I led to repent this mercenary act! My wife's temper was dreadful. When she discovered that it was not exactly love for her person that induced me to take her as a partner, there was no end to her reproaches. Nothing could appease her. On my devoted head the direst abuse was poured.

Imagine a year of misery to have passed away, during which I had meekly submitted to every indignity that could be devised for my discomfiture.

The matrimonial miseries I suffered, had reached a point beyond human endurance. Night and day, my ears were beset with opprobrious epithets. I had no peace, save when nature's balmy restorer quitted, for a moment, my wife's tongue. Never was there a more pitiable, consummately, hen-pecked man! I did not pretend to retort, for I detested contention. Being ever peaceably disposed, I endeavored to adjust all matters amicably; but to no purpose. Claudia scorned to listen to reason. The less I said, the more she scolded; and yet, if I ventured to assert my rights, her vituperations were increased to a lamentable extent. My enthusiasm for the fine arts was rapidly evaporating. I was becoming one of the most fretful, miserable creatures in existence. Every day my face became paler, and my person more attenuated, till at length I was a mere walking skeleton. If, in the course of a short peregrination I met with some pleasant or lucky adventure, it was always my custom to impart it with joy and kindness to Claudia; but she treated my good intentions with contempt. My condition was really pitiable. I secretly resolved to leave her; for the bare idea of mentioning the subject of a separation in her presence, put me in a cold tremor. The valorous resolution formed, I chuckled to myself, in the words of Massinger,

"Thou buzzing drone, that 'bout my ears dost hum,
To strike thy rankling sting into my heart,
Whose renown time nor medicine could assuage,—
Thus do I put thee off!"

With the greatest secrecy, and not a few misgivings, I made my preparations. Every thing succeeded to my satisfaction. Claudia never discovered my absence, till she received a letter which I had left in the post-office, informing her of my resolution never again to show her the light of my countenance. I have since been told that on reading this epistle, her rage was ungovernable; and, indeed, it is with becoming grief I add, that after losing the only object upon which she could lawfully exercise her tongue, she gradually pined away, till death silenced her forever. Peace be with thee, Claudia! Mayest thou find that rest in the grave, which was unknown to thee while living!

VII.

By this time I had begun to despair of attaining any celebrity in the art which I had chosen for my profession. Disappointment, and want of patronage damped the ardor of my enthusiasm. In a fit of disgust, I resolved to give up painting, and try something more profitable.

I took up my residence in a large city, where I fancied my talents would be appreciated. Having sufficient money to meet my immediate wants, I turned my attention to writing poetry and plays. The first I soon discovered was a flat, stale, and unprofitable business. Whether the fact was owing to a want of merit in me, or a want of taste in the publishers, I cannot say; but it is quite certain, nothing from my pen in the poetical way, produced me a single cent. My plays were highly spoken of; and the managers of the theatres, to whom I submitted them, took great pleasure in having the productions decently murdered before the public; but, alas! I could get nothing for them—not even enough to cover the funeral expenses.

Driven to despair by want and disappointment, I resolved to try my hand, as a last resource, at novel-writing. In due time I produced a very grand affair. Elated with the successful manner in which I had disposed of my task, I took the work to the nearest publisher, persuaded he would jump at the lucrative offer I intended to make him. Here again I was taught a lesson. He turned over the pages—said the bibliography was pretty—spoke of hard times—great press of business—no time to examine the work, &c. Cursing the illiterate boor, I carried my manuscript to another publisher, rejoicing in the idea that the last had suffered a considerable loss. The next spoke in very condescending and encouraging terms. He even took the trouble to read a few pages, which he pronounced capital,—pithy—excellent—well calculated to be popular! But unfortunately he had too much business on hand, to attempt the publication of so great a work. Disgusted with the numerous replies of a similar nature, with which the publishers generally favored me, I returned to my lodgings, and did no doubt the most prudent thing I ever did in my life—burned my novel!

This cursory and somewhat irregular autobiography draws to a close. I have been for many years an adventurer. My life has not been without its charms, fraught as it was with every vicissitude of fortune, from youth to age. There are many things which I might have done—many which should have been avoided. It is too late now, however, to fret about them. If I had the power to live again, I might do better. My history, I trust, is not without a moral. I have shown, in accordance with the motto which stands at its head, that application and study are the surest means of attaining intellectual distinction. However lofty may be our aspirations, and great as nature's gifts may be, they will avail very little, if not aided by sound thought, and severe study. I am now nearly thirty, and what have I done? Literally, nothing! Those hours which should have been employed in laying the foundation of that eminence to which I aspired, have been wasted in visionary dreams of greatness. I have depended too much on my natural gifts of mind. The enthusiasm which should have led me to look well to the cause, has been concentrated on the effect; and thus the first has been overlooked, and the last has never been attained. I must confess, however, that I am still an enthusiast. What is inherent in me, cannot be eradicated. If I have failed in the realization of those ambitious dreams which have ever been my solace, I have profited by them, and afforded an example to the world which cannot fail to be of advantage. Thus, in some measure, I am consoled for my disappointments.

It is now my most delightful task to sit down, in some solitary nook, away from the bustle and turmoil of mankind, and think over the past. I am one of the happiest of mortals. I look only at the bright side of past events; and with a heart full of kindly feelings towards all living things, and an imagination unimpaired by age, I await that decree of time which will mingle me with the dust from which I came.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART V.

The French Knights supposing that the catastrophe at Gozo, related in the last chapter, might be told in Europe to their general disgrace, clamorously called for a council, by which all the circumstances of the siege, and surrender of the castle, might be made publicly known. Omedes, as a friend and countryman of De Sessa, rejected their proposition, saying that an absent commander, who was either dead, or a prisoner among his enemies, could not be justly tried for his conduct. Through the instrumentality of the Grand-Master, it was commonly believed that the Governor of Gozo died in its defence; and it was not until many years after, when De Sessa returned to the convent, having effected his escape by bribing his jailors, that people were aware of his existence. Being put under arrest, he underwent a trial, was acquitted of cowardice, and restored to his former dignity. This clemency, he owed rather to the commiseration of the monks for his long confinement, than to what he actually deserved.

When Gozo was depopulated, and all its dwellings destroyed, the Janizaries returned to their ships; and the Admiral, with a light but favorable breeze, shaped his course for Tripoli, the Leptis Magna of the ancients, a town built on the sand near the sea, and defended by old and dilapidated walls. Sinam arriving safely at Tachara, a small town distant some twelve miles from the westward of the city he had gone to besiege, was kindly received by Morat Aga, the Arab governor of the district; who, not only gave him every facility for landing his army, but even sent one of his own cavalry with a summons to Gaspard La Vallier, promising that should he surrender, the garrison would be permitted to depart in peace; but should he refuse, and the place be taken by storm, he would treat it as a conquered town, and give it up to be sacked by his troops. The answer of the intrepid old Knight was as laconic, as brave. He said he had been entrusted by the Grand-Master with the defence of Tripoli, and so long as he had his existence, he would faithfully perform his duty.

The Turkish commander, well knowing the character of La Vallier, and being satisfied that nothing could be gained by threats, advanced with forty pieces of cannon to begin the siege. He had not, however, commenced his operations, when a vessel, under the French flag, having on board Gabriel D'Amaront, the ambassador of Henry II. to the Sublime Porte, arrived, and came to anchor in the midst of the Ottoman fleet. D'Amaront, while on his voyage to Constantinople, had accidentally stopt at Malta. Omedes, taking advantage of this circumstance, and fearing that all the European powers would blame him for his negligence should Tripoli be captured, earnestly begged of the French ambassador to change his destination and act as a mediator between Sinam and himself.

D'Amaront, going to the camp of the Commander-in-Chief, was graciously received by the Turks, to whom he quickly made known the object of his visit. The Admiral as quickly however put an end to all negotiation, by showing the instructions which he had received from the Sultan, and saying that if he did not obey them, he should, on his return to Constantinople, pay for his disobedience by the loss of his head. This argument was conclusive, and the Frenchman was preparing to take his departure for the purpose of carrying the petition in person to Selyman, when he found himself detained by the Ottoman Admiral, who had ordered his vessel to be completely unrigged. D'Amaront strongly protested against this detention, remarking that he was the representative of a powerful monarch, who was at peace with the Sultan; that he was charged with despatches from his government, which were of the utmost importance to both powers, and which ought to be immediately delivered to the Turkish Divan, to whom they were directed by the hand of his King. Sinam, not wishing to take the responsibility of refusing to grant the ambassador his liberty, called his councillors together; they decided that he should be kept where he was, though his every other wish should be gratified; and all in the camp were ordered to treat him with the most marked attention.

On the 8th of August, the Turkish batteries were opened upon the Tripoline castle; but with little execution, as it was the only well fortified point of all the fortifications.

Several days after the siege was commenced; and when, under the spirited fire of the Knights, many of the Infidels had fallen, an apostate villain, who was born in Provence; and who acted as a spy to Aga Morat, escaped from the city, and advised Dragut to turn his attention to another place, where the walls could be soon overthrown, and his soldiers effect an entrance. Forty hours after this advice was given, La Vallier, being persuaded that Tripoli could no longer be defended, left his fortress; and, through the intercession of D'Amaront, succeeded in making a favorable capitulation with the Ottoman general. The soldiers, not knowing the terms of the treaty, and supposing they were to have their liberty, tumultuously left their quarters, and took to the plains. Aga Morat, however, soon convinced them of their error; for, surrounding the whole body with his cavalry, he made them all his slaves. Bitterly did these poor captives repent of their cowardly conduct during the siege; for they thought that their sufferings in bondage would be more grievous than death.

Des Roches, who commanded a fort, and had a garrison of two hundred Calabrians, resolutely refused to submit, unless Dragut would promise to him and his soldiers a safe conveyance to Malta. As it was a position which could be desperately defended, the Turk was obliged to accede to the terms; he sent a ring from his finger, as a token that he would faithfully fulfil his promise. Thus was Tripoli conquered on the 15th of August, 1551, after having been held by the Christians something more than forty years from the time of its capture by the Count of Navarre.

When Sinam had got all the Knights in his power, wholly regardless of his oaths, he stripped them of their habits, and treated them as slaves. He expected that he should receive for their ransom, a sum which might be sufficient to defray the whole expense which he had been at, to get possession of their city. The French ambassador, enraged at this behavior, boldly told the haughty mussulman, that should he not strictly fulfil the terms of the treaty, the Sultan would lose all the honor of his victories by the treachery of his conduct. This language, so plainly spoken, had the desired effect; for the monks were soon released from their chains, and permitted to embark on the galleys which were to carry them to their convent.

The day after the Turkish Admiral hoisted his flag on the bastions of Tripoli, he had a splendid pavilion erected, and sent an invitation to D'Amaront and La Vallier to dine with him. This they accepted, hoping, that when the wine was passing, they might obtain a promise for the liberation of some of their friends, who were still held in bondage. Their hopes were not fruitless; for twenty more Christians were released, on condition that thirty Janizaries, who were made prisoners at Malta, should be set at liberty on their arrival.

There unfortunately chanced to be among the Christian captives, an old gunner, named John de Chabas, who was known to have shot off the hand of the "Clarke general" of the Mussulmen army. When the dinner was finished, which had been of the most magnificent description, and while the hundred Turkish guests, dressed in their long robes of golden cloth, of velvet, and damask, were still seated around the festive board, a call was made for de Chabas; he was soon brought, accompanied by a few savage wretches, who were to act as his executioners. When the hoary-headed old soldier was told of the manner in which he was to die, his fortitude for a moment failed him; but he quickly recovered his firmness, and bravely perished as a martyr to the Christian religion. The Turks after lopping off the ears and nose of the Spaniard, inhumed him to his breast in the earth, and fired at his head and shoulders, until they saw he was nearly dead, when they put an end to his existence by cutting his throat.

The Ambassador and Knight, after being compelled to witness this sad tragedy, took their leave; and, embarking, set sail for Malta, where they arrived on the afternoon of the second day of their passage. Much to the surprise of D'Amaront, when he was preparing to enter the harbor, he found the progress of his vessel impeded by a chain, and the soldiers of St. Angelo under arms. Laying off the island under easy sail during the night, he made his appearance again in the morning, when he was allowed to anchor, and received permission to land. The ambassador, immediately going to the palace, was received by the Grand-Master in a most distant and uncourteous manner. Being told by Omedes of the suspicion which the Order entertained of his having, in his recent embassy to Tripoli, leagued in a treacherous manner with La Vallier to surrender the place, he repelled the charge with the utmost indignation, and demanded to be publicly heard. A council being called, D'Amaront stated, that he accepted of the thankless service at the earnest desire of the Grand-Master, who, being aware of the error he had committed in not sending a sufficient force for the defence of Tripoli, now that it was captured, was trying to throw the blame of it on the shoulders of others, which he alone ought only to bear. He stated also that his duty had been faithfully performed; and he sincerely trusted that the conditions which he had made with the Turkish Admiral for the ransom of the Knights, would be strictly and honorably performed. The ambassador, finding his statements were not generally believed, and his requests were not likely to be complied with, left the assembly in disgust; and returning to his galley, did not again land, while he remained at the island. He even carried his enmity so far, that when sailing out of the port for Constantinople, he would not salute the garrison; which was always customary with a Christian ship.

At the suggestion of Omedes, La Vallier and three others of the principal monks, who had returned from Tripoli, were thrown in prison, and there detained until a court had been formed, over which a secular judge, named Anthony de Combe, was called to preside. The Grand-Master, who was a known enemy of La Vallier, and who had given him his appointment in Barbary, only to have him absent from the Chapter, was particularly anxious that he should be found guilty of having betrayed his trust; therefore he appointed only those to sit in judgment, who were his creatures, and who would bring in just such a verdict as he might wish. Villegagnon, who was present during the time the witnesses were undergoing their examination, and who observed the unjust manner in which the trial was conducted, rose in court, and with that generous intrepidity for which he was famed, openly declared, that he would act as counsel for the accused, who would certainly be found guilty, if no one was permitted to speak in their defence. He stated that in his opinion, the loss of Tripoli was only to be ascribed to the negligence and avarice of the Grand-Master, who was more desirous of enriching his relatives, than of sustaining the dignity of the Order. Villegagnon further declared in a still louder voice, that the funds which were placed aside only for the defence of that city, been lawfully appropriated, the prisoners at the bar would have never been found in their present unfortunate situation.

The French Knights were pleased with the manly conduct of their leader, and coincided with him in their opinions. Omedes, enraged at this accusation, was aroused to greater exertions, that he might carry his point, and have La Vallier condemned. But the statements of all those who testified against the accused, were declared by Villegagnon to be false; and he called sixty respectable persons to sustain him in this his sweeping declaration.

The trial being finished, de Combe, in full council, gave the following verdict: that although it was true the loss of Tripoli was occasioned in a measure by the cowardice of the garrison; yet any Knight, who yielded a post with which he had been charged, without the consent of the Grand-Master, was liable to be degraded; and he therefore adjudged all the prisoners to be deprived of their habits and expelled from the Order. Omedes, expressing himself dissatisfied with this sentence, as he wished to save the three Spanish monks who had been condemned, reversed the verdict of de Combe, and declared that La Vallier only should suffer; he having been the chief in command, and having signed the terms of the capitulation. This contemptible conduct of the judge so enraged the Knights of the different languages, that they swore on their honors not to permit the sentence to be carried into execution, unless made to bear equally on all. The bailiff, Schilling, in his excitement, publicly called de Combe a profligate villain; while Niguer, a Castilian, as openly said he was a wretch, and only a fit instrument to carry the wishes of the Grand-Master into effect, be they what they might.

Omedes was, much to his mortification, obliged to succumb to the popular will; but it was only for a time, as he shortly after reinstated Fuster, de Sousa, and Herrera, to their former dignities; though his hostility to La Vallier never ceased; and this aged Knight, who was more imprudent than culpable, was left to linger in confinement.

Henry II., having been informed of the treatment which D'Amaront received from the Grand-Master, sent a messenger, named Belloy, with a letter demanding of him an explanation, and to be made acquainted whether his envoy had been guilty of those transactions, which he had been pleased, by his emissaries, to circulate in Europe against him. After much deliberation in his council, Omedes retracted his accusations; though the friends of Charles V. would never believe but that the statements were true.

While the convent was disturbed by these dissensions, Leo Strozzi, the Prior of Capua, and the same Florentine Knight, whom we have before named as having been appointed by Omedes Admiral of his gallies, but who afterwards accepted of a French command, arrived at Malta, and sought the Grand-Master's protection. This request not being granted—it being the wish of Omedes to compel him to enter the Spanish service—Strozzi, calling himself "the friend of God alone," put to sea, and for a year made prizes of every thing which came in his way; though he landed the crews of all Christian vessels in safety, and gave them their personal effects. Having been particularly fortunate in his cruise in the Levant, he purchased a magnificent church ornament, which he sent to the image of our lady of Philermo, at Malta. On the borders of this ornament, were embroidered these words of St. John—"He came to his own, and his own received him not." Strozzi directed his messenger, by whom he sent his gift, to make an application that he might be admitted as one of the convent; but this petition was sternly refused; Omedes declaring that should the Prior of Capua make his appearance, he would be treated as an enemy, and be fired upon from his batteries. When this answer was made known to the Knights, a meeting was called, and a letter written to Strozzi, informing him, that were he to come he would be well received, and his wishes complied with. This intimation was sufficient for the Prior to act upon.

Sailing directly for Malta, he was joined on his landing by many of the most respectable monks, who accompanied him to the palace of the Grand-Master, and urgently requested that he might be reinstated as one of their body. Omedes, awed by the high bearing of Strozzi, and aware that he could not refuse the request of his companions without running the risk of having a rebellion in the Order, made a merit of necessity, and received him as a friend—expressing a hope that when he had recovered from the fatigues of his voyage, he would make a survey of the island, and observe what places might be the most easily and most effectually defended. The Prior executed this service with the utmost alacrity, and reported a plan to the council, which, if it could have been accepted, would have rendered Malta impregnable. The suggestions which he made were every way worthy of his talents and character. He proposed the erection of a town on Mount Sceberras, and the building of a splendid fortress for its defence. The idea was only abandoned because the state of the treasury would not sanction so heavy an expense. Two forts, however, were ordered to be immediately built; the one on Sceberras, to be called St. Elmo; and the other on Mount St. Julian, to be designated as St. Michael; both being named in commemoration of the castles which defended the entrance of the harbor of Rhodes. Engineers and building materials were sent from Sicily with the greatest expedition; and so anxiously did the Knights labor, that in the brief space of six months both fortifications were finished. St. Elmo still remains as a monument to the memory of Strozzi; it being one of the most perfect fortresses of the present age.

Omedes, finding he could not prevail upon the Prior of Capua to enter in the Spanish service, and dreading his every-day increasing influence in the Order, expressed a wish that he would take charge of an expedition that he was preparing to send against Zoara, a wealthy town in the province of Tripoli; and which, from its exposed situation by land, he had understood could be easily captured. Strozzi, wishing to distinguish himself, willingly accepted of this command; setting sail on the 6th of August, with a few galleys, having on board one thousand men and three hundred monks, he arrived safely on the coast of Barbary, and near to the place which he had gone to attack. By an unfortunate mistake of the pilot, the troops were landed some two leagues more distant from Zoara than was necessary, which caused them, during the night, a tedious march of several hours over a long and sandy plain.

The Christians were divided into three bodies, and led by experienced Knights. Passing through the gates of the town, which they found open and unguarded, they had perfect possession of the place before the citizens were aroused to their danger, by the sound of the drums, and the clangor of arms. When the soldiers found they had nothing to fear from the inhabitants, they scattered themselves in every direction, and committed all those excesses which were usual in a captured city. As the commander, La Vallette, was employed in conducting some fifteen hundred prisoners, of all ages, down to the beach, to have them embarked, he was saluted by a Moor, who had formerly been in his service, and who inquired if he was aware that a body of four thousand Turks were in full march to attack him? Strozzi, on his receiving this information, quickly sounded a retreat; but the troops were so scattered, that the signal was not generally heard; and Mogat Aga entering at the moment with his army, a desperate conflict took place in the streets of the half sacked town. Though the Maltese fought with their usual bravery, yet they could not, against such numbers, gain any signal advantage. The Prior hearing of the death of his nephew, and anxious to avenge it, advanced at the head of some soldiers, and threw himself in the midst of the fight. Being severely wounded, he would have certainly been killed, had not Torcillas, a Majorcan Knight of great strength and courage, taken him up in his arms, and carried him to the shore; whence he was taken to his galley. The commander Copier, and the monks Soto Major and St. Jaille, magnanimously lost their lives, while assisting in the escape of De Strozzi. Cassiere, the standard-bearer, forming his few remaining men in a square, successfully repelled the numerous attacks of the Turkish cavalry; and, getting to the beach, waded off to the boats, which had been brought as near as the shallow water would permit.

During the whole of this anxious period, never, for a moment, was the flag of the Order furled; and though its folds had been pierced with bullets, its fragments were preserved. In this sad attempt on Zoara, many distinguished Knights perished. The language of Italy lost three who were particularly renowned, Valperga, Sporza, and Justiniani; while of the French, sixteen, all descended from the first families in their country, were left among the slain.

It would appear as if the Christians brought their misfortunes upon themselves; for had they been content with merely sacking the town, they could have executed their object, and retired in safety. It was the permission they gave to their soldiers to ravish the Moorish women, that brought down the vengeance of God upon them, and caused their destruction. Strozzi was so weak from his wounds, that when he returned to Malta, he was carried to his palace on a plank.

Fancying that he did not receive that attention from the Grand-Master which his conduct deserved, he took command of some galleys, and sailed on a cruise even before he had recovered his health. In this service he was so fortunate, that when his prizes arrived, "opulence and plenty were restored to the whole island."

Early in the summer of 1553, an envoy, named Hosmadon, was sent to Omedes, from Mary Queen of England, requesting that an accredited agent might be sent to her court, as she was disposed to restore to the Order those possessions of which she thought it had been unjustly deprived by her father. The Chevalier de Montferrat was employed on this embassy, and reinvested in the estates which formerly belonged to the convent. Sir Richard Seely, for his exertions in this negotiation, was appointed Grand-Prior of London. During the reign of Elizabeth, this investment was annulled; and never after were the British Knights permitted to draw any public revenues from England.

D'Omedes, who had been for a long time in ill health, breathed his last on the 6th of September, 1553, in the seventeenth year of his sovereignty, and eightieth year of his age. So unpopular was he with the monks, that it was even proposed to have his funeral expenses paid from his private property. This proposition, however, was rejected; and he was buried with the usual ceremonies, and at the public charge.

When a council was called to appoint a successor to D'Omedes, Leo de Strozzi was named, and would have surely been chosen, had not Gagnon, the great defender of the Order, and one of the elective number, been called upon for his opinion; which he gave to the following purport: He observed, that no one could respect the Prior of Capua for his courage, good conduct and experience, more than he did; but he was a sworn enemy to the house of Medicis; and, should he be elected as their chief, what security had they, that he would not, on some pretence or other, employ their galleys against that family, and thus bring upon them the hatred of the Spanish Emperor; and, in the event of their being attacked by the Turks, then effectually prevent their getting any assistance from Italy?

So true and disinterested did this argument appear, that the electors almost unanimously declared in favor of Claudius de la Sangle, a Frenchman, who was Grand-Hospitaller of the Order, and ambassador at the court of Rome. The Pope was so pleased with the choice, that he made his election known to the Romans, by a general salute from his fortress of St. Angelo. Three Knights, Gagnon, Pascatore and Bernardin, who had been chiefly instrumental in the appointment of La Sangle, not long after, suddenly died, and under circumstances which led it to be generally believed, that they had been poisoned by Perpaille, one of Strozzi's servants. The Prior never recovered from the imputation of having been concerned in this villainous transaction.

Charles V., having heard that the Grand-Master would embark from Messina, where some Maltese galleys were to be present to receive him, sent an envoy, Acugna, with instructions to the Viceroy, to pay him the most marked honors; saying he could not show too much attention to one, "who was at the head of an Order, which was the bulwark of his Italian dominions." Acugna was ordered to inform La Sangle, that he had visited Sicily only for the purpose of bringing to him the congratulations of the Emperor on his election. This statement might have been believed, had he not, at his interview, made mention of another subject which appeared to be of more importance to the interests of the Spanish court. Charles V. was anxious to rid himself of the trouble and expense of supporting a garrison at Mehedra; therefore he proposed that the convent should be removed from Malta to that city; flattering himself that the Knights would readily accept of his offer, as it would recompense them, in a measure, for the loss of Tripoli, and give them a tenable position in the midst of their enemies on the African shore. To make the proposition the more palatable, the Emperor promised to allow for the expense of their removal, the continual yearly sum of seventy-two thousand livres, which were to be paid out of his Sicilian revenues. As La Sangle did not feel himself authorized to give a definite answer, he invited Acugna to accompany him to Malta; which invitation was accepted. They both arrived there on the 1st of January, 1554.

After the Grand-Master had been installed on his throne, a council was called, and the envoy requested to make known the object of his mission. When the subject had been discussed, it was unanimously resolved to send a deputation of eight of the most experienced commanders to visit Mehedra, and make a report whether or not it would be advisable to accept of the Emperor's offer. The account which the Knights gave on their return, was not at all favorable for their removal. They admitted that its fortifications were in good order; but they stated that the situation of them could have hardly been worse; for they were built on a peninsula which jutted into the sea; they could afford but little protection to their galleys, which to them, as a maritime Order, was so absolutely necessary. Two monks were sent to Spain to inform the Emperor of the reasons which had influenced the convent to remain where it was.

Although Charles V. appeared satisfied with this decision, yet the Viceroy of Sicily took umbrage at it, and forbid the exportation of corn; supplies of which were so necessary for the Maltese. To get this edict removed, La Sangle was compelled to send several galleys, commanded by Strozzi, to drive away the Moslem pirates, who were cruising on the Sicilian coast.

While the Prior of Capua was employed on this duty, and laying with his squadron at Palermo, he received a letter from his brother, stating that Henry II. had given him the command of his army in Italy, and was desirous that he should take charge of his fleet. This appointment Strozzi was determined to accept, hoping that he might, with the aid of his friends on shore, be enabled to overthrow that dynasty, which had driven his father, in desperation, to seek that peace in the tomb which he could not find on earth.

The Viceroy, fearing that Strozzi might be thus bought, was preparing to obey the instructions of Charles V., and to prevent the Maltese galleys from leaving the harbor, when the Prior effected his escape by a stratagem, which one only of his talent and courage could plan and carry into execution. Being seated at dinner with the Viceroy, one of the Knights entered and remarked, that he had seen some Turkish galleys on the coast which he thought might be easily surprised and taken. The Prior, rising from the table, said, with a smile, that he hoped to have them in a few hours safely anchored in port. The Governor, never supposing that it was a trick, permitted him quietly to take his leave, and wished him all the success which his promptness deserved.

When the Admiral got outside of the island, he set sail for Malta; and on his arrival, resigned his situation, giving it to be understood, that with two galleys of his own, and one of his brothers, he intended to cruise on his private account. Many of the young monks, anxious to serve under so experienced a leader, engaged in this expedition. Some few Italians and Spaniards, on Strozzi's making known his true intentions, asked their dismissal; but a large number still remained, saying, that they were willing to engage in any service where he should be their chief.

Sailing for the coast of Tuscany, the Prior stopt at Ercole; here he was advised by the French General, who occupied the place, not to make any movement, until he should be joined by a squadron of Provençal ships, which, from the time they had been at sea, might be daily expected. Strozzi, observing that where his enemies were so near he could never be quiet, formed the rash and insignificant project of seizing upon the fortress of Scarlino. Landing to reconnoitre the position, he was unfortunately recognized by an ignorant mountaineer, who was laying in ambush, and shot him in the side; causing a wound, which terminated his existence in less than twenty-four hours after it was given.

Thus ignobly fell one of the most distinguished naval commanders of his day; a man who, had his moral character been equal to his courage, would have doubtless been seated on the Maltese throne.

Less than a year after Strozzi had been entombed in the cathedral of Porte Ercole, Cosmo de Medicis, with a feeling unbecoming a Christian warrior, had his ashes removed from their resting-place and thrown into the sea.*

Parisot de La Vallette, who succeeded to the command of the galleys of the Order, soon became celebrated for his successes against the Turkish pirates, whom he compelled to leave their cruising grounds, on the coasts of Sicily and Naples, and keep more confined to their havens. Several of the commanders, stimulated by his exertions, fitted out vessels at their own expense, and sailed with such good fortune, as to prevent the Barbary corsairs from making their appearance between the straits of Gibraltar, and the mouths of the Nile.

The Sultan, incensed at their daring, made a promise to his Divan, that he would expel the Knights from Malta as he had done from Rhodes. This information having been conveyed to the convent by some spies whom they had always in their employ at Constantinople, La Sangle turned his attention to the repairing of his forts, and in sending messengers to the different Christian powers, begging them to give their assistance should Selyman attempt to carry his threat into execution. So thoroughly did the Grand-Master fortify the peninsula of St. Michael, that in honor of him it was called the Isle of La Sangle, which name it bears to this day.

On the afternoon of the 23d of September, 1556, a dreadful hurricane passed over Malta, destroying many buildings, and killing five hundred of its inhabitants. It continued but half an hour, and was accompanied with torrents of rain. Four galleys were overset, and most of the officers, with their crews, perished. The monks, Lescut and Romegas, are particularly named; whose sad fate on this occasion was severely mourned. When the Grand-Master was personally employed in righting one of these vessels, he heard a noise, which induced him to have a hole cut in the bottom, from which first issued a monkey, and afterwards out of the same aperture, the Chevalier de l'Escure and several other Knights made their appearance; they had miserably passed the night, up to their chins in water, and with hardly air enough to preserve them from suffocation.

Dragut, ever watchful to seize any opportunity, which should present itself, to distress the Knights, when he heard of this disaster, set sail with a large fleet, and made his appearance off their island. Not thinking himself sufficiently strong to attack the forts, he was content to land some Janizaries and ravage the villages. Before, however, he had

* When Lewis of France was advised by his friends to overthrow the monument which covered the remains of the Duke of Bedford at Roan, he made this memorable answer: "God forbid that I should give way to such a dishonorable act, as to disquiet his dead bones, who when he was alive made all France fear and dread him. It savors too much of a base and sordid mind, to insult upon a dead lion." A striking contrast this of the conduct of Cosmo de Medici, to the ashes of Strozzi.

time to embark with his prisoners and spoil, the commander Lustic, Grand-Marshal of the Order, sallied out with three hundred monks, and attacked him so fiercely that he lost many of his men, and with difficulty himself escaped.

Francis de Lorraine, getting his squadron in readiness, put to sea for the purpose of meeting with Dragut, and giving him battle. Not falling in with the Turkish Corsair, he cruised along the Barbary coast, and made so many captures, that on his return to Malta his galleys were laden with spoil.

One of the last acts which the Grand-Master performed prior to his decease, was to make himself acquainted with the circumstances of La Valier's trial and condemnation. Being satisfied that the verdict was given more from party spirit than justice, he ordered the commander to be released from his confinement, though he did not reinstate him as a Knight.

La Sangle died on the 15th of September, 1557, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and fourth of his reign. The monks, in gratitude for his magnificent bequest of sixty thousand crowns to their treasury, ordered that twelve thousand livres should be added to the dowry of his niece, Mademoiselle de Montchanar; they moreover purchased some splendid church ornaments, on which they caused the name and arms of their deceased Prince to be richly embroidered.

It is said that La Sangle was the first who introduced the round velvet cap; as before his time, the Grand-Masters had the antique toque, with three points and a fold, very like those now worn by priests.

This epitaph remains on La Sangle's monument.

PEDANTS.

The profound logician, Samuel Clarke, was fond of robust exercise, and was frequently found leaping over tables and chairs. Once, perceiving a pedantic fellow, he said, "Now we must desist, for a fool is coming in."

THE PROTECTIVE POLICY.

[Whilst the Messenger has been chiefly designed for the lighter and more elegant departments of Literature, yet we have never excluded discussions upon graver subjects, and especially such as may be ranked as National Questions, involving the interests and happiness of our Country. We have never dabbled in mere party politics, and, knowingly, never shall; but we do not consider an essay, or argument, on the tariff policy, as belonging to that narrow field of opinion. The expediency of fostering, by adequate duties, our own industry,—whether Manufacturing, Commercial, or Agricultural,—is a great American question; and ought to be decided by the lights of philosophy and experience,—not by the baleful prejudices of over-excited party zeal. Great and good men of all parties, and of all opinions on other subjects, have differed respecting it,—and this very diversity, ought to be promotive of the cause of Truth—if the pursuit of it be characterized by temper and candor. We persuade ourselves that the following article, though upon a subject usually esteemed dry and barren, will be found by no means uninteresting. The embellishments and illustrations which the author has employed, will even be acceptable to our fair readers,—for we have a much higher opinion of the dignity of the sex, than to suppose that nothing but a sentimental love tale, or a beautiful sonnet, can interest them. We need scarcely say, that an essay or article defending the opposite side of the question, if not of greater length, and written in the right spirit and temper, shall be cheerfully inserted in the Messenger.]—Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.

The subject of the protective policy, at all times one of deep interest to the country, has assumed in the present posture of our national affairs, the most commanding importance. Perhaps no one question, agitated in our public councils since the last war with England, has excited such fierce and bitter contests, or brought into conflict superior energies of mind. The din of battle in the Halls of Congress has been echoed and reëchoed by the Legislatures of the States, and by a powerful press; and, what is always to be dreaded in a Republic like ours, the discussions upon abstract points of political economy, have been sharpened by a sense of supposed injustice to geographical portions of the Union. The writer of this article, a native of this state, and connected with Southern interests and feelings by every tie of social existence, has entertained for nearly a quarter of a century, a deep and settled conviction, that in reference to this subject, great and mischievous errors have prevailed, and do still prevail, in the Southern portion of our country. Cherishing this conviction with perfect sincerity, and after the most impartial investigation, it is natural that he should be desirous of impressing his own views upon other minds; especially as the vital interests of the country are believed to be deeply involved in the final issue of the controversy. The proposition therefore, which it is proposed to discuss, and to which the candid attention of the readers of the Messenger is invited, is this:—that there is an absolute obligation upon every parental government, and particularly ours, to protect the industry of its own citizens against foreign rivalry. In sustaining this proposition, it will not be necessary to enter into tedious statistical details; and far less, will it be important to combat the shadowy subtleties and air-built theories of political economy. Some allusion, it is true, to the lofty and high-sounding pretensions of that science, will be unavoidable; but the subject itself, will be treated as a plain and practical one;—and, where illustrations are necessary, those will be preferred, which are drawn from the volume of experience,—a volume, of far greater value as a guide to human conduct and political legislation, than all the specious and delusive fallacies of the schools. Let it not be supposed either, that there is the slightest desire or design to tread upon party ground. It is much to be deplored that this great question—which equally concerns every party and every class in society—which is alike interesting to the hardy pioneer of the West,—to the laborious artizan or enterprising merchant of the North and East,—and to the opulent planter or farmer of the South;—which, in its solution, needs the calmness of matured reflection—the wisdom of long experience, and the integrity of tried patriotism; it is much to be lamented, we say, that such a question, should be degraded from the high rank it is entitled to occupy,—and should be constantly thrown like a foot-ball, into the arena of party strife. Is it not painfully true, that the very word tariff—which is susceptible of the most precise definition,—and which, in itself, is as harmless and inoffensive as any other term in the English language, has not only been totally perverted from its true meaning,—but has also been employed, and employed successfully, as a powerful weapon of attack, in the strategy of party warfare? In the minds of many, this innocent word of two syllables, is associated with images of plunder and oppression; and if, at any time, unluckily, the adjective protective, be prefixed to it, there is hardly any limit to the horror which seems to be inspired. A tariff is dreadful enough of itself,—but a tariff of protection, is a huge, horrid and deformed monster,—the apparition of some giant Polyphemus,—which every chivalrous Ulysses of the age, is eager to encounter and destroy. It has been often said, and said most truly, that words are things. They are not merely significant signs or sounds,—but frequently, without reference to their true meaning, they exercise a magical sway over the imagination,—revive the faded impressions of memory,—kindle the liveliest emotions of the heart,—and rouse the most turbulent passions of our nature. The adroit and hackneyed tactician, who aspires to control popular sentiment, well understands their power and use.

What is a tariff?—Simply a schedule of the rates of tax or duty, which the government imposes upon the introduction of foreign products, or merchandize—designed generally for the two-fold purpose of raising a revenue, and of guarding and preserving the domestic, home-born, and vital interests of the country. Yet how different is this definition from that which is usually given by the mere trader in party politics, who looks at the subject through the dim medium of his own narrow prejudices. Let it be considered in its true character, and upon its own intrinsic merits.

Most persons admit the expediency of raising money for public purposes by a tax on imports. It is not only collected with more ease and convenience, but, of all the forms of contribution to the national treasury, it is by far the most just and equitable,—being a tax (when it operates at all as a tax,) on voluntary consumption. Some few visionaries are to be found even in our own country, who, impelled by blind hostility and prejudice towards the whole system, would prefer to see the custom-houses demolished in our seaports, and the land covered with swarms of tax gatherers and excisemen; invading, like the plagues of Egypt, the privacy, security and comfort of domestic life. Fortunately however, the advocates of this most wild and pernicious doctrine, are altogether powerless in numbers, if not in reputation. The true point upon which the whole tariff controversy has turned, in reference to manufactures,—is the expediency and the constitutional right, of so regulating the duties, as to afford adequate protection to the home-manufacturer or mechanic. In support of the affirmative of the proposition, the question of expediency will be first considered.

The poet Burns,—in his beautiful epistle to a young friend,—expressed a desire to bask in the golden smile of fortune,—not for the sake of the gew-gaws and vanities which wealth bestows,—but for the “glorious privilege of being independent.” If individual independence be so desirable,—how much more so is that of a nation? If the protective system therefore, will produce this enviable result,—if it will give to the great mass of society—the working men of the nation—constant and regular employment, and the means of acquiring the comforts and necessities of life,—if it will develop and expand to an indefinite extent, the resources of this Giant Republic,—if it will exert a powerful influence in extending the boundaries of practical and scientific knowledge,—and thereby improve and invigorate the human mind,—if it will effect all this, and that too without inflicting injury upon any individual or class of society, it should surely commend itself to the approbation of every rational and benevolent being. These beneficent effects are ascribed by its advocates, to the protective system.

It is curious to trace the origin and progress of the peculiar prejudice, which has long prevailed on this subject, in our good old Commonwealth of Virginia. Our original settlements, we know, were strongly tinctured with the Baronial pride and spirit of the parent country; and it was a cardinal principle of the colonial policy of England, to monopolize the agricultural products of its various plantations, and to give in exchange the fabrics of her own manufacture. The primitive Virginians yielded to this policy; partly from a feeling of loyalty, and partly from a sense of dependance; but even with them, as our early annals will attest,—whenever the fire of liberty was kindled by the oppressions of the mother country,—the very first expedient to which they resorted, and which was suggested by natural reason, was the encouragement of the mechanical and manufacturing arts. The earliest germ of civil and political independence, was entwined with the idea of fostering the useful arts, as a sure reliance in extremities;—but, strange to tell, when the day of their political emancipation came, there was manifested a strong disposition to return to commercial bondage, and embrace the delusive notion of keeping their workshops in Europe. England—ever vigilant, where her own interests are concerned—saw this leaning, and encouraged it. It was during the memorable struggle with her colonies, that the famous work of Adam Smith, the “Wealth of Nations,”—but which should have been styled the “Wealth of England, and the Poverty of other Nations,”—was ushered into the world,—and in the specious, but deceptive ingenuity of its doctrines, she instantly saw revealed to her, a great moral and political lever, by which the destiny of other nations might be awayed, and her own raised to the highest summit of power. That work was translated into all the European languages, and very liberally exported to the United States; and for a long period of time was regarded—especially in Schools and Colleges—as the unanswerable oracle of true political economy. This ingenious book, inculcates for the edification of all other nations except England, the celebrated and captivating doctrine of free trade—a doctrine, which has about as much reality in the affairs of this world, as the Utopian visions of Sir Thomas More, or the moral parallelograms of Robert Dale Owen,—a doctrine which, according to the British interpretation, means, that the ports of all the world shall be opened wide to British goods,—but that the ports of Britain herself, should be hermetically sealed against the rival products of all other nations. Is it not marvellous, that we, the people of these United States, should be so easily gulled?

What is free trade?—If the words be understood to mean an exchange of commodities upon equal terms between different individuals, or geographical parts of the same country,—why then we understand them. The cotton and rice and tobacco of some of the States of this Union, for example, are purchased by the bread stuffs and manufactures of other States. This is all fairness and reciprocity in the transactions and interchanges of a single people;—but when we come to apply the principle, as regulating the intercourse of separate and distinct nations or communities,—it is a principle which never was, and never can be, reduced to practice. This may sound like bold assertion,—but let us attempt to prove it. Suppose there should convene a great diplomatic Congress of all the civilized nations; and it was solemnly stipulated that the productions of all of them, whether of the earth—the water—the forest, or the loom—should be freely admitted into the ports of each other, either free of duty, or at some uniform nominal duty? Will it be contended that such a policy would equalize the condition of nations,—that it would diffuse happiness and comfort among all the individuals of society in each nation; and that industry would everywhere be adequately rewarded? Is it believed that nations would prosper and flourish more under such a system, than under that, which the world has practised for so many ages? Are there many so credulous as to suppose, that, under such circumstances, things would regulate themselves, and that all would be equally benefitted? If there be, let them dismiss the delusion!

Nations are, in many respects, like individuals. Some are strong and powerful—others, weak and feeble. Some are endued with great moral and mental qualities,—others, are sunk in gross depravity and ignorance. Some are active, enterprising, and self-denying,—others, prefer the repose of indolence, or the pleasures of luxurious indulgence. Nations differ in the endless varieties of soil, climate, and production. They differ in their natural capacities for peculiar employments and branches of industry. Some, with scanty agricultural resources, are commercial and manufacturing, from necessity,—others possess neither commerce nor shipping—because entirely excluded from the world of waters. To expect, therefore, any thing like equality in the intercourse of principalities and powers, so unequal in themselves,—is about as rational, as to expect a pigmy to be victorious in a contest with an armed giant,—or that the sluggish dray-horse should eclipse in speed, the fiery and high-bred courser.

The truth is, that the idea of absolute free trade between nations, is a mere figment of the brain!—We repeat, that it never did, and never can exist; because it violates the laws of nature, and the very order of Providence!—It supposes equality and reciprocity, which, in the very nature of things, cannot be found. It supposes an identity of interests among nations, when, in truth, their interests rarely harmonise, and are generally in conflict. An alliance between nations, upon free trade principles, would be very much like a compact between a gentleman of large fortune and a pauper,—with the express stipulation of the free and equal enjoyment of each other's property. But imagine, for the sake of argument, that a Congress of nations, like that referred to, could be induced to assemble, and form a treaty of perpetual friendship and free trade!—How long would it last?—a day—a year—or a century? Precisely so long, and no longer, than the treaty mentioned in the fable between the owl and the eagle—that is, as long as it should be convenient and agreeable;—as long as rapacity could be gentle and forbearing, and selfishness liberal and kind.

But, say the disciples of Adam Smith,—England is desirous of setting us a noble example of liberality. Her statesmen are rapidly becoming converts to the sublime doctrines of free trade! It is certain that John Bull, in some respects at least, is a credulous old gentleman,—but in this little matter of exporting theories in political economy, for the exclusive use and benefit of other nations, he has not only outwitted the sagacious and clear-sighted brother Jonathan, but many of the nations of Europe besides.

England has always been playing at this game. She has talked about free trade for nearly a century,—and never practised it a week. It is the old story of promise without performance—theory without practice, and faith without works. She points out to us the road, which she solemnly protests will lead to a temporal Elysium,—but so far from ever treading it herself, prefers the primrose path of national prosperity.

When American Statesmen, in the true spirit of patriotism, were revising our tariff some years since, in reference to protection, Mr. Huskisson, and other members of the British Parliament became greatly alarmed. At first, they scolded and blustered, and threatened retaliation; but deeming that exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, they suddenly changed their note, and sung for our enchantment the Syren song of Free Trade. They actually carried the jest so far, as to make some show of reducing their own imposts on some articles, from 500 to 100 per cent,—whilst, unfortunately, both duties were equally prohibitory: either excluded effectually the rival fabrics of other nations. After the passage by Congress of the celebrated Compromise Act, as it is called, which provided for the gradual reduction of all duties to 20 per cent., the golden promises of unrestricted trade were heard no longer in the Parliament of England. Her liberal economists took a comfortable nap of eight or nine years. Recently indeed, they seem to have waked up from their slumbers; and her Russels and Humes, were lately chanting the melodious strains of their illustrious predecessors. Why was all this? The answer is obvious. The American tariff was about to be revised, and it was therefore expedient that the great farming interest of this nation should be lulled once more with the delusive promise that British ports would be speedily opened to American bread stuffs. The repeal of the corn laws was made the test question in the election of a new parliament, in the course of last summer,—and what was the result?—Discomfiture and defeat to the Melbourne ministry, which proposed the measure, and their utter expulsion from office and emolument. A fine commentary truly upon the British doctrine of free trade!*

As to the actual and fixed policy of England, reference could be had if necessary to a mass of authority, to prove that her practice and professions were never intended to harmonize. The sentiments of her greatest warrior, if not one of her first statesmen, as delivered in the House of Lords, will be given as a single specimen.

In replying to Earl Grey and others, the Duke of Wellington remarked, with the frankness and candor of a soldier, "that when free trade was talked of as existing in England, it was an absurdity. There was no such thing, and there could be no such thing as free trade in that country." "We proceeded," he said, "on the system of protecting our manufactures and our produce—the produce of our labor and our soil—of protecting them for exportation, and protecting them for home consumption; and on that universal system of protection it was absurd to talk of free trade."†

The Duke ought certainly to be presumed to understand something of British politics!

France too, it seems,—our ancient ally and friend—could not disguise her resentment and ill feeling, because Congress, at the extra session, exercised the indubitable right of imposing a moderate duty, for purposes of revenue, upon certain free articles of luxury which she had been in the habit of supplying us; and even Portugal, little Portugal, scarcely discernible on the map of Europe, had the effrontery to swagger and bluster for the same reason. It is humiliating, that some of the European nations should have so long regarded us as specially created for their own exclusive benefit and convenience.

But the United States is not the only country which has suffered severely, by occasionally embracing the pleasing, but pernicious heresy of free trade. After the fall of Napoleon, the Emperor Alexander of Russia, with other crowned heads, paid a visit to England; and it is by no means improbable that the great autocrat was invited to peruse the fascinating pages of Adam Smith. Certain it is, that a year or two after his return to St. Petersburg, he issued his Imperial Ukase, reducing his system of imposts to mere revenue rates. And what was the result?

The whole country was immediately flooded with British and other foreign manufactures. Their novelty, variety, and perhaps cheapness, tempted purchasers in abundance. Imports greatly exceeded exports, and the surplus was paid for in specie. Circulation, as necessary to the body politic, as blood to the human system, was suspended. Distress and wretchedness overspread the land. The Russian manufacturers were the first victims of this fatal experiment; agriculture next felt the shock; and finally, a large proportion of those great commercial houses, whose cupidity had tempted them to advise the free trade policy, were swept as with the besom of destruction. The government hoped, but hoped in vain, that the evil was but temporary, and would work its own cure,—that trade would regulate itself,—that specie would find its level:—in other words, that all the dreams and phantasies of the new-school economists would be realized. After two years of intense suffering, the Emperor, by another imperial decree, restored his tariff of restriction and prohibition. And ever since that period, Russia, though a military despotism, has been advancing rapidly in all the arts, comforts, and improvements, which constitute the prosperity of a nation.*

It is useless to dwell upon the example of Holland, which, though famed for its steady habits, was induced, like Russia, in the year 1816, to embrace the charming theories of Smith and Say; and, like Russia, soon found herself in the valley and shadow of national distress, bitterness and disappointment.

We come then to the important proposition, that whilst nations, like individuals, should practice justice, forbearance, and even generosity towards each other,—yet it is a high and solemn obligation imposed upon them, to guard and preserve their own peculiar interests from all injurious rivalry and interference. If the man who neglects to provide for his own household, is worse than an infidel—the government which does not provide for its household, is much more criminal; as the happiness of millions is of more importance than the comfort of a single family. It is useless to discuss the question, how much or how little protection may be necessary;—whether a paltry tax of 15, 20, or 30 per cent. will produce the desired result; the result itself is the great object to be accomplished. It is the sacred duty of government, at every hazard, and at any cost, first to provide the means and materials of national defence and protection; and secondly, to secure to its citizens that constant and regular employment which will yield to all the necessities and comforts of life. In a free country especially,—where a portion of the sovereignty is possessed by each individual, the

* The introduction into Parliament of the sliding scale of duties on foreign corn, by the present Premier, Sir Robert Peel, may be regarded as another ingenious effort to throw dust into the eyes of the people of this country. The American Chamber of Commerce at Liverpool has distinctly set forth, in a memorial addressed to the House of Commons, that nothing less than a moderate fixed duty can, in any respect, benefit American grain growers. Sir Robert, however, has not the least idea of such a concession to his good customers on this side of the Atlantic.

poor should never be allowed to suffer the pangs of hunger and cold, in order that the wealthy may purchase a little cheaper the luxuries and delicacies of foreign climes.

But, say the advocates of free trade,—all this may be very true, and yet protection not necessary. Let us alone, they say,—things will regulate themselves,—men are always wise enough to discern and follow their true interests,—they can take very good care of themselves, without government's intermeddling in private concerns. These, and many other similar sayings, constitute the vocabulary of these amiable theorists. It is a species of small change—which, like copper medals resembling genuine coin, being repeatedly forced into circulation, acquire some degree of credit, though of no intrinsic value. If there be any truth in this self-regulating principle; why is it not applicable to other things besides the commercial policy of a nation? Why not let men settle their own disputes and controversies, without the intervention of courts and juries?—Why not abolish the laws against usury—gaming—and other offences, which are so many inconvenient restraints upon the freedom of individual action,—but which have been placed on the Statute Book for the general welfare of society? If men are sufficiently astute in perceiving and pursuing their own interests, why deprive the wealthy proprietors of the soil, of the privilege of entailing their estates on their eldest sons! In truth, these specious, but sophistical maxims,—lose sight altogether of the great ruling principle, that society is bound so to legislate, as to secure the greatest good to the greatest number. The interests of individuals, and the general interests, so far from always harmonizing, are frequently in direct hostility. Men might derive great profits from some occupations which would be dangerous to the peace, morals or health of the community,—and commerce with other nations, might be so conducted as to produce great individual wealth, and much national impoverishment. The maxim of let us alone, might serve as a very convenient protection to outlaws and pirates,—but is altogether inapplicable to a law-governed community. It is only another version of the trite quotation from the poet—"that they should take who have the power, and they should keep who can."

But there are other popular objections urged against the protection of American industry. To foster manufactures, by high duties, say some, is not only injurious to agriculture, but is taxing one portion or division of the country for the benefit of another. Even if such were the fact, it is still maintained on the principle of the general good, that one half the population ought not to be reduced to low diet and scanty clothing, in order that the other half may be provided with superfluities and luxuries. But the fact itself is not admitted. Injurious to agriculture?—Why, it has grown into a familiar saying, that commerce and manufactures are the handmaids of agriculture. She is mistress it is true,—and the extent and magnificence of her domain,—her venerable antiquity,—the variety of her riches, and the splendor of her temple and its garniture, have all given her a queenly superiority over her less pretending, but not less industrious handmaids. She too, indirectly gives them their support, but they yield her an ample equivalent. Whilst commerce wafts her productions to other climes,—manufactures provide a more constant and unvarying market at her door. If she extracts from earth's bosom the sustenance of life,—her ever faithful ministers provide for her in return, by their ingenuity and toil, an endless variety of comforts and facilities.

"To encourage manufactures," says a late writer on political economy,* "is the most effectual mode of encouraging agriculture. Agriculture is never carried to such perfection in countries exclusively agricultural, as in those, where both pursuits flourish together, and are equally protected by the government." This is undoubtedly true, as the experience of nations will fully attest. The most wretched people on earth, are those who till the earth for a scanty subsistence, without the mechanic arts, and without commerce to transport the surplus fruits of their labor.

But the objection most frequently urged, is not so much to manufactures, as such, as to those of domestic origin; upon the frequently unfounded supposition, that, when protected, they cost more to the American consumer than would the products of foreign industry in the absence of protection. This, it is apprehended, is the chief point in the controversy which has so long agitated the country on this subject. The selfish chord in the human heart has been played upon by the oft-repeated assertion, that the operatives of Leeds and Birmingham, of Sheffield and Manchester, could furnish us the fruits of their labor, upon cheaper terms than the ingenious and enterprising artizans of our own country. In vain has it been urged a thousand times, that if even foreign fabrics could be purchased on better terms, yet that the spirit of true patriotism should incline us to pay the tax for the sake of our country's independence. In vain has it been urged, that no nation can be truly wise or free, which looks for foreign supplies in the essential articles of bread and clothing, and the materials of national defence. In vain has it been alleged, upon the testimony of fact and experience, that the consumer of manufactures is more than indemnified for any supposed enhancement of price, by the regularity and steadiness of a home market, in addition to the foreign one, for all his raw materials and agricultural productions. In vain also, has it been repeatedly argued as more humane,— more congenial with republican institutions,—and, in fact, less expensive, to pay a reasonable tax on our own consumption,—provided, by so doing, our fellow citizens, of all classes, are kept in regular employment,—than to incur the more burdensome obligation of sustaining those receptacles of vice and misery, the poor-houses and jails of the country. These, of course, will always be filled, if there be no employment for the people.

But, in truth, is not this whole doctrine of the superior cheapness of foreign productions a palpable delusion? Without descending to particulars, which in this general view of the protective policy it is desirable to avoid,—may not the experience of the country be appealed to, in order to demonstrate that the high duties imposed by successive tariffs in the last twenty years, have had the direct effect of cheapening the home fabric, as well as the foreign importation? In order to illustrate this subject, let it be remembered that there are two classes of articles imported from abroad; first, such as our own climate, soil, the possession of the raw material, skill, capital, surplus labor, water power and machinery, will enable us to produce among ourselves;—and, secondly, such as, from some peculiarities of soil or climate, or other unknown causes, cannot be produced in our own country. Among the first, may be enumerated the great manufactures of cotton, woollens, and iron; and among the second, the teas and spices, gums and drugs of foreign and distant climes. Now, in regard to the first class, it is indisputably true, however paradoxical it may seem, that the protected articles have become cheaper in proportion as the tax has been increased,—that is to say,—the domestic article has fallen in price below what the foreign import commanded before the high duty was imposed. The British capitalists and tradesmen understand this matter thoroughly. If our manufactories could be destroyed in a single day by a great conflagration, or what is just as bad, in a single year, by an overwhelming and unrestricted foreign rivalry,—the home competition being beaten down, the prices of foreign importations would instantly ascend as the necessary consequence of foreign monopoly. Take, for example, the important coarse cotton manufacture of this country, as illustrating the system of protection. Before the last war with England, our excellent friends on that side of the water, were in the habit of supplying us with a miserable fabric, chiefly imported by the East India Company—for which we paid from 25 to 40 cents per yard. At the close of the war, the duty was fixed at 25 per cent. ad valorem; and subsequently, it was increased to nearly 50 per cent. Now, according to the favorite theory, that the duty is added to the price, and to that extent augments the burden to the consumer, this flimsy article of coarse cotton, or something like it, would have risen in value to 60 cents per yard. But what was the fact? Our own manufacture not only expelled the foreign rival from our shores, but, through the irresistible influence of home competition, supplied the whole United States, and even foreign nations, with an article at one fourth the price, and a dozen times superior in quality. And upon this subject it may not be inappropriate to quote from a speech of Mr. Clay, delivered in the United States Senate, in February 1832. “The next article,” says Mr. Clay, “to which I would call the attention of the Senate, is that of cotton fabrics. The success of our manufacture of coarse cottons is generally admitted. It is demonstrated by the fact, that they meet the cotton fabrics of other countries in foreign markets, and maintain a successful competition with them. There has been a gradual increase of the exports of this article, which is sent to Mexico and the South American Republics, to the Mediterranean and even to Asia. The remarkable fact was lately communicated to me, that the same individual who twenty-five years ago, was engaged in the importation of cotton cloth from Asia for American consumption, is now engaged in the exportation of coarse American cottons to Asia, for Asiatic consumption!—And my honorable friend from Massachusetts (Mr. Silsbee) informed me that on his departure from home, among the last orders which he gave, one was for the exportation of coarse cottons to Sumatra, in the vicinity of Calcutta! I hold in my hand a statement,” continued Mr. Clay, “derived from the most authentic source, showing that the identical description of cotton cloth, which sold in 1817 at 29 cents per yard, was sold in 1819 at 21 cents; in 1821 at 19½ cents; in 1823 at 17 cents; in 1825 at 14½ cents; in 1827 at 13 cents; in 1829 at 9 cents; in 1830 at 9½ cents; and in 1831 at from 10½ to 11 cents. Such is the wonderful effect of protection, competition, and improvement in skill, combined!”

The orator then expatiates upon the similar great success achieved by American ingenuity in the manufacture of superior cottons. “The introduction of calico printing into the United States,” he says, “constitutes an important era in our manufacturing industry. It commenced about the year 1825, and has since made such astonishing advances that the whole quantity now annually printed is but little short of forty millions of yards, about two-thirds of our whole consumption. It is a beautiful manufacture, combining great mechanical skill, with scientific discoveries in chemistry. The engraved cylinders for making the impression require much taste, and put in requisition the genius of the fine arts of design and engraving. Are the fine graceful forms of our fair countrywomen less lovely, when enveloped in the chintzes and calicoes produced by native industry, than when clothed with the tinsel of foreign drapery?”

Here then is the solution of the apparent enigma, that the higher the tax, the cheaper the article. It is home competition, created and excited by protection; and without protection, home competition would die. Prostrate this barrier, as some benevolent theorists would do—to-morrow if they could—and the fate of Russia and Holland would overtake these United States! Ruin and desolation would stalk through the land!

A very interesting aspect, in which this whole subject might be considered, is presented in the operation of the famous Compromise Act of 1832—by which it will be remembered, the duties were to be biennially reduced to the maximum of 20 per cent. This Compromise Act, as is perfectly notorious, was forced upon the country, not at a season of calm and sober thought, but at a time when the seeds of discord had been thrown broadcast through the Republic, and threatened to ripen daily into civil war. Whatever may be thought now, posterity will regard it as a magnanimous sacrifice on the part of the Manufacturing States, of the highest and soundest convictions of national policy upon the altar of domestic peace. A Southern Star of this Confederacy, confounded and bewildered by false lights in political economy, threatened to shoot madly from its sphere; and her more considerate sisters believed that our precious Union was of far too much value, to be calculated in dollars and cents. They yielded. And what benefit has this proud member of the federal compact derived from the concession? Nothing—literally nothing; and if evil, instead of good, may be taken into the account, worse than nothing! Her great staple has regularly declined in value; and the time will, in all probability, shortly arrive, when the overwhelming competition in the cotton culture, both at home and abroad, will cause her to reach out her supplicating hands to the Manufacturing States and exclaim, “help me, Cassius, or I sink!”*

Those who predicted relief to the country, and cheapness to the consumer, from the operation of the Compromise Act, have been sadly mistaken. It is conscientiously believed, that that measure, however well intended, has contributed more to the present embarrassments of the country, than any other single cause, or any other two combined. It stimulated excessive importation far beyond the value of our exports;—it engendered extravagance in the use of foreign luxuries;—it prostrated manufacturing industry. And in all these baleful effects, it exerted a strong influence in corrupting the simplicity of public and private morals. Up to the period of its passage, as already shown, every augmentation of duty had the effect of diminishing prices; and since that time, the equally singular result has been produced of increased prices under a regular diminution of duty.*

But there are other objections frequently urged to the manufacturing policy, which it may not be improper to notice. It is said, for example, to be no less hostile to commerce than to agriculture; but the assertion as to both these great interests, is equally unfounded. In the acute perception of all the subtle operations of trade and currency, and in sound practical knowledge of our business relations with other countries, the mercantile class is unquestionably superior to any other—and they well know that adequate protection to manufactures, has the direct effect of quickening and invigorating commerce. England, the greatest manufacturing nation in the world, is also the most commercial; and of all the portions of our own country, New-England is entitled to the palm of superiority in both pursuits, excepting always the commercial emporium of the Empire State. Protection does not imply, nor necessarily lead to prohibition; on the contrary it stimulates and increases production, and production is the very life-blood of commercial operations. But it would be altogether useless to dwell upon this branch of the subject, or to attempt to elucidate what in itself is so perfectly obvious.

England is referred to as furnishing proof, that as a class of society, manufacturers—especially the operatives—are often reduced to severe distress. But is it necessary seriously to refute the argument derived from this fact? Is it not obvious that by proving too much, it proves nothing? If no interest is to be encouraged, because it suffers occasional vicissitude, in spite of encouragement—then even commerce and agriculture ought to be abandoned, as unworthy of protection; inasmuch as from a variety of causes, both these great interests are subject to frequent depression. A distinguished statistical writer of Great Britain has long since demonstrated, that in the agricultural districts of that kingdom, pauperism often prevailed in as frightful a degree, as in those which were exclu-

* There is no greater popular error than that which supposes that, in all cases and under all circumstances, the price of an imported article is enhanced to the consumer by the amount of the duty—or that the diminution of the duty necessarily cheapens the article. The truth is, that the duty as often falls on the exporter in foreign countries, as upon the consumer here. Sometimes it is borne by the merchant or carrier, and is not unfrequently lost in the price, which is always regulated by the irresistible law of supply and demand. If exporters were not sometimes burthened with the duty on imports, why do the tobacco planters raise such a clamor about the enormous taxes imposed by England, France and Germany, upon their staple?—Vide the admirable speeches of Mr. Evans of Maine, delivered at the Extra Session, and of Mr. Hudson of New-York, at the present Session of Congress—both of which are distinguished for sound, practical common-sense views of the subject.

* Recent accounts render it extremely probable, that, in the course of no very distant period, American raw cotton will be altogether superseded in British markets. Some late proceedings in the South-Western States, seem to indicate that the cotton planters are yielding rapidly to this conviction.

sively manufacturing. The wails of distress which have recently reached us across the Atlantic from her manufacturing towns, may indeed have been partially occasioned by the operation of the corn laws, augmenting as they do the price of bread to the starving operative,—but it would be the height of folly to contend that the repeal or reduction of British duties upon rival fabrics from other countries, would have any other effect than to aggravate the prevailing wretchedness.

The condition of Great Britain in reference to the manufacturing interest, is totally different from that of the United States. She is emphatically, or was until lately, the workshop of the world. The products of her skill and industry have floated over every sea, and have found their way into almost every inhabited region. She not only fully supplies her own population, but the nations of the earth have long been her willing customers. The slightest change therefore in her foreign relations, must operate to obstruct the channels of industry at home, and produce embarrassment more or less permanent. A variety of other causes may be attended with like consequences in that country. Even the caprices of fashion have been known to produce the most desolating effects. A George IV, or a Beau Brummel—who in the world of fashion held even royalty itself for a time in vassalage—could ruin a dozen manufactories, by renouncing the use of a particular button, or a fashionable shoe-buckle. These causes, however, cannot for ages to come, operate with us. Our boundless territory and resources—the extraordinary energy and enterprise of our citizens, and the ease and dexterity with which they can shift from one occupation to another, are so many safeguards against absolute suffering;—and whilst it is true that there have been periods of great depression in our own manufacturing interest, in almost every instance it may be traced directly to the fatal and unwise policy of the government. But manufactories—say those who are determined at all hazards to object—are not only the destroyers of health, but the nurseries of crime! It would require more space than can now be conveniently occupied, to refute this assertion, so far at least as it applies to this country, by an array of facts and authorities, which would to every ingenuous mind, be perfectly convincing. Those who are curious to investigate the subject, are for the present referred to an able and interesting article in the January No. (1841) of the North American Review, containing statistical statements, from two recent publications, on the cotton manufacture—one of English, and the other of American origin. It may be confidently asserted, not only on the authority of the article referred to, but upon the testimony of impartial travellers and close observers, that the operatives in the New-England factories, not only enjoy as great a share of health as any other class of society, but are equally free from the stain of immorality and vice. It would perhaps surprise a Southern lady to learn, that of the 6000 female operatives at Lowell, a large majority are the daughters of respectable New-England farmers; and that the instances are rare in which after a few years employment, they do not return to the paternal roof, not only with unsullied names, but with sufficient earnings to constitute a comfortable outfit for the voyage of life. It would probably create still greater surprise to be informed, that many of these young women are not only beautiful in face and form, (for beauty is confined to no one rank in society,) but are also highly accomplished. They find leisure in the intervals of toil, to cultivate the elegant art of music, and to study the languages of Europe; and what perhaps is more extraordinary than all, the constant and “confounding whirl and clatter” of machinery has not been sufficient to banish the tuneful Nine—the heavenly maids of Castalia—from the banks and waterfalls of the Merrimac and Concord. At the confluence of these two humble streams, the flourishing town of Lowell has, within a few years past, sprung into existence, like the creations of oriental fable. The highly gifted of the female operatives have actually established a literary periodical, sustained by their own contributions, in prose and poetry,—of which the specimens already published would do honor to any publication in our country;—and as to their means of moral and religious instruction, the fact need only be stated, that in a population of 20,000, there are as many as sixteen regularly organized religious societies.

But it is useless to dwell longer upon this branch of the subject.

So far, we have been confined to an examination of the influences which a proper system of protection to domestic industry is calculated to exert upon the comfort and happiness of the social state. Our limits will only allow a brief reference to another important bearing, which such a system has upon the more artificial, but not less essential wants and relations of society, in its political capacity. The great question of the currency, which has long agitated the country, and which will probably continue to distract and divide political parties, is beyond all doubt intimately connected with a sound system of commercial regulations. So long as the country is subject by low rates of import to an overwhelming tide of foreign importation, it is vain and futile to expect a stable and uniform currency, resting upon the basis of the precious metals. Let it be remembered too, that this tide of foreign importation is not the sober result of American mercantile calculation and adventure, but the desperate effort of foreigners to force the products of their pauper-labor into competition with our own native industry. If there be not wisdom enough in our national councils to arrest the accomplishment of so fearful and disastrous a scheme, we shall soon experience a degree of national distress, dismay and darkness—compared with which, the present calamitous condition of affairs, may be considered as absolute prosperity. This is a topic, however, which of itself would cover a wide field of argument and illustration. It is therefore, for the present at least, postponed to the consideration of another important objection, which is frequently urged on this side of the Potomac, to the protective policy.

We have reference of course to the stereotyped assertion; that all such legislation by Congress, is unconstitutional. This objection is certainly formidable, if true. The covenant of our Union was bequeathed to us by an illustrious race; and we, their descendants, ought not to profane with unhallowed touch, the work of our fathers. But, is it not certain that there exists to a considerable extent, a morbid feeling on this subject; which is as irrational as it is hurtful to the best interests of society? If the Constitution of the United States, be the instrument which some represent it,—so far from the bond of union, and the blessing which our ancestors designed it to be—it would sit, like an incubus, upon the expanding energies of a mighty nation,—trammelling its every movement, and paralyzing its best efforts to promote the public happiness. What would be thought of that constitution or form of government, whose framers—obeying the suggestions of a wild and fanatical philanthropy—should design, by its adoption, to promote the interests of all the rest of mankind, in preference to their own? And yet, if the power of protection be denied to the federal legislature; and the nation's representatives are impotent on so vital a question, such would precisely be the very effect in regard to ourselves. In truth, it is almost impossible to treat the momentous trifles and elaborate nothings of political metaphysics, with any thing like becoming gravity. The inveterate propensity supposed to be peculiar to Southern minds, to desert the plain-beaten track of just reasoning and common sense; and to dwell in the far-off and intangible regions of abstraction, might indeed serve as a fitting theme for pleasantry, if its actual effect on society was not so decidedly pernicious. Why it is that Southern latitudes are thought to be most favorable to the propagation of this singular mental malady, is not in our philosophy to determine; but certain it is that, even in Old England, and at a distant past period, there are proofs revealed to us of the existence of a similar distemper. The immortal author of Hudibras tells us of one who was so acutely analytic, that he could with ease

“divide

A hair 'twixt south and south-west side;”

and Cowper—the amiable Cowper—has described a class of beings who were always “Throwing buckets into empty wells,

And growing old in drawing nothing up.”

That severe, and as many think malevolent satirist, Dean Swift, speaks of a small knot of philosophers, in one of his imaginary islands, who had spent about sixty winters in the profitable experiment of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers; but as Swift lived in a far distant age and generation from ours, of course we cannot suppose that he had any allusion to those who are so extravagantly fond of weaving their airy tissues about strict construction and constitutional law.

But there are some, undoubtedly, who cherish these refinements and peculiarities of sentiment, with an earnestness and devotion that fully attest their sincerity. Such are entitled to all that respect which is due to purity of motive, even though mixed up with incurable error of opinion. May not they be appealed to, however, to think upon this subject as American patriots, and not as the disciples of a particular school or party, or as the inhabitants of any particular section of the Union? All honest men ought, and it is presumed, do desire, that the Constitution or national compact under which we live, should be honestly, faithfully, and truly expounded; and it may be asked by what authority it is, that any one State, or any one individual, or any five hundred individuals—apart from the organized tribunals of the nation—can claim the prerogative of dictating to millions besides, the only true and oracular interpretation of that instrument? The celebrated and eccentric—but erudite Emanuel Swedenbourg; declared before the world (and his followers implicitly believed him), that to him alone was entrusted the golden key by which the hidden mysteries of the Sacred Text were unlocked;—but we know of no political Swedenbourg in this country, who is either sufficiently inspired, or who can claim an exclusive patent to expound the Federal Constitution. Most of our readers have heard of, if they have not all read, Mr. Madison's celebrated Report and Resolutions of 1798-'99—and, undoubtedly, it is an admirable State Paper,—but there are thousands who, in the exercise of their own private judgment, prefer appealing to the text itself, from even that able commentary: precisely as the great body of Christians appeal from the creeds and traditions of the Church, if not in their opinion conformable to the Sacred Records. The real difficulty is, that the Report and Resolutions referred to, which were intended to settle the true meaning of the Constitution, have received almost as many interpretations as the Constitution itself. The chivalrous State of South Carolina, some years since, disdaining any other construction but her own, buckled on the armor of war; and by way of manifesting her excessive attachment to the Union, deliberately resolved to tear the Union into pieces. On the other hand, this good old

Commonwealth of ours, or rather the recognized elders of her faith, guided by milder counsels, have always contended that the Report and Resolutions did not authorise the States, or any one of them, to fight against the General Government, but only most respectfully to "interpose" and protest against its doings. Which of these two schools is the true and orthodox one, the living or future generations must determine. One thing, however, is absolutely certain; that Mr. Madison, the distinguished author of this celebrated exposition, as well as one of the main founders of the Federal Charter itself, never for a moment imagined that the right was denied to Congress, to impose in its discretion discriminating and countervailing duties upon foreign importations. In the letter of that great man, addressed in September 1828 to Mr. Cabell, the present President of the James River and Kanawha Company, among the other cogent points of view in which he places the argument, he emphatically says—"If Congress have not the power, it is annihilated for the nation; a policy without example in any other nation." And why did he say so? Because the power of taxing imports is expressly prohibited to the States, and as expressly conferred upon the Federal Legislature,—and Mr. Madison was wise enough to know, that this power, in conjunction with that greater prerogative to regulate exclusively trade with other countries, was sufficient to invest the National Government with all the power, in reference to the whole subject, which could possibly be exercised by any independent nation. No man, moreover, knew better than Mr. Madison, that to give to the General Government supreme and unlimited control over trade and commerce, was one of the main inducements to the formation of the Federal Constitution.

We shall, however, leap over these thorny points of constitutional law; and at once arrive at the great conclusion, that Congress has not only the legal and constitutional right to protect and foster manufactures—but that there rests upon that body a solemn moral obligation to do so; and we moreover trust, that statesmen will be found, of sufficient wisdom and firmness, to assume whatever responsibility may be necessary in the performance of so high a duty. Let them stand up for their whole country; and rest in the sure confidence that, notwithstanding temporary and sectional discontents, their labors will be ultimately rewarded, by the approbation of posterity, if not of the present generation. Their enviable lot will be "The applause of listening Senates to command,

The threats of pain and ruin to despise;
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes."

In this great achievement, they will not only find themselves sustained by the precepts, and associated in their country's annals with the illustrious names of Jefferson and Madison—but with one also whose immortal example is in itself a tower of strength,—whose extraordinary qualities procured him the distinguishing title of the Father of his Country, and whose matchless virtues rendered him an ornament to the human race.

In reference to ourselves, Virginia should be the very last State in the Union to resist the accomplishment of so desirable an object,—for there is perhaps no territory in the world of the same extent, which abounds more in natural resources, or which possesses greater facilities for manufacturing and mechanical enterprise.

In conclusion; we will quote a passage from an eloquent address of the "American Institute of the City of New-York:"

"Our mountains are full of iron and coal, but we prefer the mountains of Wales to those of Pennsylvania or Virginia. Our hills might be covered with flocks, and our fields with the mulberry—but the flocks of England and the silks of France can furnish a foreign surplus cheaper, while our own industry is unoccupied, and our own resources remain idle. Broken down in credit, the States are driven to shifts and subterfuges, rather than assume a bold confidence in our energies, which successful active industry would create, rendering us fearless of taxes, to sustain the credit which now lies prostrate. Eighteen millions of people boasting of freedom and intelligence, to be thus basely truckling, is a spectacle to move the contempt of the world. Why is it so? There must be some radical defect in our policy, or such things could never be. That defect, depend upon it, is the blighting system of our so called free trade—which cuts up our industry at the roots, overthrows our currency, and abstracts the soul of our energies, till we are left weak, helpless and contemptible, to be mocked at by those who fatten by our folly."

H

ON THE DEATH OF THE HON. LINN BANKS.

To walk on honor's height, with stainless brow,
With patriot aim, the public weal to serve,
Nor shrink from toil in halcyon bowers of ease,
Nor in the trial-hour from duty swerve,—

To win the plaudit of a lofty fame,—
A noble purpose, free from all disguise,
Seal'd with the love of those from whom it came,—
This was his meed,—for whom Virginia sighs.

This was his meed, who rose in health, at morn,
With eye exulting in the golden ray,—
Yet ere chill evening drew its darken'd pall,
Was swept from life, and all its joys away.

But she, whose heart with his, was early bound.
That kindred spirit, whom he held so dear,—
The fond companion of his cherish'd home,—
How sinks her soul beneath this stroke severe!

How sinks her soul,—yet not in dark despair,—
O'er the wild deluge gleams the radiant bow,—
A solace hath she, which no mortal hand
Can skill to mingle with her cup of woe;—

A cordial trust in Heaven's unerring will,
Which daily strives to make that will its own,—
A faith, that in each pang of sorrow views
A surer passport to its Father's Throne;—

A glorious hope, that 'mid its tears can smile,—
And through the clouds a beckoning spirit see,— Pursue its lonely path, a little while,—
Then join the lov'd one, in Eternity.

L. H. SIGOURNEY.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE

vs.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

No American reader of Blackwood's Magazine, can have perused, in its December number, an article on his country, without mingled indignation and disgust. The abuse of Republican institutions, the harsh language applied to our conduct in matters affecting British rights and interests, the ridicule of our manners, are all too common with English travellers and periodicals, to excite our sensibilities, or even to command our attention. To quote from the writer of the offensive article; "we are not going to fight that controversy now." The world will do justice to our character and that of our institutions, and disregard these censures so evidently dictated by rancorous enmity and blind prejudice. This article contains one paragraph, not only so atrocious in itself, but so different from anything which we have hitherto encountered in the most rabid of English writers, that it seems to us worthy of being brought into especial notice, and to be branded with the infamy which its language and spirit eminently deserve. We mean that derogatory to the spotless character of Washington. We could hardly have supposed that the editors, or any of the contributors of this magazine would have degraded themselves so far, as to follow the example of the hireling patriot, O'Connell, by venting their viper-like malignity on one long since dead, and known by the whole civilized world, to have lived "without fear and without reproach."

We shall not contest the often mooted points, whether we eat faster or slower, are more or less riotous, worse or better mannered, more or less eager for territorial accessions per fas et nefas, than the English. The whole tribe of British tourists and journalists is at liberty to think, to say, and to write anything on these subjects. But when a writer in a literary periodical of deservedly high reputation as such, attempts, in utter disregard of truth and decency, to fix a stain on the hitherto unsullied escutcheon of the hero and statesman, whom we justly regard as the purest model of republican virtue, we feel that the base assailant's "foot is on the honor of our country:" we know that no defence is necessary; indeed, the charges are not only disbelieved by others, but can never have been credited by their author. We may be asked then, why notice them at all? Our answer is, that we mean to carry the war into Africa; we mean to infer that the author of a slander contradicted by every act of its illustrious object, and by every word that ever fell from his lips or his pen, betrays the weakness of the cause which he advocates. We are fully prepared to make every allowance for national and political prejudice in regard to men, measures and manners. We are ready to admit that many things go wrong in our own country; that a spirit of lawlessness has sometimes been manifested by our citizens, which we would gladly see suppressed; that our politicians too often yield to the caprices of the people, instead of endeavoring to convince them of their errors. We were never fools enough to suppose that our institutions, or our people, were free from human frailty. But having made all these admissions, we know full well, that another side of the picture will present monarchy and its subjects in an equally unfavorable point of view.

But to the obnoxious passage. Col. Maxwell, a British traveller in the United States, is thus castigated for applying the epithet "immortal" to General Washington.

"We shall have no quarrel with any man for expressing his sentiments, if he has taken any trouble to form them. But the epithet "immortal" applied to Washington, is not put in any other sense than as it may be applied to any other successful culprit. If ever man was a rebel, that man was George Washington. We are not going to fight that controversy now; but if an oath of allegiance was ever worth a straw, it is impossible to reconcile Washington's conduct with honor. He was undoubtedly a very able man, and a very successful one; but, that he had the right on his side, that he was justified in his revolt, or that he was anything beyond the slave of an unconscionable ambition in his own person, and the instrument of a corrupt and unprincipled revolt in that of others, facts give the most unanswerable testimony. He was immortal in no other sense than any lucky transgressor is immortal; and this the Colonel ought to have known."

Now we could scarcely have expected a writer for Blackwood, to think "that Washington had right on his side, or was justified in his revolts." But we had not supposed there was a man living, with information and talent enough to write 'a penny-a-liner,' and yet reckless enough to assert, that George Washington was the "slave of an unconscionable ambition." We are no man-wor shippers, and never believed Washington himself exempt from the weaknesses of human nature. We have examined the history of his life, with all the impartiality that we could command; and, we are entirely at a loss to conjecture, what portion of that history can seem at all to justify the charge of "unconscientious ambition." That he had ambition of another and more exalted order, no man can doubt. That he desired to live in the memory of his fellow-men, to promote the true welfare of his country, and to preserve his own character unsullied, there can be no question. But that he had none of that vulgar ambition which would have induced him to trample on the rights of others for its gratification, to wade through blood to a throne, "facts give the most unanswerable testimony." We cannot say that, like Julius Cæsar, he thrice rejected a kingly crown. But it is a well ascertained fact that the idea of royalty, once suggested to him by some of his officers, was scouted with an unaffected horror that silenced its advisers forever. To appreciate the merit of his conduct on that occasion, it is necessary to recollect the peculiar circumstances of his education and situation. He was not born, as Cæsar was, in a republic, either real or nominal. He had been educated in the belief, that the British government, at least on the other side of the Atlantic, was the best that ever existed. He had seen and felt far more acutely than any other man living, the manifold evils of an inefficient confederation. He had seen his own exertions constantly paralysed, the public credit destroyed, the public safety endangered by the weakness of Congress and the divisions of the states. When the sense of mutual interest and peril, which, during the war, had held the union together, had been forgotten in success and peace, there was but too much reason to fear the horrors of anarchy. His unpaid troops were at the time of the suggestion, murmuring around him, and many of them no doubt ready to promote any views of their beloved leader, provided his first step should be the satisfaction of their own just claims. At this alarming crisis, some of his ablest officers attempted to persuade him, that he could not only compel Congress to pay his war-worn troops, but secure the permanent tranquillity and prosperity of his country, by assuming the authority, if not the name of king. Was ever a more tempting opportunity presented to unconscientious ambition? Not that we believe such an attempt would have been either successful or justifiable. But a mind infatuated with the love of power, would have been too readily convinced that such an usurpation was both practicable and right.

It has been said, and said perhaps with truth, that, when Cromwell and Bonaparte and Cæsar, assumed supreme power in their respective countries, they thereby preserved them from still greater evils. The people were unfit for freedom, and could be preserved from falling into the yawning gulf of anarchy, by nothing but the strong arm of despotism. Such a pretext, although subsequently shown to have been groundless by our glorious experience, might have been plausibly urged in that alarming emergency. But far different were the conduct and language of Washington. The simplicity and earnestness with which he rebuked the authors of the proposal, when connected with the unvaried tenor of his whole life, must convince every candid inquirer, that lawless power had no charms for his noble spirit. But the tory of Blackwood's Magazine, says "he was ambitious;" and tories "are all honorable men." His ipse dixit is no doubt amply sufficient to reverse all the facts of history, and the long-settled opinion of Christendom.

The same conscientious writer tells us that Washington violated his oath of allegiance, and thereby forfeited his honor. We do not pretend to understand the obligations which he supposes are incurred by taking an oath of allegiance. But unless Sir Robert Filmer's doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance be assumed as true, we cannot perceive how an oath of allegiance, once taken, can imply perpetual submission to a government, which deliberately violates the conditions, necessarily, although tacitly, annexed to such oath. A zealous supporter of the house of Hanover would find it difficult to reconcile this doctrine with the conduct of those who placed that house on the throne. Had not Marlborough and Somers, and the host of great men who dethroned the bigot James, because he attempted to trample on their rights of conscience, taken an oath of allegiance? Will any subject of Queen Victoria charge them with dishonor, because they exercised the undoubted rights of freemen, in expelling a monarch, who had disregarded his duties and his oath, and was laboring to restore the corrupt tyranny of Rome?

It is well-known that Lord Chatham, not only the most eloquent, but the most able prime minister that England has ever had, denied that the British parliament possessed the power of taxation in the American colonies, except for the purpose of regulating commerce. It is equally well-known, that the continued and obstinate exercise of this very unconstitutional power, produced our revolution, and made Washington "a rebel." Washington and his compeers carried out into action the great principles of constitutional liberty, which were wrung by the confederate barons from the bosom of John at Runnymede, which had been strengthened and enlarged by the wisdom of successive ages, and had been sustained by the profound philosophy and fervid imagination of Burke, the irresistible eloquence and dauntless energy of the "immortal" Chatham, and are still cherished as the pride and essence of the British Government. We can well conceive that an advocate of the exploded doctrines of Sir Robert Filmer, could, with consistency and sincerity, attach the epithets of "dishonor" and "rebel" to the name of Washington. But when a professed admirer of the British constitution, as it now is, and as it was made by the famous revolution of 1688, uses such language, we can ascribe it to nothing but a base malignity, which will allow no man's character, no matter how pure and exalted, to interfere with its darling object, the disgrace and overthrow of republican institutions.

The writer of this highly liberal essay, which is calculated to give us so exalted an idea of the refinement, fairness and virtue which are the offspring of monarchical theories and aristocratic associations, tells us, that "The speeches of her (America's) rabble, we may disregard; her vulgar newspapers we may disdain." We might expect that a magazine which looks with such merited contempt on newspaper vulgarity, would, on all occasions, be exempt from the charge of coarse abuse and partizan violence. Yet those who are acquainted with the political articles of Blackwood's Magazine, must admit that there cannot be found, in the dirtiest pages of the lowest partisan scribbler in these vulgar United States, specimens of more outrageous scurrility and unjustifiable denunciation, than are common in this double-refined organ of aristocracy and monarchy.

We are far from justifying or approving the coarse abuse and reckless violence of many American newspapers. All men lament this licentiousness, as an evil, perhaps inseparably connected with unlimited freedom of the press. But we are much mistaken, if the same excesses of sweeping denunciation, and coarse unfairness, do not disgrace the British political press.

Giving up to just censure that portion of the periodicals on both sides of the Atlantic, we can turn proudly to another class devoted to literature among us, and say that as far as we know them, they are unstained by these malignant assaults on the characters of the illustrious men either in this, or other countries. The political articles which they contain, if they do not possess entire impartiality, which is scarcely to be expected from writers at all conversant with such topics, show, at least, an effort to preserve that dignified fairness and measured language, which become authors professedly withdrawn from the heated atmosphere of party strife. The last administration in the United States, encountered the most determined opposition and unmeasured denunciation from a party which ultimately triumphed. We hazard little in saying, that in the very crisis of the battle between these inflamed parties, no literary periodical could have been found so lost to decency and propriety, as to pronounce Mr. Van Buren and his whole cabinet, or General Harrison and his leading friends, utterly destitute, not only of talent, but of principle. Yet, if we mistake not, this has been repeatedly said during some years past by Blackwood's Magazine concerning the Melbourne cabinet. To read those articles, one would suppose that not only the gifts of genius, and the sagacity of the statesman, but the ordinary principles of morality, were confined within the pale of the high tory party.

We have been often mortified and disgusted at seeing such wholesale political denunciation, so connected with articles of high literary merit. But we did not conceive ourselves called on to interfere, because the abuse was confined to those living within the British seas, and, because we were not sufficiently acquainted with the characters of those assailed, to draw the precise line between malicious slander and merited censure.

But when the best and greatest of our own countrymen is not spared, when the repose of that tomb at which the genius of Byron and the eloquence of Brougham, have done homage, is disturbed by the hyena-spirit of a monarchical slave, we believe that "forbearance ceases to be a virtue." We say here, with still greater confidence, that American literary periodicals would scorn such an insult to the illustrious dead who sleep in British earth. We cherish the memory of such men as Chatham and Burke, and Pitt, and Fox, and Wilberforce, as the common glory and treasure of those who are sprung from Anglo-Saxon blood. We may believe that they had errors in political theory, and private conduct. But we brand them not with dishonor; we call them neither rebels nor anarchists, nor the blind worshippers of royal prerogative. In spite of the change of opinion, which, in the declining years of the great Burke, threw a shade of suspicion over his integrity, while it gave occasion to some of the brightest displays of his transcendent genius, we cannot, and we will not believe, that this political sage stooped to barter his unsullied fame for sordid lucre, or the sunshine of court-favor.

And yet, if we were the unscrupulous advocates of republicanism, ready, like the writer in Blackwood, to blacken the character of every man who stands foremost among our opponents, we should not let slip this opportunity of shooting our envenomed arrows at a "shining mark." But let us come down to our own times.

We are thoroughly convinced, that the rights, nay the lives, of the starving operatives of Britain, are disregarded by those, who, like Peele and Wellington, uphold the corn-law monopoly. Yet far be it from us, to charge those distinguished men with personal dishonor. We believe them to be widely mistaken; we believe them to be governed by those mixed motives that always operate on frail humanity; but we should despise ourselves, if we were capable of applying the epithets of selfish tyrants and murderers, to men, whose private and political integrity, we have no reason to question.

Nay, we recollect well, that, when Wellington, after consenting to Catholic emancipation, refused to crown his popularity as premier, by supporting parliamentary reform, although differing with him toto celo, as to the policy and justice of the latter measure, we applauded the moral firmness with which he resisted what he conceived to be a dangerous innovation. We claim no credit for this exercise of common justice and charity, in judging the motives of opponents, except in contrast with the unsparing malignity of the article which we have been endeavoring to expose. We contend, that it is a contrast highly honorable to our republican institutions, by showing that those, at least, who have been educated under their influence, and are devoted to literature, are incapable of stooping to misrepresentation and falsehood, even for the purpose of advancing their darling political theories. That jesuitical course is left for those who are loudest in denouncing republican coarseness, ingratitude and immorality. But shall we imitate the example of illiberality which we have censured in the obnoxious paragraph, by supposing that the well-educated Tories of Great Britain generally entertained the sentiment which it contains, or rather would sanction its promulgation? (for no well-informed man living, holds the sentiment.) No.

We have a better opinion of the morality prevalent in the party that now controls the destinies of our father-land. We believe, that there are many among the steady opponents of republicanism on principle, and conscientious supporters of monarchy, who, yet, after "taking pains to form their opinions," agree with Col. Maxwell in admiring the immortal Washington. We believe that there are many who, in spite of their mortification at the loss of the colonies now composing these United States, their disgust at the occasional bad taste of our popular orators, and the occasional outbreaks of popular violence (which however are just as frequent in the fast-anchored isle,) are not blind to the high talent, and noble virtues of many leaders in the revolution which they disapprove, and framers of the government which they abhor. But if we do more than justice to the high-minded Tories of Britain, in supposing that they cannot approve the conduct of a literary periodical, which although widely circulated and admired for its literary merits, in this country, yet causelessly and recklessly defames a man, who is not only enshrined in our hearts, but is universally regarded as one of the ornaments of his race, we feel certain that this unprovoked slander must recoil with tenfold force on its authors and abettors. We are sure that we have no reptile that will revenge this insult by attempting to shed its venom on any of the proud names which adorn British history.

TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. EDITH SANDERS.

Vale Evergreen was bright and fair,—
In Nature's beauty drest,—
And there a cherish'd mother found
A sweet abode of rest.

The care that o'er her children watch'd
Through years of widow'd pain,—
The love that for their welfare strove,
Was render'd back again.

Fresh seeds for Heaven, in woodbine cot,
She serv'd both night and day,—
And God had bade them richly bloom
Around her temples grey.

Serene, upon her couch she lay,—
"This home is dear," she said,—
"But to another fain I'd rise,"—
And meekly bow'd her head.

A dark-wing'd form was hovering near,—
Within the curtain's fold,—
His hand upon her heart he press'd,—
And its red stream grew cold.

The kneeling daughter mark'd his deed,
And prayers with tears were given,—
But when her trembling glance she rais'd
That Mother was in Heaven.

We opened this volume with mingled hope and fear. We had known the author (Washington Allston,) as an artist, and had been ourselves almost inspired by the fascinations of his pencil. We hoped that he who had shown himself the foremost of our day, in that divine art, might also embody, not less perfectly, some of the creations of his ever-teeming fancy, in the less plastic material of words. Yet we feared disappointment.

The elements which make up the true Artist, be he painter, sculptor, or architect, have the same origin with those which make the poet; they seem unlike, more from their style of dress, than they really are in their own nature: the painter chooses colors and the brush; the sculptor, the rigid marble; and the poet, words. The means and instruments thus selected, are used to embody the same idea; they only determine the matters of form and drapery, which do not touch the intimate nature of the conception. Not to insist that the aim of the artist in either case, is the development of ideal beauty:—there are few subjects, within the province of either, which may not be expressed under the forms of all. As an example: the sculptured agonies of Laocoon afford as fit and fine a study for the painter, as they have done for the poet. The same sentiments and ideas may be expressed by each:—priestly horror, paternal anguish, and the helplessness of infant and human strength struggling with brute nature. But each artist may choose the conditions under which he will give utterance to his thought, though he cannot go beyond them. The sculptor, while he has the advantage of distinctness, is shut up to a moment of time, to a single attitude of the protracted tenor of the conflict; he can give only the chief actors in the melancholy scene: the painter, while he excels in vividness, is subject to the first two of the limitations mentioned, and can only introduce more actors: as the terror-smitten spectators, and those accessories which nature furnishes to enhance the mournfulness of the spectacle; and the poet, while he loses both in distinctness and vividness by his use of words, has fewer restraints, and a wider scope for the selection of his circumstances, and may, as words may, carve or paint in the minutest particulars the whole of the sad history. And this community will be often found to exist, even in subjects which, at first thought, may seem appropriate only to one branch of art. The sculptor can allegorize no less successfully than the poet. Homer has painted a didactic poem of most intense morality. In each artist, the elements of thought and character, from which the creation springs, must be the same; and, in a large degree, they must be combined and matured by the same culture. There must be in each, a sincere love of ideal beauty, and the power to recognize it in its faintest and minutest manifestations:—a temper of mind and heart, at once lofty and lowly, from which is excluded every selfish and unworthy aim; and from which we cast out as alien, every impure thought and emotion, while it indulges in the noblest aspirations; feeling itself to be of kin with all that is beautiful and sublime in the universe, it is ready to acknowledge itself but the organ and instrument, not the author, of the ideal it sees, and would fain represent. There must be a sympathy with nature;—not merely an admiration of its fair and glorious features, (though that, if it be genuine, is no slight attainment,) but a fellow feeling with its life, and an appreciation of the fine spirit that is every where infused throughout its works. Then the eye must be disciplined to an exact discernment of its varied forms, and the judgment trained to a skilful combination of them, and the taste to an intuitive perception of true adjustment and proportions. Then too, there must be an almost religious devotion to the art—an enthusiasm which pursues it for its own excellence, and which is led by a swaying impulse of the artist's own being, and which therefore judges of it by its own principles, and by no caprice of fashion, nor standard of other men's opinions.

All this and much more, which all true artists have in common, and which shows an original identity, is not enough. Each must make himself master, or rather prove himself an apt scholar, of the conditions which constitute the peculiarity of his art. To pass by things less obvious, the dextrous use of the chisel, the judicious mixing of colors, and the delicate sense of words which the poet needs, are matters of practice, of mechanical trial, and of an organization that is not given alike to all. So simple an illustration may show, that, in the leading qualities of mind and of heart which make the painter and the poet, there is a substantial identity, and an entire resemblance; and yet there are differences, in culture, if not in nature, which render it difficult for one to excel in both branches of art. Especially does this difference distinguish the poet (and we mean the painter in words, not the mere versifier,) from his fellow-artists. The instrument he uses is the most difficult, and the most rarely mastered. The symbols are the most remote from the nature he would represent; though of so strange a power in his hand who wields them well. Words stir our hearts, not by their plain meaning only, but by fitful, shadowy, and forgotten associations. They open to us scenes of splendor and beauty, by no conventional necessity, but by hints, and in the way of indirectness. They disclose invisible relations, as the face of a friend reveals his heart to us. In rude hands, words have no power of themselves; they are bald and bare, or harsh and crude; but, for him who has learned to command them, they, like the wand of Prospero, will people desert islands with spirits; or, like the midnight revellers in Comus, utter music that shall "smooth the raven down of darkness till it smile." Such skill is no accomplishment for a holiday, to be learned in an hour; it can be attained only by toil and assiduous observation; by study long continued with the eye perpetually upon it. It was therefore not without some apprehension, that we received a book from one who has given his studious nights, and the fullest effort of his powers, to an art so widely different from that of book-making, and which demands such a diversity of attainments.

Some few summers ago, it was our fortune to be in Boston: and while there, no place was so attractive as the gallery of Allston's pictures. They had been gathered from distant parts of the country, where wealth and taste had separated them; and they were opened for a few months to the inspection of the curious, and for the benefit of the art. There were all, nearly all, the works of one whom it is bare justice to call the master of his art in our day,—the early efforts of conscious genius, and the transcendent productions of the same genius in its maturity—the transcript and history of a rare mind and of a noble heart:—exhibiting a strength and delicacy of conception, a grace and perfectness of coloring, and a singular accuracy of finish, which have given the author a place among the great masters of olden time. We shall not soon forget with what emotion we gazed on them, as we may never again; how we looked, with astonishment and awe, on the raising of the dead; and with what sense of a holy presence, on the rapt prophet; and with what feeling akin to love, on the twilight beauty of Rosalie. We have been hardly less surprised than pleased at the artist's success in this new sphere. Though his fame will in no way rest on this, his unusual occupation, it will live to prove the extent and versatility of his powers. We had known him many years ago, as the author of another work, which was, as we recollect, a graceful play of fancy. We find him here more truly a poet; and of a high order, though not in his "singing robes." The characters in this tale, modestly so called, are wrought with great distinctness and effect; the descriptions are glowing and life-like; the dialogue most fit and happy; and, humble as its pretensions are, there is genius and taste enough displayed in it, to have made a dozen ordinary novelists. The grouping and contrasts are skilful, and the disposition of the plot consummate. It is a sad tale; but it is a tale of that sadness which attracts human sadness. We will only add, that we have been struck with the harmony, as well as with the nice choice of the language—the sentences wearing no appearance of elaboration, but running naturally into a graceful and most various melody.

We cannot analyze it, and we need not commend it further. We prefer to add a few passages, which may have an interest independent of the general structure of the work.

And first, hear how nobly he discourses, in the person of Monaldi, of the artist and of his art:

"'He accepted the commission,' (to paint for the pontiff a companion to a Madonna of Raffaele,) he said, 'not with the arrogant hope of producing a rival to the picture of Raffaele, but in grateful compliance with the wishes of his patron.' Besides, with a just reverence for his art, he looked upon all competition as unworthy a true artist; nay, he even doubted whether any one could command the powers of his own genius, whilst his mind was under the influence of so vulgar a motive. 'For what,' he would say, 'is that which you call my genius, but the love and perception of excellence—the twin power that incites and directs to successful production? which can never co-exist with the desire to diminish, or even contend with, that in another. It would be rather self-love, than a true love of excellence, did I value it less in Raffaele than in myself.' He might have added another reason; that competition implying comparison, and comparison a difference only of degree, could not really exist between men of genius; since the individualizing power by which we recognize genius, or the originating faculty, must necessarily mark man's several productions by a difference in kind. But he needed not this deduction of the understanding:—his own lofty impulses placed him on surer ground."

We are not sure that the instinct of Monaldi was not truer than the logic of the author; at any rate, we are better satisfied of the fact, than we are with the reason given to account for it. But take this description:

"The day had begun sultry, but was now closing, after a refreshing shower, with one of those delicious atmospheres known only in the South; so sweet! so bright!—as if the common air had suddenly given place to the humid sighs of answering orange groves, and the intermingled breath of enamored flowers—as if the dripping trees and fields had actually been flooded by liquid gold from the sun; then the hum of insects, the twittering of birds, and the ceaseless darting of innumerable lizards, so filling the ear and eye with sound and motion, as if the very ground and air were exulting in life! . . . It was the bay of Naples; a scene not to be painted by words—even though its waters were likened to a sea of sapphire, its mountains to amethysts, and its skirting city to a fillet of snow; these indeed might give their color, but not the harmony of lines, nor the light and shadow, nor the dazling expanse—and never the living conscious joy, with which they seemed to send up their shout of praise to the immeasurable depths above. There is a voice in nature ever audible to the heart—which no hardness can shut out—and for its weal or wo, as the heart may be; Maldina heard it now, breaking upon him like a clap of thunder. He instinctively turned from the scene, and looked towards Vesuvius: but even from that he shrank: for the terrible Vesuvius was now smiling in purple, and reposing beneath his pillars of smoke as under a gorgeous canopy: the very type of himself—gay and peaceful without, yet restless and racked with fire within."

Read too, this true and simple sketch of the relations of insanity:

"If it be hard to part with the dead, and to see one borne to the grave with whom we have been accustomed to associate all our wishes and schemes of happiness, and without whom nothing in life seems capable of imparting enjoyment, there is yet a consolation in the thought, that our grief is only for our own suffering, since it cannot reach one to whom our loss is a gain. What then must it be to feel this entire revulsion from the living; to know that the object with whom our very soul was mixed and who is thus parted from our common being still walks the same earth, breathes the same air and wears the same form: yet lives, as to us, as dead—closed, sealed up from all our thoughts and sympathies, like to a statue of adamant. What must it be to know too that this second self, though callous and impenetrable from without, is yet within, all sense. The partial palsy-death of the body, is but a faint image of this half-death of the twin-being wife and husband. And Rosalia soon felt it in all its agony."

Such passages of just sentiment and beauty are numerous throughout the work. In the delineation of passion, there are scenes awfully terrific: and many exquisite pictures of the most subdued and delicate emotions. Take a single example which combines description, with the pain of a trusting heart, that fears it may have been deceived, and grieves most for the degradation of what it loved:

"It was one of those evenings never to be forgotten by a painter—but one which must come upon him in misery as a gorgeous mockery. The sun was yet up, and resting on the highest peak of a ridge of mountain-shaped clouds, that seemed to make a part of the distance; suddenly he disappeared, and the landscape was overspread with a cold lurid hue; then, as if molten in a furnace, the fictitious mountains began to glow; in a moment more they tumbled asunder; in another he was seen again, piercing their fragments, and darting his shafts to the remotest east, till, reaching the horizon, he appeared to recall them, and with a parting flash, to wrap the whole heavens in flame.

• • • Monaldi groaned aloud: 'No, thou art nothing to me now, thou glorious sun—nothing. To me thou art dead, buried—and forever—in her darkness; her's, whose own glory once made me to love thee; who clothed me with a brightness even more than thine; who followed me like a spirit, in sleep even, visiting my dreams, as if to fill up the blank of night—to give a continuous splendor to my existence. Oh, idiot, driveller! so to cling to a shadow—a cheat of the senses! What is she to me now! what can she ever be! she that is—that ever was— He could not utter the word.

• • • A desolate vacancy now spread over him, and leaning over the bridge, he seemed to lose himself in the deepening gloom of the scene, till the black river, that moved beneath him, appeared almost a part of his mind, and its imageless waters but the visible current of his own dark thoughts."

We will extract but one more passage, and one worthy of the artist. It is a description of an early painting by Monaldi:

"The subject of the picture was the first sacrifice of Noah after the subsiding of the waters; a subject of little promise from an ordinary hand, but of all others perhaps the best suited to exhibit that rare union of intense feeling and lofty imagination which characterized Monaldi. The composition consisted of the patriarch and his family at the altar, which occupied the foreground; a distant view of Mount Ararat, with the ark resting on its peak, and the intermediate vale. These were scanty materials for a picture; but the fulness with which they seemed to distend the spectator's mind, left no room for the thought. There was no dramatic variety in the kneeling father and his kneeling children; they expressed but one sentiment—adoration; and it seemed to go up as with a single voice. This gave the soul which the spectator felt; but it was one that could not have gone forth under common daylight, nor ever have pervaded with such emphatic life other than the shadowy valley, the misty mountain, the mysterious ark—again floating as it were on a sea of clouds—and the lurid, deep-toned sky, dark, yet bright, which spoke to the imagination of a lost and recovered world—once dead, now alive, and pouring out her first song of praise even from under the pall of death."

But the peculiar excellences of this work can in no way be represented by quotations: they lie rather in the completeness and finish of the successive scenes, the easy and natural development of the characters, and the exquisite taste which presides over the whole, and lets off no point with a slovenly execution, and yet suffers no one to swell to undue dimensions.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.

[It would be sheer affectation in us to disguise the feelings of pride and pleasure with which we lay the following article from the pen of Lieut. M. F. MAURY, of the U. S. Navy, before his countrymen—assured as we are, that it will strike the proper chord in every American bosom. We freely confess that, in the simplicity of our heart, we had thought the reasoning of the Earl of Aberdeen, in his correspondence with Mr. Stevenson, on the propriety of a mutual right of search, not only plausible, but almost irresistibly conclusive; and the bland and moderate tone of his Lordship served, in no slight degree, to allay any momentary suspicions that may have flitted athwart our mind; but the film is now removed from our eyes, and, thanks to "HARRY BLUFF," we have been made to see, clearly, the designs of that all-grasping nation, on whose empire altho' the sun never sets, yet, whose appetite for conquest is no nearer satiety now, nor a whit more squeamish, than when Captain Clive outwitted Omichund by a forged treaty, and placed his puppet Meer Jaffier on the throne of Surajah Dowlah. It is in vain to conceal from ourselves that we are on the verge of a Crisis, and we should accustom ourselves, now, to look it in the face. We should not act the part of the silly ostrich, who, in burying her head in the sands of the desert, vainly supposes she has secured herself from the arrows of her pursuers. We have, it is true, at the head of our department for foreign affairs, a man whose gigantic intellect will favorably compare with that of any man, of any nation; but even he, will not despise such auxiliaries as Gov. Cass and Lieut. MAURY. The reputation of the former as a statesman and a diplomatist, is so familiar to his countrymen, that no production of his, however able, can create surprise; but when we see a man scarcely arrived at the age of thirty-five years, the greater part of whose manhood has had its home upon the billow, and whose occupation has been, by no means, especially favorable to profound reflection on matters of national concernment; when we see such a man, enter the amphitheatre of statesmanship, and look proud defiance on the enemies of "sailor's rights"—we hail the gallant champion of his country's "Star-Spangled Banner," and with him we "nail it to the mast," come weal, come woe! In conclusion, we most respectfully invite the attention of every genuine American, but more especially, of those to whose guardianship are entrusted the national honor and safety, to the lucid and unanswerable argument set forth in the following essay.]—Ed. Sou. Lit. Messenger.

HARRY BLUFF,

ON THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.

1. Correspondence relating to the detention of American vessels on the African coast, by British Armed Cruisers.—Doc. No. 2, H. Rep., 2nd Session, 27th Congress.
2. An examination of the question now in discussion between the American and British Governments concerning the right of search. By an American. Paris, 21st January, 1842.

In 1840-'41, the American Minister, near the Court of St. James, complained to her Britannic Majesty's Government, of the detention, search, and ill-treatment, by her Majesty's armed cruisers, of the American vessels, the Douglass, Iago, Hero, and Mary. The Douglass was boarded in October, 1839; her hatches were broken open, and a prize crew sent on board, who kept possession of her eight days; they consumed her provisions without pay, and so maltreated her crew, that three of them died in consequence. (We take the American statement of the case on the oath of respectable citizens, in preference to the mere assertion of an English Lieutenant, who had to make out a clear case, or lose his commission.) But, notwithstanding the statement of Lieut. Seagram in his own justification, Lord Palmerston admits, that the act of this British officer, in detaining the Douglass, was, in the abstract, irregular; yet the impression under which he did it, and the motives which prompted him to do it, exempt him from any just blame. And that is the satisfaction given by the British government, in this case.

The Iago, also, was detained by Lieut. Seagram, and a watch and chronometer stolen from her by his men. The cargo of the Hero was damaged during her search by the British cruiser, Lynx. The indemnity awarded in these two cases of spoliation, is contained in the expression of a doubt by Lord Palmerston, whether "any wilful damage was done to the cargo of either of the two vessels in question, by the crews of the detaining ships."

A most flagrant and daring outrage was committed upon the Mary by the British armed cruiser Forester: and, Mr. Stevenson, upon information furnished by an American Consul, prefers a claim for indemnity to the owner of the Mary, and is further authorised by his government to ask for the exemplary punishment of the English Commander, and of those concerned with him in his proceedings against this vessel—proceedings which our Minister pronounced, to "want very little, if any thing, to sink them into an act of open and direct piracy." The judges of the British and Spanish court refused to allow the Mary even to be libelled in their court, on the ground that the mere fact of her having the American flag hoisted should have protected her from visitation and search by a British cruiser. And our Minister takes the same grounds, and also insists that her flag should so have protected her, for she was an American vessel. The reparation obtained in this case, is a full justification of the officer, accompanied by pretensions on the part of Great Britain of the most extraordinary, dangerous and alarming character, being not more nor less than a proposition to blot out from the law of nations, the most precious rights of neutrality, and to constitute herself the HIGH CON-STABLE OF THE SEAS!

In her graspings after the departing Trident, her Secretary informs the American Envoy,

"That her Majesty's government have decided, that the "flag of the United States, shall exempt no vessel from "search by her Majesty's cruisers in the African seas, unless such vessel shall be found provided with papers (and they are to search for these of course) entitling her to the "protection of the flag she wears, and proving her to be U. "States property, and navigating the ocean according to law."

What law? Why the law to be enacted, to be sure, by the Christian League; from which France has happily receded, and of which Great Britain is the lion-hearted chief. And who shall be the judge? The noble Lord significantly tells us: Her Majesty's armed cruisers. But hear him:

"But this fact cannot be ascertained unless an officer of "the cruiser whose duty it is to ascertain this fact, shall "board the vessel, or unless the master of the merchant- "man shall bring his papers on board the cruiser; and this "examination of papers of merchantmen suspected of be- "ing engaged in the slave trade, even though they may hoist "an United States flag, is a proceeding which it is abso- "lutely necessary [the words here and elsewhere are staked "by me] that British cruisers employed in the suppres- "sion of the slave trade, should continue to practice"

This is the first occasion, in the eventful history of the maritime code, that the right to search the vessels of friends in times of profound peace, has ever been set up by any nation, people or tongue. It is at variance with the uniform practice of every civilized and christian nation in the round world: it is in violation of the principles expressly laid down by all writers upon the international code; and it is directly in the teeth of the expounders themselves of British rights and British law. In the case of a French vessel seized upon the coast of Africa, and brought before the English court of Admiralty, in 1817, Sir William Scott—(Lord Stowell) held this language:

"I can find no authority that gives the right of inter- "tion to the navigation of states upon the high seas, except "that which the right of war gives to belligerents against neu- "trals. No nation can exercise the right of visitation and "search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the "Ocean, except upon the belligerent claim." And still more emphatic: "No nation has the right to force their way for the liberation of Africa, by trampling upon the independence of other States, on the pretence of an eminent good, by means that are unlawful, or to press forward to a great principle by breaking through other great principles that are in the way."

And our own Kent!

"No nation has a right, in time of peace, to interfere with, or interrupt, any commerce which is lawful by the law of nations, and carried on between other independent powers!"

In 1839, it was proposed in Parliament to authorise British cruisers to visit, detain, and examine the papers of, American vessels on the high seas. The Duke of Wellington then said in his place:

"The clause in question makes it lawful to detain any vessels whatever, on suspicion, on the high seas, and demand their papers; and the persons exercising such authority are moreover indemnified for all the consequences. Is it intended that the vessels of any power in Europe may be searched and afterwards allowed to proceed on their voyage, whether we have treaties with those powers or not? Such a law would be a perfect novelty in the legislation of this country, and the House ought to well pause before they adopt it."

And a few weeks after, when this subject came up again, he remarked with great pointedness:

"It is well known that with the U. States we have no convention; there are indeed engagements made by diplomatic notes, but nothing to show the least disposition on their part to permit the right of detention and the search of papers; and, if there be one point more to be avoided than another, it is that relating to the visitation of vessels belonging to the Union. I warn government not to proceed, but rather to issue an order in council, or a declaration of war."

Upon this hint, his government proceeded to back herself in quintuple alliance, by the great maritime powers of Europe. She used great exertions, it was officially announced, to effect this Christian Alliance; and after having succeeded, as she thought, she comes forward with renewed pretensions, and prefers, not in her own behalf indeed, but in the name of this devout 'Christian League,' 'of the States of Christendom,'* as Lord Aberdeen loves to style them, this benevolent request—a request, which, if granted, would have renewed all the horrors of impressment; and in one month, would have plunged this country in a war with the whole of Europe. We are asked to delegate to an ambitious and grasping people, the right of jurisdiction upon American soil; for in law, the vessels of any nation are a part of her soil. This is a right of the most delicate nature—because of its dangerous tendency;—

* States of Christendom. England, Bavaria, Prussia, Austria, and Russia: these being the only contracting parties to the Quintuple Alliance, the American people will be pained to learn that Lord Aberdeen has not only discovered a Shibboleth by which England is to try all vessels that attempt the passage of the seas; but that he has ruled us and all other church-going nations, except the righteous few, out of the pale of Christianity, simply because we will not 'lap with the tongue like a dog.'

of its liability to abuse; and of the great interests to be reached through it. For these reasons, it is viewed by all nations with extreme jealousy; so much so, that the sister States of this confederacy dare not trust each other with it. Would an officer of New-York, in the execution of New-York law, be permitted to put so much even as his foot upon Virginia soil? Or would Virginia grant New-York the right to send him? The mere attempt of any one of the States, to enforce her laws upon the territory of her neighbor, would lead to the shedding of blood, if not to a dissolution of the Union. Nay, we have seen sister States of this confederacy, actually arrayed in arms against each other for this very cause. Can it be safe then, for these States collectively, to grant to a foreign and rival power, rights and privileges, with which, as individuals, they dare not trust each other? It is not safe to trust others with any of our rights of sovereignty whatever; and, with such a jealous eye have they been regarded in our Republican circle, that even one of the American States cannot of right extend her jurisdiction over the soil of another, upon any pretence whatever. Yet Great Britain demands us to yield to the arbitrary exercise of her cruisers, the right, not only to visit and make our merchantmen—the injured party!—prove that they are Americans, and proceeding according to law; but she extends her pretensions still farther, and claims it as to all vessels;—by which she includes men-of-war also. I have strangely misconceived the character of American seamen, and the spirit of my brother-officers, if there be one, in the whole Navy, who would quietly brook the visit of a British officer to examine into his character, or tamely submit to have his crew mustered. It would be quite as safe for those on board ship, to allow Midshipmen to sky-lark with fire-brands in the magazine, as it would be for this country, to grant Great Britain this right of visitation to American ships on the Ocean. It is a claim that is not lightly set up; and we should show to the 'States of Christendom,' that we are not only resolved, but prepared to resist it with something more than diplomatic bulletins.

These high-handed pretensions were rebuked in the true spirit by our Minister; he met them in limine, and opposed them like an American, as he has shown himself to be, upon the true principles. He took the broad grounds, that these United States, so long as they hold sacred, as they ever have done, and, by the grace of God, ever will do—their national honor and the rights of neutrality,—so long as they value their commercial welfare and their maritime rights—and so long as they have a decent respect for the opinions of the world, or any regard for their republican dignity and national independence, never can nor never will submit to such an innovation upon the rights of their citizens. He denied to Great Britain, and to every other power, any right to visit our vessels on the high seas in times of profound peace, or to look behind the American flag for proof of their nationality. He insisted, in effect, that the doctrines of 'free trade and sailors' rights' of which the universal law of nations is the expounder, and Republican America the champion, should not be violated; but, that they should be left undisturbed in those wholesome operations which they had acquired from the last war.

The rejoinders, both of Palmerston and Aberdeen, are in keeping with the designs of their government upon the freedom of the seas. They are of grave import; and convey to the mind, more than meets the eye of casual observers. Here they are; let the reader reflect and judge for himself:

"The undersigned is bound in duty frankly to declare to Mr. Stevenson, that to such a doctrine, the British government never could or would subscribe. The cruisers employed by her Majesty's government for the suppression of the slave trade, must ascertain by inspection of papers, the nationality of vessels met with by them, under circumstances which justify a suspicion that such vessels are engaged in slave trade."

PALMERSTON.

"But the undersigned must observe, that the present happy concurrence of the States of Christendom in this great object, (the suppression of the slave trade,) not merely justifies, but renders indispensable, the right now claimed and exercised by the British government."

ABERDEEN.

I am limited in my remarks to space by the Editor, and to time by the Compositor; and have therefore stated as briefly as I well know how, the extraordinary pretensions which have been suddenly started up, and which our Ministers abroad met, and opposed with so much promptness and decision of character.

My Lords Palmerston and Aberdeen broached this new doctrine touching the police of the seas, in a manner, which, for the most part, threw our people at home off their guard. We abandon, say they, the right of searching American vessels—after they have proven themselves to be such. All that we ask now, is, that you will give us the right to go on board simply to see if the vessel hoisting the American flag, be entitled to wear it—for if you will not allow us to look behind a mere piece of bunting, with the American colors and emblems upon it, the American flag will be used by every Pirate and Spanish slaver that sails the Ocean, and by every English vessel of illicit traffic on the water, to protect them from British cruisers. Peaceably surrender to us this right of visitation, and we will assist you to protect your own flag, by preventing its abuse by others.

This appeal was all reasonable enough to many of our honest-hearted citizens; for the manner in which the American flag, in the absence of any armed force, had been abused a few years ago on the coast of Africa, was fresh in the minds of the people; and plain men—at least many of them—considered the denial of this right a kind of abstraction, only a little worse than a practical absurdity. Hence, when this correspondence first appeared, it was wittily remarked that the American Minister had thrown a Parthian dart; and had left, by way of a diplomatic legacy, a wound, which his successor at the Court of St. James, would find difficult of cure. Even the partisan press gave the Minister but a feeble support. His correspondence was assailed in an elaborate article published in the Boston papers, and copied extensively into others, siding with the English view of the question. Very feeble, if any, defence was made; and it was not until Gov. Cass' pamphlet, mentioned at the head of this article, was received, that the eyes of the press and the people were fairly opened to the enormity of the claim set forth. Never was a shaft sped with an aim more truly American. That Ocean-giant claims the right to examine all, in order to ascertain what ships are not American. Had this right been granted, strangulation, on every sea, awaited our commerce.

The question has been frequently asked,—If we deny to Great Britain the right to look behind our flag, are we not, in effect, protecting the pirates and man-stealers of every nation? for they have only to hoist the American flag, to make sure their escape from British cruisers. With the immunity claimed by our Minister, might not British vessels and British capital, as Lord Aberdeen says, carry on before the eyes of British officers, the detestable slave trade, merely because such vessels should have the audacity to commit an additional offence, by fraudulently usurping the American flag? And would not the stars and stripes be prostituted to all the nefarious practices of the sea?

These apparently are practical difficulties, which have presented themselves to the minds of plain, straight forward men; for such questions have been asked of Navy officers, over and over again.

It is for the purpose of meeting these questions; of satisfying those who ask them, that we have all the right on our side; of shewing the tendency of the British pretensions; and of explaining the practical operation of American principles upon the police of the seas, that I have opened the 'Lucky Bag' again, which as I told you before, is like the witches' cauldron—containing a little of every thing. Moreover, I have myself, used the sea for many years, have sailed the world around, and boarded vessels in all Latitudes; and therefore may claim to speak somewhat from experience.

It is a standing order in the Navy, that our men-of-war shall board no merchantmen except American and those wearing the American flag. This order has been in force since the war; it has been repeated, issued and re-issued over and over again, until it was considered supererogatory to remind officers of it,—having acquired by usage all the force of law. When Commodore Porter, in 1822-'3 was sent out with his Musquito fleet after pirates in the West Indies, his orders were positive not to go on board any other merchantmen but our own, unless they should hoist the American flag. Now, here was an order, which, according to the English view of this question, would have rendered altogether nugatory the object of the expedition.

But did it so? Far from it. The vessels of the American squadron were as active, and as successful in the detection, pursuit and capture of pirates, as those of any other nation whatever. This order had then, as it has ever had, the very wholesome effect of taxing the ingenuity of officers, in disguising their vessels and concealing their national character from all suspicious looking craft, until the proper moment arrives for making themselves known. Some years ago, the boats of the U. S. S. Cyane, captured a slaver on the coast of Africa. The man-of-war hoisted English—the slaver, American colours of course. And our boats actually boarded her under the English flag—nor was she undeceived, until Capt. Stringham announced himself on her decks, as an American officer, and claimed her as his prize. A vessel in which I once sailed, went in search of a pirate that had been depredating between St. Helena and the coast of Africa. As we approached the suspicious Latitudes, we discovered a vessel which we took to be a French merchantman; sail was made, and chase given, that we might speak her, thinking perhaps, she could give us some intelligence as to the object of our pursuit. She immediately altered her course, crowded on canvass, and fled with her utmost speed. This was suspicious. We spread every sail to the breeze, and continued the chase for many hours—for she was a fast sailer—before we could come up with her. We not only threw a shot over her, but actually ranged up within hail along side of her, and, with lighted matches, pointed to our guns trained upon her, before she would reduce one stitch of canvass. She then hove to for our boat, and hoisted French colors. She proved to be a French vessel of good intent, bound from Bordeaux to the Mauritius; and just before we first discovered her, she had fallen in with a vessel plundered by pirates. The boarding boat was armed; and when the captain and crew were assured of our American character, they leaped for very joy; for in their fright, they had taken us to be the pirate, and as such, they sought to escape us. Here was a case in which the American captain violated the orders of his government, and committed a trespass upon the French flag. But that trespass was a trespass without damage; for it was not considered by the Frenchman as a grievance, and never a word of complaint was heard on the subject.

Vessels of good intent and honest purpose, crossing the track of each other on the Ocean, are like lonely travellers meeting in the desert. They are, for the most part, glad to speak and be spoken. The defenceless merchant trader likes to be assured of safety, and her reckoning;—to learn her Longitude, and perhaps the state of trade and the markets whence her warlike companion comes;—or, it may be, she herself has commercial intelligence of importance for her owners or friends in the country whither the other is bound. The armed cruiser too, has her inquiries to make; and thus the advantages of the interview are reciprocal. If the American Navy officer be remarkable on shore for his gentlemanly bearing and courteous manners—he is much more so at sea; for it is through courtesy only that he visits the foreign merchantman, and obtains from her the information which he desires; and it is through the exercise of this courtesy, instead of 'arbitrary habits,' that the proper and faithful discharge of his duty frequently depends; and to the credit of merchant captains, I will here say, that I have entered ships commanded by them, of all nations. And in every instance, I have been met at the gangway as the Virginia country gentleman meets the stranger at his door, and been welcomed on board in a manner invariably civil and polite. It is as rare for a Navy officer, who conducts himself properly, to be treated rudely on board the merchantman at sea, as it is for any one, who behaves himself with decency, to be insulted in the private house of a gentleman on shore. I mention this fact, because Lord Palmerston, states in justification of Lieut. Seagram's breaking open the hatches of the American vessel 'Douglass,' that he was received on board with great incivility! And well he might be. The London Sun gives the true key as to the cause of this incivility, when it says of the British Navy—"arbitrary habits are engendered in our Naval officers, by the mode employed to procure men for the fleet, and those habits make them treat foreign vessels in an arbitrary manner." This is true to the letter, and borne out by facts. Look at the diplomatic correspondence between the two countries—that on our part is filled with complaints of the insolence and mal-treatment of British officers to American masters and crews. And if the first complaint have ever yet been preferred to our government, of such conduct on the part of an American Navy officer, towards a British vessel or seaman, I have yet to learn of it. And this is not because British vessels are never boarded by American officers. But it is because of this difference of manner. When we board a British vessel at sea, we know we are trespassing—and we are careful not to give offence. We meet an English merchantman on the seas, as you meet your neighbor's carriage on the public highway; he is not in it, and you may stop it, to make inquiries as to the news—whence it comes and whither it goes, perhaps also to warn it of robbers, and to give some other important intelligence, or valuable information—and so long as you are courteous and civil, the trespass is not considered as a grievance. But immediately after, some other person comes along, and rudely demands it to be stopped, hauls the driver from the box, orders the footman to open the door and let down the steps, breaks open the packages, presses one of the horses into his own service, and vexatiously detains the carriage for hours on the common highway. This last, is just such a trespasser upon your neighbor's premises, as English officers are upon American merchantmen. Under no pretence and on no account, should we give such officers a right to stop our ships. If they do visit, let it be at their own peril, with the warning from us, that we hold them as trespassers, liable at any time to be treated as intruders, and held responsible for damages. We cannot prevent by any physical force, armed British cruisers from boarding one of our defenceless merchantmen, when met alone in the middle of the Ocean; but we can, and do say to their government, we deny your right to do it, and shall hold you as a trespasser if you do. Of course, reason and common sense tell you, that if you trespass upon us without damage, and by consent of master or owner, there will be nothing to complain of, and we shall never be the wiser for it. But, we are afraid to trust you; and on account of the overbearing manners and habits of British officers, we are unwilling to give them, above all others, any right to interfere in any manner whatever, with our peaceful traders—and we give them and you, to understand distinctly, that if they do it upon any pretext or pretence whatsoever, they do it at their and your peril.

The barriers which public opinion and community of interest, throw around the civil magistrate in the exercise of his power, and the safeguards with which the rights of persons and property are hedged about to protect them from the abuse of this power on shore, are all, or nearly all, inoperative at sea. The tendency of power is to abuse, even in the hands of the best men; and no where are the restraints upon it so feeble, as they are upon the master-spirits of armed cruisers out upon the Ocean. If power be entrusted, it is the nature of man to exercise it, in order to display to others his authority—and as it regards the Navy officers of the old world, I recollect a case in point, besides the numerous instances of the just complaints of our merchantmen against them. A messmate was once asked by a Dutch midshipman, "What authority have you American midshipmen over your sailors?" "None but verbal authority." Upon which the Dutchman took up the tiller of his boat and knocked down a sailor. "Why did you do that?" said the other. "To show mine authority," was the reply. The impressment of sailors is a part of the education of British Naval officers; and so sure as we give them any authority whatever over our vessels, just so sure will they display their authority in a summary manner. And though Englishmen will sometimes visit our merchantmen, there would be the same difference in their conduct when we deny them, and when we give them, the right, as there would be in the conduct of men generally, under similar circumstances. A and B are two rivals in business. A is disposed to trespass upon B; B warns him, and tells him that he does it at his peril. A therefore acts with great caution and circumspection, and takes care, if he find it necessary to trespass now and then, to trespass without damage. But A gets the Legislature to pass a special act, as England sought of the Quintuple Alliance—of the maritime powers of the old world—authorising him to trespass—and how different is the conduct of A, when he enters the premises of B, then! In the proneness of his nature, he breaks down and tramples under foot, without remorse.

But, let us suppose that this right of visitation to our vessels in the 'Suspicious Latitudes,' which extend over one half of the Globe, were granted to Great Britain, and that she exercised it in good faith, and granted our merchants indemnity whenever she detained their vessels without cause. What would be the effect! Our trade with Africa is rapidly increasing. And the effect would be this. The summary habits, and arbitrary character of British officers are well understood by our merchantmen, and the mere proclamation that the right of visiting them had been granted to England, would immediately divert a great portion of this flourishing trade into other channels, and the vessels would be laid up. Gov. Cass tells us, on the authority of the Paris journals, that the French vessel 'Sophie,' changed her destination at once, rather than encounter the vexations claimed to be exercised under this treaty, by British officers. What of our commerce that remained, would be driven away by the vexations of visitation and search. Our vessels would be all suspicious, because in the 'Suspicious Latitudes;' they would be visited to-day by the boats of one vessel, and to-morrow by the boats of another, and finally, after they had run the gauntlet, and completed the voyage, the owner would find, that the delays caused by these interruptions, had increased the wages of the crew, swelled the expenses of the voyage, and taken away the best part of his profits. But suppose the voyage to be broken up by the cruisers. Indemnity is uncertain at best, and may require years of negotiation. Delay is equal to ruin; and in a few years from this time, there would not be found an American merchantman any where, from the Gut of Canso to the Bight of Benin.

Lord Aberdeen tells Mr. Stevenson that it has been

"The invariable practice of all Navies in the world, to ascertain by visit the real nationality of merchant vessels"

"met with on the high seas, if there be good reason to apprehend their national character."

This is true, so far as the American Navy is concerned, only as it regards the suspicious, not the national, character of vessels; and it is lamentably true, we all know, of the English Navy. But, so far from pretending to derive this practice from any right, except when the vessels prove to be Americans or outlaws, our officers acknowledge it to be merely and entirely the usurpation of the power which might gives them upon the Ocean. And, to protect from abuse a power so liable to be misused, the American government, true to her own principles, has hedged it about with all the safeguards that she can set around it: she has thrown the onus of personal responsibility upon her officers whenever they exercise it; thus telling them in fact, that their government is like the common law, regardless of good intentions, for, 'it will not hold you quit, if you abuse that might, or those powers, or any lawful authority, with which you have been clothed for the public good.'

A few years ago, one of our cruisers in the Pacific, captured a Peruvian man-of-war upon the high seas. Her crew, when last in port, had risen upon their officers; and, after killing or forcing them overboard, had put to sea, as mutineers; they were pirates in will, and only wanted to fall in with a merchantman, to be so in deed. Having it in his power, had he neglected to make a prize of this vessel, the American officer would have been dismissed the service. Or, had he made her his prize, and not been justified by the circumstances of the case in so doing, he would have forfeited his commission, and perhaps his life. When civil authorities direct a capias against the person of A; and instead, the sheriff brings into court the dead body of B; it is in vain for him to urge by way of excuse, that he had never seen A, and thought this to be he. He is an officer, and the law holds him bound to know the right person—and notwithstanding his good intentions, his hands are stained with innocent blood; he is cast into prison as a murderer, to be tried for his life. And justice will not hold him guiltless, for he had been daily taught, both in precept and example, by the benign spirit of the law, that it was better to permit ninety and nine such as guilty A to escape, than that he should have hurt even so much as one hair on the head of innocent B. And so too with the American Navy officer; his government holds him bound to do his duty; but in doing it, he may not invade the rights of others, nor injure the innocent.—And when he does it, it is in vain for him to urge his good intentions. "The way to hell is paved with good intentions," says the apophthegm; and if government, or the law would regard these in her officers, except through grace and mercy, some ambitious spirit would soon be found, to rise up and pave the way to war and his country's ruin with what he might choose to term his 'good intentions.'

By these means, the U. States has secured from her officers, the exercise of the soundest discretion, as it regards this most delicate matter. In proof of this assertion, I refer to history; for I believe that facts sustain me in the belief, that no claim has ever been preferred by any nation, against this country for indemnity on account of injuries sustained by its merchantmen from an American man-of-war. Hence the practice of the two Navies tells a very different tale; one seldom suspects, and has ever trespassed without damage; when the other doubts—'it takes the trick,' abuses its power, and trespasses without the fear of consequences.

That the stand taken by the United States in this matter, would not, in practice, have the effect of prostituting our flag, as Lord Aberdeen and those who side with him, assert it would, we may appeal to history and actual results. We have set up no new claims as England has done. The maritime rights which we insist shall not be disturbed, we have been in the quiet enjoyment of for thirty years. They are the usages of the sea. Ever since the war, we have denied the right of any nation to visit and search our vessels upon the high seas. Our principles therefore have been tried by thirty years of practice: and, if we except the cases which occurred a few years ago in the absence of any American force whatever on the coast of Africa, we do not find that our flag has been so prostituted as Lord Aberdeen tells us it would be. On the contrary; under the vigilance of our men-of-war, the stars and stripes have been as little used as the cross of St. George, for the shelter and protection of Ocean scape-graces.

But, we are told, England disclaims any right to interfere with our vessels after their papers have been examined and they have been proven to be bona fide Americans; and that she will make good any damages sustained in consequence of her visits. Timeo Danaos. We should get such reparation as we received in the case of those vessels about which this correspondence was commenced. As in the case of the Douglass and Mary, though wrong in the abstract, there would be something, which, in her eyes, would always justify the detention of American vessels, and the interruption of American commerce—the motives of her officers in harassing us, would be always good, and therefore justifiable. At least so England now tells us in her diplomatic notes; and what would be her language, were the right to go on board and examine, given her?

This right, let it be borne in mind, would be exercised by captains, lieutenants and midshipmen. Let us suppose one of the last—a 'Snotty' as he is called in the English Navy, just out of the highland heather of Scotland, or the bogs of Ireland, as the case may be, to be sent to board one of our merchantmen in the 'Suspicious Latitudes.'—They were boarded and sailors impressed out of them before the last war, by a less responsible person, the coxswain of a boat—He demands her papers, and they are shown; why, says he, these are as easily counterfeited as that bit of striped bunting you have hoisted. How do I know that this signature is genuine? This is very suspicious. You must open your hatches, and show that your cargo corresponds with your invoice. You must go to your log, calculate the difference of latitude and departure, for every course and distance sailed, for every hour that you have been from port, and project them upon your chart, that I may see whether your track leads back to the place whence you profess to have come. Innocent or guilty, here is a detention, which in nine times out of ten, will break up the voyage; or render trade to that part of the world, a losing business to those who should have the hardihood to undertake it.

Governor Cass analyzes the grounds taken by the English secretaries in support of this new doctrine; and when stripped of the foreign matter with which they are surrounded, he sums them up under three heads:

1st. "Without it, flags may sometimes be abused, and 'the guilty escape.'"

With it, American commerce will be vexed beyond endurance; our vessels will be detained and searched upon the most vague suspicions, and our sailors be impressed and carried away into a worse than African bondage. The humane spirit of the law, the experience of history, and the observation of all good men, agree and teach us that 'it is better that ninety and nine guilty persons should escape, than that one innocent man should suffer.'

2nd. "Without it, English cruisers may sometimes be 'prevented from boarding their own vessels, and thus the 'municipal laws of England may be violated.'"

It is almost as impossible for an English built merchantman to pass herself off upon a seaman, as an American, as it would be for a Choctaw chief to pass himself off for an English nobleman. The traders of the two countries are not built after the same fashion, nor sparred by the same rules; and, as there is an indescribable something about men which enables a close observer to tell the citizens of one country from the subjects of another, so there is about ships, some peculiarity of fit, rig, or construction—the mere 'cut of the Jib'—which enables the experienced and well practised eye of the sailor, to distinguish with almost unerring certainty, and from outward appearances, the nationality of merchantmen. And if it be borne in mind, that for the protection of her ship-builders, the laws of England forbid that her subjects should be so much even as part owner of an American built vessel; that under no circumstances whatever, can such a vessel take out English papers; that her own laws make null and void, the sale of an American vessel to an English subject;—under these circumstances, I repeat, it is difficult to perceive any practical force whatever, in this objection. But if these things were not so, are we bound by any treaty, or any obligation whatever, either written, or implied, to enforce British laws, or to assist her, or her officers in the execution of them! We are asked in effect, to allow British law—all booted and spurred, to ride over our own; and whenever they come in conflict, even within our own jurisdiction, to give it precedence. But on the other hand, when she is requested to restore our property, and to deliver up the servants of our citizens who have murdered their masters, and fled to English soil; her reply is, O no! the English municipal law holds them guiltless and sets them free, for they have done it no violence. Verily this request comes with a good grace to us, from proud and haughty England!

3rd. "Without it, the treaty stipulations for the suppression of the slave trade, cannot be as well executed."

Guilty ships are governed in their actions by guilty men; and the guilty conscience is just as apt to betray the ship as the man. There is always some little circumstance, difficult indeed to be described, but something in appearance or manner, which directs suspicion to the kidnapper among us, and leads to his detection even as he passes along our public highways. So too, on the highway of nations; the guilty ship is moved by her guilty crew, and whithersoever she is turned, she obeys their guilty spirit. When discovered prowling about the Ocean, the Argus-eyes of the man-of-war, looking to suspect, are upon her; so that the actions of the slaver before the cruiser, are even more liable than the conduct of the kidnapper before the officer, to betray and detect. But even if the Great Moral Governor of the Universe had not, in his ways that are past finding out, invested the slaver, as he has other men, with the workings of a guilty conscience, and had not exposed man in his worst character, to the liabilities of self-betrayal, this position would still have no force in it: it is English doctrine and English law, expounded by the high courts of England—and it is the most valuable feature in the conservative principles which guard and protect the international rights of sovereignties—that,

"No nation can exercise the right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the 'Ocean.' And that, 'No nation has the right to force her way for the liberation of Africa, by trampling upon the independence of other States, on the pretence of an eminent good, by means that are unlawful; or to press forward to a great principle, through other great principles that stand in the way.'"

Grant Great Britain but the right to enter our merchantmen, and her foot is forever upon the neck of this young giant, already her most powerful rival upon the Ocean. Such was her impatient eagerness to effect her purposes, that before her allies had confirmed the treaty, she proceeded, with indecent haste, to demand our assent to an interpolation upon the law of nations: and this interpolated clause, her ministerial functionary tells us, the happy concurrence of five powers, magniloquently termed by him, the STATES OF CHRISTENDOM, not merely justifies, but renders indispensable. With these threatenings trembling on her lips, she has been suddenly arrested: the scales were removed from the eyes of France, by the hands of a political Ananias sent from us; she saw the dangers in the way, repented, and turned back in good time from the league. And thus the vaulting ambition of England has overleaped itself for once.

It is no new thing for Great Britain to league together with other powers, to interfere with the political affairs of unoffending people, and with whose concerns she has no right, save and except the highway right of her Robin Hood. It is not necessary to go back to remote history, to show that England, as well as other European Monarchies, whenever they have had designs upon friendly nations, have proceeded to effect their purposes by banding themselves together in leagues and alliances.

To show this, we need only recite what has been done within our own times, and to our own knowledge. In 1826, a Turkish province was found in unsuccessful rebellion. She, it is true, had the sympathies of the American people with her, as every people always have, who possess the spirit to be free. But Great Britain leagued herself in triple alliance, and determined that this province should be lopped off as a dependency of the Grand Turk; not because the rights and privileges of the contracting parties were invaded; but because they, in their sovereignty of might, willed it. Accordingly they sent forth their combined squadrons, which burned, sunk and destroyed the whole Turkish fleet. And then, after bandying about among the petty princes of Europe, the new-made Crown of this ancient Republic, they proceeded to put it upon the head of a spluttering German, and to make him the king of classic Greece.

One complete revolution of the seasons has scarcely past and gone, since other Turkish dependencies were found in successful rebellion—and carrying on a revolution which we recognize the right in man everywhere to make. Busy England again forms another league; by virtue of which, and for the settlement of what she calls the Eastern Question, she proceeded to batter down the strong hold of the revolutionists, and to dispose of the sovereignty and provinces of a people, with whom she has nothing in common, and of right, as little to do. And now leagued again, she turns upon us with the Western question.

We recollect the mystical combination of princes in a 'Holy Alliance' against the cause of civil liberty, not joined indeed, but approved of, by Great Britain.

By these alliances beyond the black waters, we have not only seen kings set up and fleets destroyed, and people transferred, but we have seen kings pulled down, and nations of that continent blotted out from the map forever.

Nor are we unmindful of the many leagues and alliances, at the head and front of which, Great Britain, in times past, has first placed herself; when backed by these, she has proceeded, with a high hand and her strong arm, to inflict upon other nations, private wrongs, and public calamities of the most grievous character. But so long as she confined her designs and the operations of her alliances to European affairs, and crossed not the waters with them, we had nothing to say, and pretended no interference whatever. Once indeed, when the 'Allied Powers' had adjusted the affairs of Europe, and Alexander-like, craved for more worlds to operate upon, they turned their eyes from the old to the new, and had some intent, it was thought, of interfering with the Spanish American States. But the United States at once declared by solemn proclamation to the whole world, that they would consider the interference of any European power, in the affairs of Spain and her American colonies, as a declaration of war against us. Thus the intentions of the 'Allies' were staid, and their operations kept within the bounds of the old world; and we ceased to regard the Triple Alliances and the Quadruple Alliances in which Great Britain chose to unite herself; though we could not forget the terrible struggles to which they gave rise. With the recollection of these fresh upon their minds, it was not without the most serious apprehensions that American diplomatists, in Europe, beheld this great nation strengthening herself in Quintuple Alliance, and then deliberately proceeding, with intent to break down and trample under foot, those time-honored principles of national law, which stand in the way of her designs. There was unfeigned cause of alarm, when she commenced to tell us of a 'Christian league' that she had formed; and of a new right of search that was necessary to its purposes. "My course," said she, "is taken: this right shall be enforced;" and she added, with a taunt—"It is for the American government alone to determine what may be due to a just regard for their national dignity and national interests."*

Thanks to Governor Cass: France has been induced to hesitate; and we now hope for the best. But for this hesitation, as sure as I write and you read, this most Christian alliance would have made the green sea red. In opposing the unhallowed designs of England, through this League, upon us, it cannot fail to be a source of deep regret and mortification to all good citizens, that we are not in a condition to authorize our Ministers to use the language of prepared resistance. In times like these, much depends upon the mere state of preparation. War and all its horrors may often be averted, simply by being prepared for it. And not being so prepared, invites aggression.

* Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Stevenson.

Intelligent Americans need not be reminded of the constant and systematic efforts that have been made for years, by a portion of the English people, to exclude the produce of slave labor from their markets. Had her wary neighbor not been induced to suspect and to falter, the next step of this great Ocean Behemoth, backed by the 'States of Christendom,' would have been to declare, that no ships, laden with slaves, or the fruits of their labor, should sail either within the Suspicious,* or any other Latitudes. After this, the next steamer to cross the Atlantic, would have borne us a message from this high priest of the 'Christian League' and Captain of the seas, intimating that a certain domestic institution of ours, stinks in her nostrils—and abolition, prompt and immediate, must be done! Nor was it the intention of its master-spirit, that the coalition should end here. The United States have some naval and commercial pretensions, that are gall and wormwood to her ambitious soul: therefore the wings of our commerce must be clipped. Yankee sailors are brave and hardy, and may be wanted again to fight English battles: therefore a plan must be contrived for getting the right to board American ships. 'Once a subject always a subject,' is British ethics; and the right to impress British seamen wherever found, is British municipal law. Therefore said, or thought John Bull, if we can only get the right to enter Brother Jonathan's merchantmen, we have already the right to impress our own seamen wherever we find them—and thus, we will have secured to us the old right of impressment, about which the Americans went to war.

Rightly to appreciate these grounds of apprehension, it should be borne in mind, that in 1813 the Executive of England, in his reply to the American manifesto, as to the cause of the war, said, when speaking of the belligerent right of search for contraband—

"His Royal Highness can never admit that in the exercise of the undoubted and hitherto undisputed right of 'searching neutral merchant vessels in time of war, (for contraband only, such as implements and munitions of war, enemies' troops, etc.); the impressment of British seamen found therein, can be deemed any violation of a neutral flag—or considered by any neutral state, as a hostile measure, or a cause of war."

Here is the express declaration from England, that her officers carry with them wherever they go, this right of impressment. It matters not how her officers get on board our merchantmen; being there, they have the right to impress seamen; and 'when they doubt, they take the trick.' This was British doctrine in 1813; let us see what it is in 1842. I quote from the London Times, the official organ of the British government. In speaking of the bearings of the Quintuple Treaty, it says:

* 'Suspicious Latitudes.' A belt of Ocean 5000 miles broad, and more than 10,000 miles long, which was to have extended from South Carolina on the North, and Patagonia on the South, beyond Africa, over half the globe, to the shores of India.

"This dispute (right of impressment) now sleeps, though it will have to be revived, at latest on the next occasion, when we find ourselves invested, by a war, with the right of which it is the consequence; and indeed it might be raised upon the contemplated treaty, giving a mutual right of search for the prevention of the slave trade."

In 1812 the people of these United States decided that they would resist, by force of arms, the impressment of our seamen. And war was declared against Great Britain, not because she searched our vessels, but because she stopped them on the high seas, and impressed our people out of them. After England made peace with France, she no longer had need of American sailors, and they were no longer impressed. Consequently, when impressments ceased, the cause of the war ceased. Therefore, Mr. Monroe instructed the American Commissioners not to bring forward at the treaty of Ghent, the subject of impressment at all; for we had resisted it by war when it did exist, and should be prepared so to resist it again, should it ever be revived.

As peace found this vexatious question, so it has remained until renewed by this Quintuple Alliance: or more properly speaking, this league of the maritime powers of the old world against 'sailors' rights,' and the commercial prosperity of the new. In January last, the London Times began to moot it as a corollary, that, as in time of war, they might take from foreign ships the persons of the King's enemies; therefore, they might also, by the same right, take from them the persons of the Queen's subjects. It continues:

"In the practical enforcement, however, of this right or wrong, for on that point it is not necessary to pronounce, the searching party, being, from the nature of the case, the strongest, and moreover, ordinarily speaking, persons of summary habits, were apt to be somewhat arbitrary in their judgments as to who was American and who was English 'when they doubted they took the trick,' at least so thought and said the Americans; and any one may remember, that once taken and lodged in an English man-of-war, by right or by wrong, it was not easy to get out of it; and accordingly the American had to stay with just as good a chance of being cut off by a French cannon ball, before he could get his right again, as any of his English fellow sailors."

The Times intimates that the European powers, parties to this treaty, will not brook to be thwarted.

"A single war with Great Britain, the (United States) 'has already tried, a war on her part with all Europe will be a novelty.'"

Here then, is a distinct intimation, that this Christian League is armed against the United States. The same view is taken by the Scotsman, another respectable journal, when, in speaking of the real object of the right of search as formerly exercised upon us, it says :

"It was to discover British sailors in American vessels, and practically give our Naval officers a power to impress seamen from the ships of another state." And again—"We have little doubt that the arrogant and indefensible right of search, claimed by Great Britain in the last war, lies at the bottom of the stubborn hostility of the Americans to the reasonable propositions of our government."

"The Americans," says the London Sun, whose remarks are made with much candor, "may very properly object to our right of search, and may still have a great inclination to suppress the slave trade; but of the two evils, we have no doubt, but the Americans would prefer the eternal existence of the slave trade, to allowing their ships to be overhauled by our men-of-war. If they sanction the examination, for the mere purpose of ascertaining if a vessel bearing the American flag is, bona fide, an American vessel, they sanction a rigid examination of the vessel herself. The papers may be simulated. How is that to be proved? By examining the crew, by ascertaining that the cargo of the vessel corresponds to the manifest; by tracing her route in the Log Book; in short, by subjecting her to a complete search. If that be not done, papers will at once be produced to correspond to the flag; and merely to prove that they do correspond, will be of no use whatever. The Americans are well aware of the insults and injuries they would submit themselves to, by admitting this claim to visit their ships; and the Morning Chronicle does them egregious injustice, when it represents their resistance to that claim as grounded in unrighteousness."* And again. "It is impossible for the Americans to admit this claim. By committing injustice on our own people, we have bred up our officers in arbitrary habits, which have made them arbitrary to other nations; and the consequences debar England from following out her humane wishes to suppress the slave trade."

Taking therefore the solemn declarations since made in Parliament by Lord Brongham, in candor and good faith, and admitting Great Britain to be sincere, honest, and single-minded in her purposes—that it is really the suppression of the African slave trade on the coast of Africa, and nothing else that she has in view—here is an insuperable objection to our yielding one tittle of our sovereign rights. The overbearing character of her officers is quite as well known to our merchantmen, as it

* Grounded (?) in unrighteousness. At a meeting of the Loyal National Repeal Association, recently held in Ireland—Mr. O'Connell, who we all know to be rabid on the subject of slavery, said with regard to this question of search, "The Americans unquestionably have a right to resist any search made on their own ships * * *, but why, I will ask, are they so very stringent in their refusal to allow any meddling with vessels sailing under their flag? Oh, England ought to read a lesson from the circumstance. In the last war she acted with the most atrocious barbarity towards American vessels. She trampled their flag under foot—insisted on the right of search—insisted on the right of British subjects to go on board American vessels, and act as they thought proper. England was then in the insolence of her power—she committed the grossest outrages on the rights of the American people; those outrages irritated and provoked them in the highest degree, and that irritation continues to the present hour, (loud cries of hear, hear.) Oh! England ought to recollect that while she had the power—that while it was safe to insult, she did so; but a day of retribution may come" (cheers.)

is to English journals. And there is an objection to our yielding this right, which does not apply to any other of the contracting parties.—English and American seamen spring from the same stock, and speak the same language; it is easy to mistake one for the other; and when there's any doubt, the English officer, to make sure, 'takes the trick,' and carries him off. Not so with the other powers; their national characteristics are more exclusive, and their seamen speak in a peculiar language, and can never be mistaken, as to their nation. Admitting England to be never so honest in this matter, and that we were willing to trust those who manage her ship of state at home, we could not trust those who manage her ships of war at sea.

The statesmen of England should have recollected, how, in the exercise of this right of search, she had trampled our flag under foot, aggrieved our people, and driven us to war, and they would have known that the American people never would consent to this treaty. Half a century ago, the U. States set their face against the slave trade, and declared it piracy; they were the first among nations, to move its suppression; and to this day, they have striven to put it down. They view it with as much horror as Great Britain herself does—and are prepared to go for the suppression of it as far as they can go, without forcing down those great bulwarks which protect the freedom of the seas, and secure to maritime nations—to the strong and weak alike—the peaceful enjoyment of the rights of commerce. Were the suppression of the African slave trade the only object which Great Britain has in view, she might have secured, readily enough, the hearty coöperation of the United States. They would have stipulated to maintain on the coast of Africa, for this purpose, any reasonable force. At short notice, we could have sent there armed brigs and schooners, equal, at least in number, to the cruisers which Great Britain has now employed there. There would have been no objection for one of her cruisers, to accompany each of ours on their cruising grounds. When they made a suspicious sail, they both could join in pursuit, until the chase should show her colours. If they were American, she would be boarded only by our vessel. But should she hoist the flag of any other nation, the American officer would have nothing to do with her; he would leave the Englishman to board, detain, search, and dispose of her as he pleased. It would be no concern of ours. By this arrangement, Lord Aberdeen might dismiss his fears lest British subjects and British capital would usurp the American flag for illicit traffic.

It may be said in reply, grant British cruisers the right to visit vessels under the American flag also, and one-half of this force might be dispensed with, without impairing the efficiency of the whole.

True it would be cheaper; and it would be economical too, if nations could but safely trust their interests to the keeping of each other, and their affairs to the management of their neighbors. If we could with security entrust to the 'Christian Alliance' the safe keeping of our commercial interests, within the 'Suspicious Latitudes'—we might at once recall nine-tenths of our ships—dismantle them, and lay them up to rot. We might say to France, look out for our interests in the Mediterranean—to England, protect our commerce in the East-Indies—to another power, watch for us in the Pacific—and in turn, we will guard and protect, as the apple of our eye, the commercial welfare and prosperity of you all in the West-Indies. If nations were but honest, just, and upright, we need have no Navy at all. But as long as they are not so, each one must look out for its own interests as well in the 'Suspicious Latitudes' and on the coast of Africa, as in the Mediterranean and elsewhere.

The arrangement suggested above would add to, and not impair, the efficiency of the cruisers, both English and American; nor would it have broken thro' any of the great principles which stand in the way to the suppression of the African slave trade. It would have been received with acclamation by the great body of the American people. But instead of that, England proceeded to extend within 200 miles of this city, the suspicious parallel, and to stretch the borders thereof along the very shores of our Southern States. There is something dark in this, and well calculated to excite suspicion. Had we taken the bait which was held out so alluringly to us, no vessel with slaves on board, could have left the ports of one State for another, or for one of the same State, without being liable to seizure by English cruisers. This much gained, it would have required no latitudinous construction of the treaty itself, to bring within its intent and meaning, the body-servant of every passenger that sails in or out of the Gulf of Mexico.

But to return to the quotations: I have hastily thrown the above together, on some of which Gov. Cass—there on the spot, lays great stress; and it is thought not without reason. This is done to show our readers, that there is more in these pretensions than meets the eye; and that G. Britain has not yet avowed her real purpose. In the case of the Creole, we are told that we have no just right of complaint, for that our property was taken from us, the murderers of our citizens protected, and our slaves set free, all by the beautiful operations of the benign municipal laws of England. And so, when she gets the right to put her foot on board of our merchantmen, she will impress our seamen and call them subjects, and tell us it was done according to Hoyle and British municipal law—that when we granted her the right to visit, we knew of this law, and therefore its exercise was implied in the grant; and if it were not, we had no right to complain of the operations of her own laws upon her own subjects.

This kind request to visit our merchantmen to keep our flag from being abused, tends really to the ridiculous, and strikingly reminds one of the friendly visit of the Fox to Piggy, in the nursery story. "Open the door." "O no, I'm afraid you'll eat me." "No I wont, just let me get one foot in." Having got an entrance for the foot, room was soon made for the head also; and Piggy was devoured. And so it would be with our sailors if British officers were allowed these rights of visitation; though the full-blooded Yankee tar, like the mate in Don Juan, might be rather tough eating, yet the English fleet would receive its recruits from American ships.

How times have changed! A little while ago, and England was as a mother to us; she is now our rival; and has been our foe. So long as she sought to carry out her schemes of aggrandizement, not upon us, and was content to plot her alliances against European Sovereigns and Asiatic Despots, we had not one word to say in the way of protest against her or them. But when, in her dark designs, she attempts to push her plans across the 'great waters;' and, under the black flag, preaches up a crusade against the rights of neutrality and American principles, it is high time that the country should be waked up from its slumbers, should examine its arms, and look to its defences.

The relations of the United States both foreign and domestic, were never in a more critical or ticklish condition: the monetary concerns of the government and people are deranged—confidence in public institutions and the good faith of bodies corporate, is shaken; the character of the American States abroad has suffered injury; business at home is dull; prospects are gloomy; 'hard times' are at hand; and the minds of men are soured with the reverses of fortune. The damp air grows pestilential, and the still waters of the sea become fetid in the calm, when no strong wind comes to agitate and purify. The storm and the tempest, though frightful in their ravages, are necessary to the well-being of man in the physical world; and, in the moral, revolution and war sometimes become essential for his political independence and welfare. Many are the men who argue that the effect upon this country, of a war now, would be to put in motion the stagnant pools of business, and to order aright, for the public good, the deranged elements of our political economy. The 'Caroline affair' has sunk deep, and yet rankles in the bosom of many a true-hearted American; the public mind in the North, is worn and fretted with the question of the 'Maine Boundary.' 'The Creole case' vexes the South; and the perplexed questions of visitation and search have revived the recollection of former wrongs and animosities.—Is the present feverish and excitable state of the public mind, the agitation of this subject, by pressing it upon us, would excite but one determined feeling throughout the land—there is nothing sectional about it, it is altogether national in its bearings. But touch the American people through their ships and sailors, and, from the St. John's around to the Sabine, from the Atlantic back to the Rocky mountains, there is a war-spirit raised, which it would be difficult to lay. With so many elements at work, both within and without, anxious eyes from all quarters are turned upon the patriots and statesmen of the land; and, while we hope for the best, we are warned by the restive and feverish state of two great nations about to hold a parley, to prepare for the worst.

Six years ago, and a war with England, would have produced a commotion in the political elements of this country, that would have shaken its institutions to their very foundations. Since that, difficulties have arisen, war has been talked of and threatened, until the idea of war has become familiar to the people, and they, in a great measure, have become reconciled to it; and far different would be its effects now. A war at this time would tend mightily to unite us, to strengthen the bonds of the Union, and to brighten the links in the chain which binds us together in brotherhood. And, as before remarked, there are many reflecting men, who think that war now, would be more of a blessing than a curse.

But, I am not given to panic making, nor subject to war fevers. Neither do I think a war necessary or desirable. On the contrary, I should view a war between the United States and Great Britain, as one of the greatest calamities, except a scourge direct from the hand of God, that could befall my country. Doubtless, there are many irritating causes at work in the public mind and feelings on both sides; and so far as any international questions have been raised upon them as yet, the right is clearly ours. But to the peaceful settlement of them—a mutual spirit of conciliation and forbearance is of the first importance. There is room, much room for hope in the character of the negotiators concerned; and so long as there is hope, it is wise and brave to indulge it, though it is equally the part of prudence and of wisdom to fear the worst and to prepare for it. When nations go to war, right, in the day of battle, is more regarded than brute force by a Christian people. We already occupy this tower of strength, and I fear not its surrender—whatever be the defences about it which tardy legislation shall fail to provide. In the Navy, there is but one sentiment and one feeling on this subject: it is, avert war, honorably, if you can; if not, let it come: right or wrong, the stars and stripes shall not be disgraced on the Ocean.

POPULAR LECTURES ON ETHICS OR MORAL OBLIGATION.

For the use of Schools. By Margaret Mercer.

We have been surprised upon reading this little volume, to find that it is not in more general circulation, and that it has not excited, in a greater degree, the attention and admiration of the reading public. With regard to this production it appears to us, that admiration would be a necessary consequence of attention—but this is difficult to procure for a book professedly “For the use of Schools.” These words suggest to most minds all that is trite and tedious, mingled perhaps, with a feeling of self-gratulation at having passed those days which were necessarily devoted to school-books. It is, unfortunately, not true that “a rose by any other name would smell as sweet;” our associations are awakened by names; and words influence opinion and feeling to an almost incredible degree. One would suppose, however, that the use for which this book is specially intended, would at least promote its circulation among the class for whose peculiar benefit it was designed. But here again it is difficult, without some aid or patronage from those versed in the mysteries of the literary trade, to supersede books which are already in use in schools, however defective they may be. There is so much to discourage and depress teachers, so much to reduce their minds to a state almost mechanical, that they are little likely to introduce a new book into use simply from a perception of its merits. They prefer treading the accustomed path, in which their footsteps move almost unconsciously; they generally like best to use those books in which the greatest possible knowledge is crowded into the smallest possible space. The satirical and playful humor of Theodore Hook, has sketched a caricature of fashionable boarding-schools in Mrs. Brandyball's academy, at which we sigh, even while we smile—so much of truth is visible in its exaggerated outlines. For this state of things, we pity rather than blame teachers of such schools: for we believe it to be chiefly attributable to the want of interest felt by parents and guardians generally, on the subject of education; or, perhaps we should rather say, to the little reflection bestowed on it. When parents and guardians are aware, that to be taught to think is one of the first requisites of education—then such books as excite reflection, will be brought into use in schools. The demand only is necessary to create them, or to bring from obscurity those which have already been written.

We think yet another cause exists which has prevented this little volume from obtaining a circulation commensurate with its merits; we mean the total want of all that aid from puffers, which, in our times at least, has unfortunately become necessary to insure literary success. It is not that our age is deficient in literary taste, far from it; but rather that the endless variety of new publications, which are continually issuing from the press, makes it utterly impossible for the most indefatigable reader not to overlook a large portion of these works; and our attention is naturally attracted to those productions, of whose character and merits we have heard something. Some honest chronicler to tell one's merits, seems almost indispensable to obtain even a hearing from the public. We do not profess to belong to the tribe of puffers, and we do not believe that any of the tricks of the literary trade can do more than give an ephemeral existence to books that do not possess real merit; but to declare our admiration of what is excellent, and to endeavor to assist the circulation of a work so well calculated to inform the understanding, to touch the heart, to implant the noblest principles of action, appears to us a debt due to the cause of truth, and a tribute of gratitude due also to the writer, who presents the best fruits of her mind and heart to the public, at the expense of time, of thought, and of all the risks and vexations incident to authorship.

We feel yet another claim, which to us is a very strong one, that this work is one of the very few original publications that have ever issued from a Virginia press. It is time that the sons and daughters of the "Old Dominion," should arouse themselves from the lethargy which has so long oppressed them;—it is time they were taking their stand in the literary world;—it is time they were putting out to interest the talents, with which, it is no vain boast, when we think what children Virginia has produced, to say they have been liberally endowed. An yet native literature amongst us has scarcely an existence; and genius so rare, which might have embalmed itself in imperishable records for the admiration and instruction of posterity, has passed from the earth, like the fleeting beauty of the summer-flower, or the fading leaf of autumn. It is necessary to the very existence of literature, that it should be fostered in its infancy. It is impossible for any country, however gifted with natural talent its inhabitants may be, to take an elevated station in the literary or scientific world, unless her children be animated by the spirit, which Burns so forcibly expresses, and without which his genius would have perished with him:

"E'en then, a wish, I mind its power
A wish that to my latest hour
Shall strongly heave my breast,
That I for poor auld Scotland's sake
Some useful plan or hook might make,
Or sing a sang at least."

We would not limit this feeling to any portion of a country such as ours, as we feel that we are all brethren of one great family; yet, as it is not only natural but justifiable that a man should be bound by stronger ties to his own household than to the rest of the community, just so we regard our own state with reverence to the great union of which it is a member.

The subject of which this book treats is one of the deepest and most universal interest, and yet it is one on which most persons have reflected least. While all the languages and all the 'ologies' are considered of indispensable importance in education, the science of moral obligation—that science to which all others are comparatively of small importance—is scarcely thought of; it seems taken for granted that a knowledge of duty is intuitive, and that just ideas of morality and religion will suggest themselves spontaneously to the mind. Indeed, it is surprising to converse with many persons of intelligence, and possessing various information, to observe how very vague and incorrect their ideas of duty are, and how imperfect their understanding of the reasons and grounds of moral obligation. It cannot fail to be evident, that the subject has scarcely ever been the object of their serious thought and attention; and yet it must excite the deepest interest and awaken a feeling of moral elevation in any reflecting mind, which will consider it attentively.

A new world opens to those who consider even their most trifling actions as fulfilling the intentions of their Creator, as strengthening the good cause as a means of discipline and purification for an immortal spirit who has an eternal destiny to fulfil. We think we can venture to predict, that few persons, who possess minds capable of reflection, or hearts susceptible of noble and tender impressions, can give this little volume an attentive perusal, without deriving from it, pleasure and benefit. "Seeds of thought" are every where scattered through its pages, with an abundance that evinces great fertility and originality of mind; while passages, rich with poetic imagery, or elevating in their influence, from the purest and noblest strains of moral sentiment, attest alike the beautiful imagination and the talked principle possessed by the writer.

Although of "making books there is no end," as there is scarcely any conceivable subject upon which nothing has not been written, yet all who have ever endeavored to find suitable books for any specific purpose, must have discovered how many departments, even in the most explored branches of knowledge, yet remain to be filled. Perhaps, in the course of such an investigation, a single book may never be found, which places the subject exactly in the light you most wish to see it considered, or contains the information respecting it, you most desire to obtain. This is especially the case with moral philosophy, for there is no subject on which authors have written, more "variously, uncertainly, and unsatisfyingly," and the ground which Miss Mercer occupies, appears to us the very strongest that can be taken. We think even those who do not believe the Gospel to be a Divine Revelation, admit it to be the purest system of ethics ever offered to mankind, and the character of Jesus Christ to be a faultless model for human imitation. Granting these premises, it seems to follow necessarily, that the best system of ethics must be that which is based on the Christian Religion. Why should we recur to the "dim lights of philosophy," when the "day-star from on high" sheds its radiance on our path—or why dignify the errors of antiquity with the name of philosophy? Very beautiful, very noble were the speculations of many of those who sought to understand the science of moral obligation, from the light of nature—containing too, bright and partial glimpses of truth, but never presenting a rational and consistent system of ethics. A brighter, a steadier light than that of reason and natural religion, was wanting to enable the eye of man to discern clearly and in its whole extent, the foundation on which the temple of moral science must be reared, to insure the beauty of proportion and durability of the fabric.

But it is time that we should offer some specimen of the work before us to our readers, to enable them to form some judgment as to its merits, or rather its beauties of style and thought; for the higher excellences of a book, treating of so serious a subject, cannot be illustrated by short extracts. The opening paragraph appears to us a good example of the beautiful imagery and language, which may be found interspersed in numerous passages through the volume:

"Bright and glorious is the morning of life, when youth and inexperience launch their light bark upon the sparkling tide of a new existence. Their broad pennon bears in its silken folds, hope on the wing pursuing distant pleasures; their bright streamers flutter in the surging breeze, revealing curious devices of anticipated joys, the spray casts around the vessel's prow showers of diamonds, the dipping oars send back on their curling waves pulses of burnished silver, and flashes of living gold; and softly as the receding waters close behind the storm, they murmur a gentle, kind adieu. Life is then all poetry—all pleasure, and well do the aged remember the magic power of youthful feelings and imaginations, and what a dazzling glow their own enthusiasm spreads over the sober realism of life. But far from the promised haven for which they sailed, is the shore where their broken voyage has ended. Many and sorrowful have been the shipwrecks which they have witnessed: gay hearts swept away before the receding tide of fate; confident spirits sunk in the raging deep, or dashed on the rocky coast of disappointment and despair. To one who looks back upon the end and vicissitudes of a past life, there is something deeply affecting in the unconscious mirth of the young, sporting heedlessly on the verge of an ocean of trouble, upon which they are but too willing to embark, without rudder and without compass."

It is obvious that the aim of the writer is the cultivation of moral and religious principles of action, and the bright flowers of imagination are scattered almost unconsciously through the pages of her work—springing as naturally from the soil of her mind, as the wild-flower on the mossy dell or shady bank. There are also passages to be found of exquisite pathos, such as the following :

"Open your heart to the deepest sympathies of our nature in commiserating the keenest of earthly sorrows, that of a mother bereaved of a daughter, who has lived to become the solace and delight, the companion and friend of her declining age, as she has been the hope of her more youthful affections. Walking through her desolated dwelling, the aching void produced in her thoughts and affections, is felt at every step ; in her lone chamber, or by the cheerful fireside, some seat is vacant that she was wont to fill, and reminds her that she who contributed so much to the happiness of the domestic circle, is gone forever. In all her youthful loveliness we have laid her in the cold, damp grave. Every sense is busy in ministering to grief, and suggesting their own peculiar associations of sorrow ; and memory, that importunate and unfeeling faculty that cares not for the anguish it inflicts, whispers—'Those soft beams of affection with which those beautiful eyes so fondly turned on you, you will never meet again ; the gentle tones of that dove-like voice will never again vibrate on your ear, with the mysterious charm which belongs to the simple word mother ; no more shall you feel the sacred thrill of holy emotion, with which you met the pressure of her lips, in the warm, pure salutations of a daughter's love.' Here, oh thou God of heaven and earth, what a lesson dost thou give us of the danger of fixing our thoughts and affections upon earthly things ; by what terrible dispensations dost thou sever our souls from earth, and force them to follow thee into the invisible hereafter ! How dost thou cast up the foundations of dust, and tear the deep roots of our affections forth, and leave us like a tree which the whirlwind has overthrown ? Who that looks on the giant oak, in the strength of its centurion growth, could have thought that, in one minute, an invisible power could wrench it from its hold, and leave it prostrate in the dust ? So are the strong ties of human affection severed in an instant. But let the expression of animal feeling be hushed. Be silent earth ! and listen to one who comes among you, with the power of Him who has overthrown your earthly joys, and the sympathy of a man who feels for you as a brother. Hear those precious words—'The maid is not dead, but sleepeth.' Yes, bereaved mother, your daughter sleeps sweetly in Christ : safe from such pangs as now rends your heart, she rests in hope of a glorious resurrection. Yet a little while and you shall stand side by side, and you will say, 'Is this indeed my drooping, perishing child, who fell away from my side, like a withering flower ? Is this my daughter, radiant with glory, smiling in the eternal light of God's throne, resplendent in the purity of a heavenly nature, exulting in the victory over sin and sorrow and the grave ?' Can you not, even now, see the celestial ray of her angelic eye beaming upon you ? Do you not hear the silvery tones of her voice, in ravishing sweetness, say, 'Oh mother ! it was for this we mourned—it was for this we suffered—it was for this I died. Can you not, then, wait your appointed time—go on rejoicing in faith, performing the assumed duties of your mortal pilgrimage, till your end come ? Did not sorrow wean me—did not suffering purify me—did not death release me from the bondage of corruption ; and do you not know that our Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand, at the latter day, upon the earth ; and though worms destroy this body, yet in the flesh shall we see God, whom we shall see for ourselves, and our eyes shall behold ?' Do you not know that it is gain to die, and be with Christ ; and would you have me bound longer in the chains of mortality, and perhaps have lived to see my soul whelmed in the cares and griefs—or worse, the tempting, deceptive, misnamed pleasures of that world which is at enmity with God ?' Such is the spirit of consolation which visits the broken heart of the Christian mourner ; and to young and old, it seems forever to sound our warning—'Prepare to meet thy God.'"

We must not, however, in gathering flowers by the wayside, forget the more important objects we have in view in endeavoring to recommend this work to the attention of the public. It has merits of a higher order than to charm the imagination, or touch the sensibility ; it informs the reason, gives rules of practical good sense for the conduct of life, awakens thought as to our own natures, and excites devotional feeling. It is difficult to illustrate such merits as these by short extracts, so that we must refer the reader to the work itself, believing that he will not fail to perceive them in its perusal. We admire the power of generalization and capacity for clear definition which sentences such as the following often exhibit :

"The whole business, then, of education is, to study the moral peculiarities of the mind, to form the best estimate of the probable destiny of the being, and then to surround the subject (whether ourself or another) with such influences from without, as will tend to develop the faculties in due proportion, to suit the duties and conditions of life to which we may reasonably anticipate being called."

We have seen volumes on education which did not explain the subject so well as this single sentence. Guided by principles of education such as these, it will be of comparatively little importance to what languages, or to what branches of science, the attention is devoted. The cultivation, the enlargement of the mind, the due balancing of its powers, are the great ends of education ; the positive knowledge gained in most studies, is often of little practical use in after life ; but the power to use and regulate the faculties of the mind, is an inestimable and every-day advantage.

The principles of moral action are so strongly and clearly defined in these lectures, that if once well understood, their application would be easy in almost every situation in which an individual could be placed. We think not only young ladies (though to this class of society they are especially applicable) would be benefited by reading this volume, but all persons who have never seriously and frequently considered the subject of moral obligation ; and even these, we believe, would find that it awakened new trains of thought, and gave rise to many valuable suggestions. We should regret to see a book so useful, so ennobling in its tendency, as we deem this to be, perish almost as soon as it has appeared, from chilling neglect ; and we should think we had made an ungrateful return for the pure and tender feelings of the heart, the striking and luminous ideas of the mind, offered us by our countrywoman. We hope to see another edition, in which the inaccuracies of style, that are so apt to be found in writings that are composed with rapidity, will be corrected. These imperfections are slight, and do not at all affect the chief merits of this work ; but they would no doubt be removed in a subsequent edition, as it is easy to perceive from the facility of expression, and command of language possessed by the writer, that these errors could not have proceeded from any want of knowledge of the rules of composition. We should rejoice to see it in general use in schools throughout the country, as it appears to us that a book of this very kind is greatly wanted : and we believe that many a youthful mind would receive from it moral and religious light, which would shine on their paths even until they passed through "the valley and shadow of death."

PARLOR MELODIES. The Messrs. Harper, N York, have put forth a collection of songs with the above title. It is edited by two ladies, who state in their preface, that the motive of the publication was a desire to improve the time, and elevate the spirit of family music. For this purpose, many original pieces are given, and not a few well-established favorites are furnished with new words of a more devotional character than those with which they were formerly united. Mr. Wm. Cutter, a poet of fine sentiment, is the author of most of the songs.

PSYCHOLOGY. or, Elements of a New System of Mental Philosophy, on the Basis of Consciousness and Common Sense. Designed for Colleges and Academies. By S. S. Schmucker, D. D., Professor of Christian Theology in the Theological Seminary, Gettysburg. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1842.

The learned and reverend author devoted ten years to the study of his own mind, not counting the leisure time of several additional years employed to review and mature his views. As the fruit of so much labor and research, he has put forth a treatise on metaphysics, founded, he says, on common sense—no small desideratum—and which, he modestly informs the reader, is the most natural, faithful, and intelligible exhibition that has ever been given, of the operations of the human mind. With such a flourish of trumpets in the preface, our expectations were raised to the highest pitch. But 'Γνωθὶ σεαυτὸν,' know thyself, is a wise precept, which we doubt whether even the learned Dr. Schmucker, with his ten years and more of self-research, has been able to follow; for, notwithstanding his labored preparation, and the inward satisfaction, with which he views his work—the result of a deliberate self-examination—he was at length induced to publish by the frequent solicitations of learned and scientific friends. Why is it, that so many authors, after having prepared their MS., will lay the sin of publication on kind friends? We always take it to be a bad sign; for when we are told of the persuasion of friends in book-making, we never expect more than a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff. We would know of Professor Schmucker whether he was really induced to publish by the solicitations of his pupils and others? or whether he did not intend to publish at any rate, and was only confirmed in this intention by their opinions? Referring to his preface, he says in the opening paragraph, that his work "owes its existence to the author's desire to promote the cause of truth and science." He then informs us what an admirable work he thinks it is; and in the penultimate paragraph, he gives the public to understand that they may thank his pupils and others for the work, for he intimates that he consented to its publication only with great reluctance and after much persuasion—"with frequent solicitations, this work is at length submitted to the public." We mention these trivial circumstances simply with the view of showing to what little practical effect this author has studied, for ten years, the operations of his own mind. Here is the expounder of a new and common sense (?) system of mental philosophy, putting forth his theories as the dicta of wisdom, and setting himself up to teach the manifold workings of the human understanding; yet he cannot simply tell the motives which operated in his own mind, to induce the publication of his system! Doctor Schmucker is an eminent divine, and an instructor of youth—but as to this new system of psychology, we must have something more than his mere exclamation of Εὐρηκα! εὐρηκα! before we can admit that he has discovered any thing new in the science. We certainly cannot allow him, unless he will show his authority, to speak ex cathedra, as to the operations of the human mind; and, before we can commend his system of mental philosophy to our schools and colleges, we must have better proof than any afforded by the lines drawn in it, that he has himself made some advances towards the solution of the great problem, 'Γνωθὶ σεαυτὸν.'

We do not perceive that the learned Professor has added

one iota to the present stock of psychological information; on the contrary, he has done much by the vagueness of his terms and the broad generalities of his rules, to obscure and mystify what we already possess—e. g., he lays down 16 laws of FEELING. From them, we quote his 12th—a mere dictum, without one word of comment, or note of explanation. "The susceptibility for feeling, naturally declines with age and with the decline of the constitution, even if that be premature:" p. 118. Sensation and emotion are both included under the term feeling—and our readers no doubt will be surprised to learn, that females of delicate constitutions and nervous persons have less susceptibility of feeling than the robust ploughman or hardy mountaineer. We see persons who, with enfeebled constitutions, have become hysterical, actually thrown into the most violent convulsions by their feelings—so sharpened, intense and acute do they become in a state of declining health. It is customary to conceal from persons when in the low stages of disease—i. e. when their constitution and healthy tone of the system are for the time destroyed—all intelligence that is calculated to produce any considerable emotion, because their susceptibility to feeling then, is so great, that physicians tell us, the most serious consequences are to be apprehended. As for the feelings of old persons, perhaps their susceptibility to sensation does decline with age; for we often hear of their sight, hearing, etc. failing them—their susceptibility too to the feelings of emotion for the most part perhaps may also decrease; but in some respects it actually increases. We are told by Solomon and the Bible, that the susceptibility to the emotions of fear is one of the characteristics of old age. 'When they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, * * because man goeth to his long home.' Such are a few only of the contradictions and practical absurdities to which the Professor's new system of common sense philosophy, leads him! When he laid down his Laws, he seems to have had only some one or two particular cases in view—from them he generalized, and shaped his law only so as to include them: hence his law will cover no other but the special cases after which he framed it. Generally speaking, loss of susceptibility in one set of organs is attended by a gain in the others. Hence the acute sense of touch is lost in blind persons; and hence it is, that, in conformity with this new principle, we see mutes manifesting the liveliest emotions of pleasure or pain, to the mere atmospherical vibrations caused by musical sounds. So too with those that are whole: we find them at one period of life more susceptible to the emotions of love, at another to the emotions of fear and so on. We have rarely seen a work which hits more widely of its mark than this, and which we have felt a duty more decidedly to condemn.

Who was it that said, 'let me make the ballads for the people, and I care not who makes the laws for the nation.' It was a wise remark by whomsoever made; and the truth of it was fully exemplified in the effect produced by the political song books in the last presidential canvass. Ballads for the people could not be dressed in a more pleasing manner, than in the rich melodies of Scottish music. 'Scotland is emphatically the land of legend, poetry and song: and Mr. Graham, himself a poet, has presented to the public, in the volume before us, some of the sweetest airs that were ever breathed 'mang the bonnie highland heather.' To the American people, there are no tunes half so sweet as many of the old fashioned Scottish songs. Mr. Graham has a beautiful collection of these arranged to music, and we commend them heartily to our fair readers, and to those who love soul-sustaining airs.

SONG.

BY LEWIS J. CIST.

I think of thee!—at MORN, my Love!—
At earliest dawn of day,
'When matin-bells do chime,'—above
My soul is sent to pray
For THEE!

I think of thee!—at NOON, my Love!
My heart, each parted hour,
Pants, as the weary, wand'ring Dove,
To seek again its bower,
Near THEE.

I think of thee!—at EVE, my Love!
'Mid scenes most bright and fair;—
To thee my thoughts in sadness rove,
And sigh to wish me there,
With THEE!

I think of thee!—at NIGHT, my Love!
When thou art gone to rest;
Bright may thine every vision prove,
Be all thy slumbers blest
To THEE!

SPAIN.

POPULAR ERRORS—THEIR CAUSES—TRAVELLERS.

NO. III.

Those of our readers who are blessed with good memories, will perhaps recollect, that in our March and July numbers, of 1841, we gave some little space to a review of matters connected with the Spanish nation. In our first essay, we examined into the connection between the history of Columbus, by Mr. Washington Irving, and the great work of Don Martin Fernandez Navarrete—endeavoring, with all respect and impartiality, to strike the just balance of obligation between them. Unfortunately, we found ourselves compelled to lay to the charge of Mr. Irving, an absence of that spirit of full and frank acknowledgment, which was demanded alike by his own reputation, and the extent and value of the materials which he had pressed into his service. More than a year has elapsed, without any notice or refutation, by Mr. Irving or his friends, of the grave facts and conclusions, which our investigation elicited and established. By all the rules then, which govern in such cases, we are bound to infer, that our distinguished countryman has preferred the quiet disparagement of a judgment by default, to the notoriety of a verdict, after a fruitless contest. This inference we feel ourselves at the fullest liberty to draw. Literary eminence may relieve a man, perhaps, from the necessity of caring for criticism upon his style or opinions, and such an immunity may be but a just reward for a lifetime of labor and merit. Not so however, where the delicate question arises, whether he has not, without fair notice, borrowed other men's commodities, and sold them for his own. Good character is, in such a case, merely prima facie evidence of the weakest kind. The true issue is on the facts, without respect to persons, and no man can place himself above responsibility on such an accusation, or meet that responsibility, otherwise than by a defence on the actual merits.

We have lately seen a discourse, pronounced, during the last autumn or winter by Martinez de la Rosa, before the Historical Institute of Paris, and having reference to the discoveries of Columbus. The author, with that mildness which is conspicuous in all his critical essays, contents himself with the following observation: "Mr. Navarrete has contributed much to the just success, in the United States, of the work published there, by Mr. Washington Irving, under the title of the History of Christopher Columbus. This historian, who unites so much elegance and facility, lived some time in Spain, and derived therefrom materials of great value." We have also before us, an article upon the literature of the United States, written for the "Pensamiento," by a Spanish author of reputation, Don Enrique Gil. It presents to us the following paragraph. "By the side of others, are found Prescott and Washington Irving—the first, as successful in the character of an exact and dispassionate historian of the Catholic monarchs, as the second in that of a skilful colourer (colorista) of the great enterprise of Columbus." To this passage a note is appended, in which the author remarks—"The word colorista is here used intentionally, for every one who may read the Collection of Voyages, by Navarrete, will be convinced that the narrative of Irving contains nothing that belongs to its author, save the coloring of his beautiful style."

We do not quote these passages to fortify our views, because we are content that they should rest upon the facts and arguments, without the support of any man's authority. Our object is, merely to show that we have not been starting at visions of signs and wonders, unseen by all the world but ourselves—but that the opinions which we have expressed, have extended themselves in more than one direction. Mr. Irving moreover, has recently been selected as our Plenipotentiary at the Court of Madrid, and these publications by Spanish authors, may indicate that his literary position is not unknown to the people whom he is about to visit.¹ Upon this side of the Atlantic, as is most natural, his appointment has been received with universal approbation, as a just tribute to one, who has given to his country far more honor than office and dignity can repay. These very expressions of satisfaction have, however, elicited new proofs of the fact which we have hitherto alleged—that the preface to the History of Columbus has created an almost universal impression, that the whole work was the result of its author's individual labor and research. The following paragraph, from the New World of February 19th, 1842, (to which others of the same tone might easily be added) affords us a good illustration.

"WASHINGTON IRVING, MINISTER TO SPAIN.—We are sincerely gratified by this appointment, and we heartily thank Mr. Tyler for so acceptable an indication of his respect for lofty genius and pure integrity. Aside from his eminent reputation, no man could have been found better suited to discharge in a dignified and able manner the duties of this office, than Mr. Irving. During his laborious compilation of materials for his splendid work, 'The Life of Columbus,' he was for years a resident in Spain. He perfectly understands the language, manners and customs of that distracted but deeply interesting country, and he will nobly assert the character of our government at the Spanish Court. By such men as Edward Everett and Washington Irving, will the American name be made brighter in the kingdoms of the Old World."

Of course we quarrel with no part of the above, but that which we have italicised. To that part however, appearing as it does in a periodical of acknowledged ability and information, we may refer with confidence, to show how far the "laborious compilation" by Navarrete, for thirty years, to which the "splendid work" is indebted for its "materials," has been, from some strange cause or other, entirely hidden from public observation. What that cause may be, we will not go over our old ground to show—for it is not our purpose to press Mr. Irving further. He has gone from among us, and we wish him God speed! When his diplomatic career shall have ended, he will return, we trust, at the helm of another argosy, laden with Castilian romance and history. We must be pardoned however, if we presume to scan his future prefaces, with cautious eyes—for we confess ourselves anxious to discover, whether the pen, so faultless in the blending and harmonizing of materials, may not prove itself equally graceful, in acknowledging the sources of its inspiration.

In our article of July last, we discussed, among other things, the absurdities of a school-book, called Whelpley's Compend of History, and selected by us, as a specimen of a whole class of works, to which may be attributed in a high degree, the vulgar errors in regard to Spanish literature and character. We only now refer to the Compend, that we may remind our readers, of the basis on which the compiler rests some of his most ridiculous and objectionable statements—"the testimony of travellers." These words describe to us the raw material of almost every thing which we have proposed to ourselves to combat, and we have consequently selected them as a text for some of the observations by which we intend to redeem our promise to the reader.

The "testimony of travellers" has always been suspicious proof, since the days when Herodotus sought the cradle of history, among the bulrushes by the waters of fable. There was a time however, when the world was not troubled with a very thick cloud of witnesses. "It is a strange thing," says Lord Bacon, "that in sea-voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men should make diaries; but in land-travel, wherein so much is to be observed, for the most part they omit it." Sadly have such days passed—for now the only strange thing would be, that man or woman should travel by land or by sea, in balloon or diving-bell, without furnishing his or her quota of "testimony," in the shape of letters to newspapers, if not of graver volumes. As these productions are meant, oftentimes, to answer the double purpose of paying expenses and purchasing immortality—it is no wonder that they should have largely increased the stock of what, by an amiable compromise between politeness and common sense, we designate by the paraphrase of "travellers stories." Now, to speak in all seriousness, we think there is no injustice in placing most books of travel in this category; for if we compare what is needed to produce such works, as they should be written, with what is actually possessed by those who generally write them, we will but rarely find an apology for yielding them moderate confidence. If a man profess to do no more than to write a picturesque tour—to describe the external world—the views—the ruins—the palaces—the costume and the crowd—we can understand that it is possible for him to execute his task, without much time, ability or study. It is another thing, however, to go from the surface of nature and art into the moral and political mysteries of a nation; to give, as most tourists profess to give, after a very brief examination and inquiry, the philosophy of all the phenomena, which develop and illustrate national character. A whole people do by no means furnish a page, which a man may read as he runs. If every individual be, as he is, a microcosm, hard to understand; requiring long study, and even then—according to the moral of Sancho, drawn from the adventure of Rozinante and the Yangusians—not too much to be trusted; it cannot be supposed that a nation, which is as infinity to the unit, can be much easier or simpler subject for the pencil. Let any well informed man, of respectable ability, who has reached the meridian of life, in the exercise of powers of observation, ordinarily acute, take up his pen, to describe the institutions social and civil, among which he was born. Let him undertake to set out, at length and philosophically, the intellectual and physical developments of his own land—to trace, fairly, the virtues and the foibles of her national character—to unravel the mingled yarn of contradictions, woven around all the men and things, which have been about him since his infancy. How many men shall we find who will not shrink from the toil and magnitude of the undertaking—how many of those who may be willing to assume it, will the better judgment of the community acquit of the charge of presumption? All will unite in pronouncing it to be a work for a life-time of care, responsibility and exclusive devotion. A fortiori then, if it be so difficult to see, save “through a glass, darkly,” the things which have been as familiar to us as the common light, how shall we trust our faith to those, who set foot for the first time upon a foreign soil, on the day which commences their career as its historians? In this dearly beloved land of ours, we have certainly had experience enough, to leave us at no loss for an answer to the question. “Fremuerunt gentes”—the whole confederacy has more than once had its pride and its sense of truth in open rebellion, against the ignorant misrepresentations of superficial or prejudiced observers. How can we then, with justice or consistency, commend to the lips of others, the cup which we spurn so indignantly from our own?

Of course we would not be understood, as stating these objections, for the purpose of contending therefrom, that no confidence at all should be given to the narratives of travellers. Extensive as may be the requisite qualifications, there are still those who possess them. That the number however is not very great, a little further consideration will conclusively prove to us.

As an indispensable prerequisite, a traveller who means to print, should be familiar with the language of the people whom he visits. “He that travelleth into a country” (says Lord Bacon, in his Essay on Travel, of which we avail ourselves) “before he hath some entrance into the language, goeth to school, and not to travel.” Possessing the language, he must next be enabled to use his advantages, by free admission to all classes of society. He must study the drawing room and the family circle, as well as the highways; he must visit city and country, to mingle with men in the field, the warehouse and the workshop. His observation must be quick and penetrating, and he must give it full time to range, wherever there is any thing for it to light on. He must see for himself, where it is practicable, and where it is not,

he must seek from intelligent natives,* and the most accurate sources of written information, the knowledge which has been generalized from past facts. He must make himself familiar with the history of the country, and the general aspect of its laws. He must be able to trace the influence of these last upon manners, customs and thought—for in this lies, perhaps, the deepest and most difficult problem he must solve. With nightly and daily hand, he must turn over the literature of the country; for it will present to him a true reflection of the public mind and heart, in times past, as well as in times present. Placed upon all these vantage grounds, he will still be at fault, unless he possess a philosophical and impartial spirit; unfettered by the prejudices of political, social and religious education. He should be disposed to sympathize, to a reasonable extent, with the spirit of the people, and to yield his assent readily, to their peculiar observances. He must be sufficiently deliberate, to avoid being deluded by the first erroneous impressions of novelty, and sufficiently dispassionate, to draw no unfavorable inferences, from the clash between his own ingrained tastes and those with which he has been brought suddenly into contact. Last, but not least, he must write for truth—not for popularity nor sale. He must be above the baseness of pandering to received opinion, and proof against the temptation of sacrificing candour, to ludicrous caricature or pointed satire.

We do not pretend to have made our enumeration of requisites, by any means complete—and yet how many men can we select, who have them all at command? Moreover, we have hitherto spoken, only of countries which present but a single surface, alike all over, and which, being studied in one point, may be comprehended in all. With Spain, the case is still more difficult. Geographically isolated from the other nations of the continent—she has segregated herself, even more, by standing still in most things, while they have chopped and changed, for good or evil, and by adhering with unvarying tenacity to her ancient arts and customs. Necessarily therefore, a traveller from any other European state, and more especially from America, will require no little time and familiarity, to reach that level field of observation, which he would tread, at the first step, in countries less unlike his own. But, in addition to this,

* The difficulty of learning from natives, what ought to be known, is well set forth in one of Sterne's sermons—an odd place to be sure, for such matters. “Conversation is a traffic; and if you enter into it without some stock of knowledge to balance the account perpetually betwixt you—the trade drops at once—and this is the reason—however it may be boasted to the contrary, why travellers have so little, (especially good) conversation with natives—owing to their suspicion—or, perhaps, conviction that there is nothing to be extracted from the conversation of young itinerants, worth the trouble of their bad language—or the interruption of their visits.” Sermon XX.

Spain is not one nation made up of homogeneous parts. Her territory is split up into many large provinces, whose inhabitants preserve their distinctive dialects, costume and character, like the citizens of independent nations. Some of these provinces have retained, through whole centuries of despotism, the forms, and something of the substance of republicanism, to which they owe in connection with their occupation—mostly agricultural—not only a hardy and independent spirit, but much of frugality, industry and plenty. In others again, the enervating influence of climate, and the thousand temptations to indolence which their almost spontaneous harvests afford—have combined with bad laws, to corrupt the character of the people, and to sap the foundations of their prosperity. Between these numerous provinces, thus separated by political and moral barriers, there is comparatively little communication. Inaccessible mountains frequently divide them, and oftentimes their necessary trade is carried on through rugged defiles, where the hand of nature seems to have thrown obstacles, almost invincible, in the path of human enterprise. Thus then, their feelings, customs and opinions run on in different channels, and though they are bound together by a common government, and have jointly felt its oppression, they have kept themselves apart, in those things, which a traveller must read and know, before he has a right to claim the merit of a faithful limner.

It might have been hoped that Spain, with characteristics so diversified and difficult to be drawn, would have been fortunate enough to escape the visitations of scribbling peripatetics. She has, on the contrary, been the victim of tourists without number—who, like Byron's critic,

"With just enough of learning to misquote," have acquired sufficient knowledge, from a birds-eye view, to be ignorant with ostentation, and to misrepresent, with vrai-semblance. How far the pilgrims from great Britain, have been exceptions to this remark, may be inferred from the following caustic notice, admitted by the Edinburgh Review to be just!² It was written by Don Nicolas Azara, and prefixed to Bowles' Geografia Fisica!³ The travels of Swinburne to which it relates, have been of high repute, and may be taken as affording a very favorable specimen of the class to which they belong. Before we shall have concluded this article, it may be seen that some of the strictures are by no means exclusively applicable to British productions.

"It appears," says Don Nicolas, "that England has lately taken great pains in the description of Spain. Mr. Swinburne, it is true, has given her information on which she cannot rely—but nevertheless, he has amused her with an infinity of observations, made among the taverns and lodging-houses, and produced in a style, the most appropriate that could be chosen, to ridicule our government, our customs and religion. * * * So acute is his penetration, that in three days after his entrance into Spain, he had discovered that all the roads were bad—the taverns worse—the whole country vastly similar to the infernal regions. He saw stupidity reigning every where, and found no Spaniards of good breeding, but those who had humanized themselves by French or English petitesse. He perceived that the Catalonians drink la gargalleta, and eat meat on Friday—placing on the table a very tricky little image of the Virgin, &c.—with a million of other things after the same fashion. It caused him but little delay to acquire the most minute information in regard to our army—even the colours of its several uniforms; and although he blunders in names, numbers, colours, and the quality of the regiments, it is no matter. These little details are always useful, if not to the nation that receives them, at least to that of which they are written—as has been proved more than once. * * * For an occasion to divert his companions in their clubs, with some miracles and rancid superstitions, he takes the trouble to write a new history of Catalonia. Travelling through the rest of Spain, he loses no chance of inserting the very important observations which ought to be made upon hosts and hostesses—their costumes, &c. Neither does he forget the guitar and the fandangos—nor omit to cite continually Don Quixote and Gil Blas, the two perennial fountains of his erudition. * * * In general, all Spain seems to him to be stupid, even to lethargy—poor, dissatisfied, jealous and melancholy. That he might not die of hypochondria, he took refuge in the paradise of Gibraltar. Every Englishman whom he meets seems to him an angel, and serves him by way of contrast to the Spaniards. For the same purpose he speaks immensely of the Moors—their history and architecture, especially in Granada and Cordova—rising to a high flight in praise of that sullen people—that he may show the humble pretensions of ours in comparison. * * * He says that his valet disappeared in Toledo, and that after two days of diligent search, he was found to have been shut up, all that time, to comb the wig of a statue of the Virgin! Of course we must not smile, Mr. Swinburne assures us, that he relates nothing but the truth. His singular erudition might have been profitably employed in describing the Roman antiquities still preserved in the Peninsula. * * * Yet these he scarcely notices. The same fate is shared by our Academies, Libraries, Cabinets of Antiquities and Natural History—our Botanical garden—the Fine Arts, Commerce and Manufactures—our splendid roads already made, and others in construction. Such trifles he no doubt thought unworthy the curiosity of his countrymen—particularly when he informed them that the liter-

of Spain do not amount to more than half a dozen. Besides this; in order that no one may mistake the learning of Spain, and suppose it to be like that of other countries, he explains what we mean by a literary man. This, according to him, is just such a person as an English gentleman of the most ordinary education—a Spaniard who knows how to read Greek, being taken for an extraordinary phenomenon. With all this, Mr. Swinburne tells us, in his prologue, that he is going to give a description of Spain, so complete, interesting, exact and truthful, that it will throw into the shade, all the extant histories of our country."

The reader will pardon us the length of the extract; but if he would be convinced that it is not out of place, let him take from the shelf of his library, the first book of Spanish travel that may be at hand, and judge how far the criticism is applicable to almost the whole clan who have been "taking notes."

As it is our object to render our views upon this subject as practical and demonstrative as possible—and inasmuch as we consider our American writers, ceteris paribus, entitled to be preferred, where they will suit our purposes—we shall devote the remainder of this article, to the work of a fellow countryman who has acquired considerable reputation. "A Year in Spain, by a Young American," is understood to have been the production of Lieutenant Slidell (now Mackenzie) of the United States Navy. Both in England and this country, it has enjoyed extensive popularity, and is, in fact, a most attractive volume. Its style is gay and gossiping; its descriptions are lively and life-like; its epitomes and selections of history, full of point and interest; so that on the whole, as far as the dulce is concerned, it possesses very great merit. It professes, however, to go farther than this, to have the utile for its end and aim. In the preface, the author states that the "work originated in a desire to convey some notion of the manners and customs of the Spanish nation," and to enable those who might not have visited Spain, "to form an idea of the country and its inhabitants." Towards the close,* it is repeated that it was "the chief design of the work, to convey some notion of Spanish character and manners." It is but fair to suppose, that these "notions" and "ideas" were designed to be correct. Whether they are so, or are not, is certainly a matter of very serious importance—for, just or unjust, the conclusions arrived at are scattered with no sparing hand, and have been adopted, far and wide, wherever the popularity of the book has borne them. We propose to examine, very briefly, how far the author's opportunities of observation were such, as would have entitled his deductions to weight, under any circumstances; and still further, how much consideration is actually due to them, under the peculiar state of facts to which we shall have occasion to advert.

The work is called, as we said, "A year in Spain." At first blush, a year, even when not curtailed of its fair proportions, and when well and assiduously used, is but a very short period for reading the riddle of any nation, and more especially such an one as we have described the Peninsular to be. In Mr. Slidell's case however, years are only to be considered in a Pickwickian sense. In October of 1826,⁶ he was in Rousillon, and until then, had not concluded to carry his design of visiting Spain, into immediate execution.⁶ On the 23d of April 1827, he left Seville for Cadiz, which he reached in two or three days, and having spent but one Sunday⁷ in that city, he found himself at Gibraltar, a few days afterwards, and in sight of the United States ship North Carolina, which "he had been anxious to meet."⁸ This, according to the edition to which we have referred, was the end of his journey; and this, by the most liberal computation, would only give him until the middle of May 1827—making his year, by a wide calculation, between six and seven months long. We learn, however, from a new edition published in 1836, that he made a trip to Granada, not mentioned in the old one, and which, by the dates to which it refers, may be computed with sufficient accuracy, to have occupied him some five or six weeks longer, at the utmost; making his year, with all allowances, not more than eight, or eight and a half months long. This must certainly be considered, in our planet, short enough for a poet's dream of the fleeting years of childhood, whatever might be the opinion of its length, in some globe, yet nearer to the sun. So much for the time employed. Let us next look at the mode of its application.

If the reader will take the map of Spain in his hand, we will proceed, understandingly, together. Mr. Slidell entered by the way of Catalonia, and coasted the Mediterranean to Barcelona, thence to Valencia. From Valencia he crossed to Madrid, passing, on the road, through a corner of the kingdom of Murcia. From Madrid, he made an excursion into Old Castile, as far as Segovia. Having visited Toledo, he took Cordova on his way to Seville, whence he proceeded to Cadiz, Gibraltar, Granada, and Gibraltar once more. By his own showing then, he touched the soil of but seven provinces—viz. Catalonia, Valencia, Murcia, New Castile, Old Castile, Andalusia and Granada. The other half of the provinces—Aragon, Biscay, Navarre, Asturias, Galicia, Leon and Estremadura, he left entirely unvisited. It will be borne in mind too, that this unvisited portion of the Kingdom, contains nearly one half of its inhabitants, differing in all respects from those whom he actually saw, and presenting the most interesting and peculiar features of character and institutions, to a philosophical observer.⁹ If we read the lists of those who have been prominent, for many years, in the civil or military service of their country, it will be found, that from some of these unnoticed provinces, most of the ablest have sprung. It is among them, that there is most of personal and political independence, that property is most equally divided, industry most habitual and successful. In fine, they constitute so essential a part of the whole, they blend so many of its most admirable qualities, that to pass them by in the circle of consideration, is to perform the tragedy, omitting the part of Hamlet.

Unless, however, our young American had visited these provinces, in a different mode from that in which he passed through the rest, we cannot say that the world has lost much by his neglect. From the frontier to Barcelona, he passed with all the speed of the public conveyance. In that city, the capital of Catalonia, and containing 120,000 inhabitants, he found a stay of one week;¹⁰ long enough to form his "idea" or "notion" of the people. His field of view was his inn, and his only acquaintances, to all appearance, were a French fellow-traveller, and a captain of the same nation, whom he met on the route. From Barcelona to Valencia, he proceeded in the diligence, availing himself of those admirable opportunities for observation and study, which are presented by the open windows of such a conveyance, or by the hostelrys on the road side. In Valencia, with a population of 80,000 souls, he tarried for three days, at¹¹ his inn, apparently without acquaintances; and at the expiration of that period, he again mounted the diligence for Madrid. Leaving on the South the fertile fields of Valencia and Murcia—their agricultural perfection unseen, where most deserving observation¹²—neglecting also the prosperous and extensive manufacturing establishments of Alcoy and its vicinity, of which Mr. Cushing speaks with so much enthusiasm,¹³ our traveller quietly surrendered himself to the guidance of his mayoral, and dreaming of robbers and Don Quixotte, followed the high road to the capital. Thus fortified with solid information, in regard to men, things, and manners—he spent in Madrid five of the eight months, to which his sojourn in the country extended. To Toledo, Cordova, Cadiz and Malaga, he gave a few days each, and concluded with a fortnight among the wonders of Granada.

Upon such a statement of facts then, as this which we have taken, without malice or extenuation, from the book itself, we should very naturally conclude, that a man must needs have been gifted with extraordinary powers, and wonderful facilities, to have been able, after such a race through the Kingdom, to write an octavo volume, of trust-worthy facts, from his own knowledge. Three months only, devoted to Spain, out of the capital, and that capital too, not like Paris, the guide and type and spirit of the Kingdom—but a city of itself, telling no tale of places at a distance; of these three months, the best part necessarily spent upon the road, among grooms and male-teers—landlords and tapsters! One would think it were not easy, from such teaching, to learn a wise lesson for one's self, or to draw food for others. But this is not all. Mr. Slidell did not know the tongue of the country.¹⁴ One of the objects of his visit was "to perfect himself in the language."¹⁵ In Bacon's words, quoted above, he went "to school and not to travel." His first effort in Madrid, was to settle himself in a family, in search of "favorable circumstances for learning the language."¹⁶ Thus, pressed for time, and deprived of the great essential which alone could have made a longer stay thoroughly advantageous, he does not seem to have mingled extensively in social intercourse with the inhabitants. Such at least is the inference we should draw from the information which he gives us, that his own life and occupations in Madrid, "had little connection with the customs of the country."¹⁷ In his subsequent work, "Spain Revisited,"¹⁸ it is true he informs us, that on his first visit to Spain, he had enjoyed the advantage of mingling in the polished circles of the metropolis—but that he then, and afterwards, forbore to describe the manners and peculiarities, which he had only seen, through the medium of private hospitality. In the propriety and excellent taste of a resolution, so becoming to Mr. Slidell's character as an officer and a gentleman, we concur to a very great extent—not however without believing it possible for him to have given a general outline of well-bred manners, without violating the sanctity of individual life. We cannot, besides, fail to observe the consequences of his total silence on that subject. A short extract will serve as an illustration. "It is (says he) a very common and very true remark, that well-bred people are every where the same. A description of them, can of course have little of that dramatic interest, which has its origin in picturesque and peculiar manners, or in the eccentricities and absurdities which are banished from polite circles."¹⁹ But will not any one perceive, that although the manners of well-bred people may be destitute of "dramatic interest"—it is hardly fair to leave them altogether out of the picture, and after having painted nothing but the "eccentricities and absurdities" of the vulgar, to say, that he has given a correct "notion," or a true "idea," of the manners and character of the whole people. If it be so, then the Tr

lopes and Fiddlers, the Halls, Hamiltons and Marryats, have been most wrongfully vilified among ourselves. It is this writing for "dramatic interest," of which we have had occasion, in the course of our remarks, so often to complain. If travellers will forget that they are in some degree historians—gatherers of the materials which other men will and must use, for purposes of gravest interest; if they will neglect to give a faithful portraiture of all the good and the evil, the high and the low, and will seek in the corners and byeways, all that is absurd and eccentric, merely because it is "picturesque and peculiar"—then, there is an end of truth and justice, and we have caricature and ridicule in their stead. There will not perhaps be much harm done, if the thing be once thoroughly understood; but, that all the world may be upon their guard, let men, when they write the history of travel, make it history, if they so call it—and when they write romances, let them candidly give them that title.

So far as the mere descriptions of Mr. Slidell extend, his object would seem to be easily comprehended. Scarce any thing but the visible material world is spread before us. Here, a lovely girl displays an ankle quite as beautiful. There, a fat ferocious gentleman looks daggers from the corner of a diligence. Here, the mayoral says sweet or harsh things to his mules, as the case may be; there, is a robbery and horrid tragedy. The Ramblas and the Prados, with the mantillas and the capas—the theatres, convents and churches—the roads, streets and taverns are all gaily and admirably described. In justice too, we must bear witness to a faithful description of the libraries, cabinets, and various philosophical, benevolent and literary institutions, to be found in Madrid, where the author was, long enough to look around him at his leisure. There seems too, to be every disposition to appreciate their excellence, and give credit to their number and extent. Were this all—did not the author go on to describe and detail, what, in the nature of things, he could not know, and did not see and understand—we should end our commentary, without a word of further disapprobation. To be sure, it might be a matter of necessity, for us to say, of some facts, that they were the property of Mariana; of others that they belonged to Antillon, and of many observations and conclusions, that they were the offspring of Laberde; but then we should refer to the author's candid admission of his indebtedness, as a sufficient apology for the fact, and should attribute its extent, to the pressure of that temptation to write a book, with which, according to the motto of the volume, Cervantes says that Satan so sorely besets us. We might apply, too, the strictures of Azara, which we have previously quoted, to Mr. Slidell's admiration of every thing English, and to his ecstasies at finding himself in the "paradise of Gibraltar."¹⁸ For instance; when he visits the old castle of Taric, he describes the residence of the public hangman, who lives there "out of sight and out of mind," and then proceeds to observe that "this worthy functionary is occasionally called upon to do justice on a Spaniard, who, forgetting that he is in a land of law, has appealed, according to the custom of his country, to the arbitration of the knife."¹⁹ A notice of this trait of superior refinement in the English system, cannot fail to remind the reader of the bewildered wayfarer, who after wandering long and wearily, at last came in sight of a gibbet, and thanked God that he had reached some signs of civilization! We can pardon all this, nevertheless; for we find that our author, in his latter edition,²¹ contrasts, most favorably, the condition of the Spanish laboring classes, with that of the miserable millions, whose taxed and toilsome slavery goes to make up the aggregate of Great Britain's commercial and political greatness. In his second work too, we are further told, that the tendency of the Spanish laws "is in favor of the poor"²²—a fact in which he is fully sustained by the testimony of Mr. Cushing, who speaks, with pleasure, of the absence in the manufacturing towns which he visited, of that squalid wretchedness, so universal in English cities devoted to the same purposes.²³ With such concessions, the Spanish people may spare a host of empty praises, for true philosophy cannot consider a nation much behind hand in genuine civilization, when its title is based on the protection and social happiness it tenders to the mass.

As we said before, our author does not content himself with describing what he actually saw and knew; but proceeds in his twentieth chapter, to give a general view of Spain; and, it is to this narrative of what he did not and could not know, that we are compelled to take exception. He portrays the whole character—physical and moral—political, civil and literary—of the whole people—their arts and industry, their classes, power and peculiarities—matters, upon which it is palpable, from what we have already written, that he could, in no manner less than supernatural, have qualified himself to express an opinion. Were it not of serious consequence, it would be amusing to contemplate the gravity with which he discusses the prostration of the arts, of agriculture, commerce and manufactures—when we know that from the nature of things, he must testify to nothing but hearsay. Still more diverting is it, to hear him describe the "peculiarities of the different provinces."²⁴—one half of which he had never seen—and critically examine a language, which he did not understand. Finance and political economy, revenues and expenditures, laws and institutions, seem to have volunteered to be understood without examination. If all this be the legitimate effect of travelling, it might be a happy thought to set our national Congress into immediate locomotion. We might then have some chance of seeing them acquire a familiarity with the whole vast interests of their country, which does not seem likely to come to them, amid the riotous travesties of deliberation, which are performed at the capitol.

It would be foreign to our purpose, to examine the correctness of Mr. Slidell's views upon all the points which he touches. They may be correct, and probably are, in many particulars. Not so however, in what especially concerns us here. His remarks upon the national literature, if not conspicuous for length, atone for their brevity, by their comprehensiveness. "Literature," he says, "may not merely be said to be dying in Spain, but actually dead. The illustrious race of writers, &c, is now extinct. A single living poet alone remains, or is known to fame. Yriarte, whose fables are equal to those of Esop or La Fontaine, will long be read with equal profit and pleasure."²² We trust that we may be mistaken, in supposing that Mr. Slidell meant to speak of Yriarte, as a poet living in 1826—though we hardly see how we can give his sentences any other construction. If we are right, then it is unfortunate that we should have before us, a copy of Yriarte's "Lessons on Geography and History," published in Madrid in 1823—wherein the Editor deeply deplores the death of his author, before he had been able to put a finishing hand to the work. This work itself was commenced in 1782—and not being of very great bulk—it is fairly to be inferred, that Yriarte died before the close of the century. Feller²³ asserts that his death was in 1793. Besides this, the assertion that there was in 1827, but one living Spanish poet known to fame,²⁴ is of so extraordinary a character, to one at all familiar with the history of literature, that we must attribute it to a typographical error. It is too gross for a premeditated mistake. Where was Quintana,—where Martinez de la Rosa—Nicasio Gallego—Arriaza—Lista—Frias—Saavedra—Carnicero—Ruiz de la Vega—Tapia—Sabinon—Mora—Cambroncero—Alcala Galiano, with the multitude whose lesser lights shone brightly, in the atmosphere of constitutional freedom? But our traveller continues in the same strain. "Her Lope de Vega, her Calderon, Gongora, Garcilaso, Quevedo, her Aleman, are only known to Spain traditionally, or to the curious few, through a scarce collection of antique tomes. Hardly any of these authors are reprinted at the present day, and were it not for fear of a tumult among the Spaniards, nothing would prevent the censor from proscribing their beloved champion, Don Quixotte."

Now it is perfectly well known to those at all acquainted with the matter, that the Spanish classics, never rare, were reprinted in very great variety and excellent editions, during the last quarter of the past century, and that portion of the present which preceded Mr. Slidell's visit; more especially in and about the years 1812 and 1821, when the press was most active and unrestrained. So grossly is Mr. Slidell mistaken, as to the fact of his "antique tomes," that even in this country, we have the means of establishing his error. In the Library of Congress, there is a splendid copy of the works of Lope de Vega, in twenty-one volumes, royal octavo, printed in Madrid in 1776. In the same collection, is a series of the comedies of Calderon, in ten volumes, the several numbers of which were printed in the various principal cities of Spain, and at dates ranging from the middle to the close of the last century. Upon the table before us, there is now lying a copy of Garcilaso, elegantly printed at Madrid in 1788. By its side, are the works of Queredo, printed in the same city, in 1821. In company also is Quintana's collection of the best efforts of the national muse, in four volumes—Madrid 1817—containing the choice effusions of Gongora; and we doubt not that the Guzman de Alfarache, the great work of Aleman, is to be found in more than one American library, of an edition current in Spain in 1826. Our own limited collection presents us, in poetry alone, Juan de Mena, Madrid 1804—Fray Luis de Leon, Madrid 1816—Ercilla's Epic and the poems of Melendez, Madrid 1822. So much for books only known "traditionally," to the "curious few." As for Cervantes, so far was he from all risk of the censor, that in 1819, a new and admirable edition of the Quixotte, was published in Madrid, by the Royal Academy; and at the very time when our author was in Spain. Chateaubriand must have already commenced (though perhaps in exile) the preparation of his illustrated edition, which saw the light in Madrid, in 1833, and which has left nothing for the ingenuity and learning of future commentators.

In view of all these facts, we see considerable propriety in Mr. Slidell's conscious doubts of his own capacity, to give a critical opinion upon Spanish literature, or to weigh its merits with those of English writers. It seems strange however, that he should endeavor²⁵ to fortify his own conclusions by a concurrent letter from a "German friend," who seems, like himself, to have a greater fancy for general principles, than particular examples. Mr. Slidell however, enumerates the English writers, of whom he declares that he was unable to find any Spanish counterparts, and adds to the list, the name of Mr. Irving. Nor besides the limited study which Mr. Slidell had given to the Castilian language, previously to making this comparison, there are two things which strike us as somewhat remarkable therein. The first is, that in so short a time as that occupied by his visit, he should have been able, in the scarcity of books which he describes, to find classics enough for a fair parallel; and the other is the fact, that, at the very moment alluded to, Mr. Irving was in Madrid, drawing from a literature in which no "counterpart" to himself could be found—and from a work, just published, where literature was "actually dead"—the materials of a production, on which he rests his own claims to immortality!

While upon this branch of the subject, we will present two further illustrations. In the last edition of 'A Year in Spain,' we find the following assertion: "Spanish literature testifies to the national indifference to rural attractions. The catalogue of her poets contains no prototype to the name of Thompson, and the silly and sheepish pastorals of Cervantes, are the most eloquent proofs of the deficiency."²⁸

It is hard to tell what pastorals of Cervantes are here alluded to, (unless the Galatea); but it is certain, that to none of his poetry, did that great writer himself attach much importance. As to the general fact embraced in the remark, we have to ask, with surprise, whether Mr. Slidell could possibly have forgotten, that Garcilaso,²⁹ whom he himself refers to as classic, derives his highest reputation from his exquisite pastorals! Could he have heard of Montemayor, of Lope de Vega, of Valbuena,³⁰ of Gil Polo?³¹ Is it easy for him to find a single Spanish bard, of established reputation, who did not seek, from time to time, new and refreshing inspiration, from the flower and the greensward—from springtime and autumn? It was the peculiar trait of their muse in the sixteenth century, according to Mr. Hallam;³² not less so in the age which followed, and down to the rich pictures of rural beauty, which have been painted by Zorilla in our own day; it has continued a pervading spirit. Some of the highest efforts of Leon and Melendez were elevated and purified by its influence, and it has furnished to almost all, a refuge, in which they were safe from the persecution, to which a tyrannical government would have condemned the attempt to move in a bolder sphere.

The next task which devolves on us, is one of charity. In our last number, we rescued the historian Conde from the hands of the North American Review, which, of its own mere motion, had transformed him into a Frenchman. It is now for us to protest against the right of Mr. Slidell (with no canonical authority that we wot of), to clothe the same unfortunate and persecuted individual, in the habit of a "Jeromite monk."³⁴ According to the enumeration of his own titles, prefixed by Mr. Conde, to his "Domination of the Arabs in Spain,"³⁵ he was librarian and antiquarian of the Academy of History—a doctor of laws, and not of theology. He was a learned and able man, a diligent and faithful historian.³⁶ His premature death, in 1820, after the first volume of his work had just gone through the press, was a heavy loss to his country and to literature. After the good services which he rendered while living, he would seem to deserve a little repose in his grave. It is fortunate indeed for him, that he has passed away. A few more travellers—a few more reviewers, would soon effectually disguise him from himself.

From the literature we pass with Mr. Slidell to the universities of Spain, and to the state of public education. His conclusion is, of course, a round one. "The Spaniards, as a people, are ignorant—supremely ignorant."³⁷ The blame of such a state of things is next thrown on the clergy, who likewise have a section devoted to their benefit. We are not anxious to provoke any of the odium theologicum, which would inevitably follow any discussion, involving the delicate question of clerical purity and intelligence. We will only remark, that in the "Discussions on the Inquisition,"³⁸ which took place in the Cortes of 1812 and 1813, and to which we referred in our last number, the efforts of many of the clergy who participated, were conspicuous, not only for erudition, logic and elegance, but for the most liberal and expanded sentiments.* As an act too of justice, and somewhat germane to the subject, as illustrating our traveller's spirit, we will here apologize for having, in our last, given credit to Mr. Goodrich, for what was in reality a merit of Mr. Slidell's. We mean the introduction to the American public, of "the glorious martyr, San Poncio, advocate and protector against bed-bugs." In his first edition, our traveller omitted this good saint, by some extraordinary oversight; but, no doubt, deeming the mention of his existence very important in conveying a proper "notion" of Spanish character and manners—besides being somewhat "picturesque and peculiar"—he produced him in his more elaborate publication.³⁹ We trust that the "glorious martyr" will not be unmindful of this good turn, but will ever hover the guardian spirit of our author's "bug"-less bed, whispering Titania's

"Music—such as charmeth sleep."

To the evil of general ignorance, Mr. Slidell sees no remedy, save the influence of "free, happy and enlightened France."⁴⁰ We are not here, in the face of history, to deny that Spain, at the moment of Mr. Slidell's visit, was in a state of deep and melancholy despotism. The constitution had, not long before, been broken down by the assistance of the Duc D'Angoulême—the champion of legitimacy and ignorance—the stone given by “free, happy and enlightened France,” to a sister nation, calling for the bread of similar happiness, freedom and cultivation. The institutions of civilized improvement having been removed—absolute powers, tremendous in reaction, had almost annihilated every thing but hope. It is not however to be inferred, that because King Ferdinand had fettered men's tongues and hands, he had likewise paralyzed every thought and feeling. Despotic edicts cannot make men unlearn what they know. It is one thing to enforce silence: another, to take away the faculty of speech. If we look at the outbreak of the Spanish mind, during the two intervals of constitutional rule, the activity of the press, the political movement, the philosophical examination of the old system, and the arguments adduced in support of the new, we shall soon convince ourselves that a spirit was then abroad, totally irreconcilable with the supreme ignorance predicated above.⁴¹ In the discussions of the Cortes of 1812, which were published in twenty-three volumes, evidence will be found, to satisfy the most skeptical, as to the existence of a class, whose sentiments, acquirements and ability, would be honorable to any people.

In the thorough reform which followed the death of Ferdinand in 1833, and which has gone on, widening the sphere of literature and freedom, as well as of the arts and sciences, to a degree which those who have not examined the subject will hardly believe—there is every demonstration, that the leaven which once existed, continued to work, actively though noiselessly, through the interval of tyrannical dominion. The sudden expansion of every department of knowledge—the establishment of presses and the swarm of publications—the universal development of energy and thought, in the midst of a devastating civil war—must all have required the agency of men of cultivated minds, stimulated and sustained by congeniality among the mass. Whence then did these men spring at so brief a summons? There is no legend, even in legendary Spain, that they came down from the clouds, when Ferdinand, according to the charitable but doubtful assertion of the royal bulletin, ascended to the regions above them. Who were their teachers? Where did they find, among their “antique tomes,” the materials for so rapid and complete a revolution? A slight review of historical facts, will enable us to answer these questions.

Down to the year 1767, when the Jesuits were expelled from Spain, they had the general control of education. That their system was a wise and liberal one, we have the subsequent testimony of Mr. Slidell himself to prove. In “Spain Revisited,”⁴² he calls them “the most enlightened of Spanish clergymen,” and laments the probable misfortune of their second expulsion. In the absence too of any such admission, the history of that celebrated order, everywhere, demonstrates, that in the matter of the diffusion of learning, there was, with them, no want of industry, ability and success. Their political influence may be a matter of discussion, but there is no one who will assert that the atmosphere which was around their institutions could be that of “supreme ignorance.” Upon their expulsion, and towards the close of his reign, Charles III, surrounded by able ministers and counsellors, gave a new impulse to public instruction. From these enlightened men, he learned the errors which had crept into the preceding system, and endeavored to counteract its too scholastic and abstract tendency.⁴³ Campomanes, Jovellanos and Cadalso, lent him their suggestions and assistance.* Institutes and academies were established for the purpose of popularizing knowledge. The lesser universities were discarded as nests of subtle and disputations frivolity—while in their stead, primary schools, and seminaries for more advanced instruction, were scattered through the kingdom.⁴⁴ The care which had been so long monopolized by the higher and less available branches, was now more usefully devoted to the dissemination of scientific and practical information. The institute of Oviedo, established by Jovellanos and others, produced the two Arguelles and the Count of Toreno, with many more who made themselves prominent during the troubled movements to which we have heretofore referred. To Toreno, we owe a masterly history of the invasion of Napoleon, and the wars and revolutions consequent thereupon.⁴⁵ To Canga Arguelles, his country is indebted for a defence against the misrepresentations of English historians, upon the same subject,⁴⁶ as well as for various other political and economical productions. Agustin Arguelles was regarded as the Cicero of the Cortes of 1812 and 1822⁴⁷—has subsequently distinguished himself by his written efforts, and is now the guardian of the infant Queen. All of these gentlemen are yet living to attest the excellence of the system, which fitted them to tread their several walks with honor.

The reign of Charles IV, as it brought little of glory or of benefit to the Spanish people, in any way, preserved its consistency, by doing nothing for the cause of education. The establishments of his predecessor, continued however to exercise an extensive and profitable influence—although great neglect was shown to the primary schools.⁴⁰ Notwithstanding this depression, the education of many who figured in the Cortes of 1820, and who are now prominent, belonged to this era. The invasion of Napoleon of course threw all things in confusion; but we find that public instruction was the first care of the constitutionalists in 1812. The committee by whom the Constitution was reported, accompanied it by a preliminary discourse, in which its complicated variety of subjects, and all the difficulties which surrounded the task, are set forth and analyzed, with views so liberal and statesman-like, that the document will bear a favorable comparison with the best state-papers of its day. Among the ends to be gained by the Constitution, they enumerate the extension of education, and enlarge upon the benefits to arise from a comprehensive system, in which a strict supervision was to be kept over the morals and fitness of the instructors, and a liberal support to be given to those who might occupy so responsible a situation.⁴¹ Accordingly, the ninth Title of the Constitution is "Of Public Instruction;" and provision is therein made for the establishment of a general Directory of Studies, and a uniform system of education throughout the kingdom. Primary schools were directed in all the towns of the monarchy. From these, the system passed through intermediate institutions up to universities—all to be subject to the control of the Cortes, and all to be placed on the same footing, of visitation and inspection. In all, it was made obligatory, to instil a knowledge of the principles of freedom and the constitution, jointly with the lore of the past, and the discoveries of science and the arts.

The short duration of constitutional rule, in 1812, prevented this plan from being realized; but in 1820 it went into operation, with the veteran biographer, poet and statesman, Don Manuel Josef Quintana, at its head.⁴² The wants of the nation were then actively investigated, and the remedy applied with so much energy, that at the end of twenty months, three-fourths of the people had been supplied with primary schools, commodious buildings, and capable instructors. Poor children were admitted gratuitously; and it was made the duty of every parent, under a penalty, to have his offspring thus instructed. The universities were reorganized, and a central university and a polytechnic school were established in Madrid. The medical colleges were placed on a new footing; in fine, an impulse was given to every department of learning, while over all were extended the zealous care of the constituted authorities, and the wings of a liberated press. Crowds of youth rushed to the fountains of improvement. The whole intellect of the nation and its promise were up, and burning with enthusiasm.⁴³ A bright light seemed to gild the whole soil, which for so many years had been stained with blood, and darkened by oppression. Suddenly that light went out. Despotism, unable to triumph of itself, sought elsewhere the elements of success, and found them among the "free, happy, and enlightened." Properly indeed, but sadly, is it remarked by the writer, from whom we have collected some of these details—"This noble system, the Spaniards had the honor of forming; to others belongs the responsibility of its overthrow."⁴⁴

Upon the downfall of the Constitution, in 1823, not only the subjects but the modes of instruction were changed. A new system, suited to the principles of the government,⁴⁵ was adopted; and although primary schools were not actually abolished, they were so scantily supplied with support⁴⁶ that few of them lingered long. The universities returned, once more, to those unprofitable studies, in which despotism is always willing that the intellect of those whom it oppresses, shall waste its strength and freshness.

It seems to us that the brief historical review which we have taken, must negative, to a candid mind, the extreme conclusions which Mr. Slidell has promulgated. It is impossible that a nation—agitated for more than a quarter of a century by great political and moral revolutions—with systems of education, such as we have described, for so much longer time abroad among its people—with the popular mind, attracted by so many causes, to a knowledge of these systems—with so many evidences of deep thought upon government and political science—it is, we submit, impossible that such a nation could have relapsed, in three years, into the state of supreme and degraded ignorance, which Mr. Slidell has described. It is too, very questionable whether the land would have been nearer to redemption, had Mr. Slidell been chosen for its political guide. In his first edition,⁴⁷ he seemed to think that the prostration of the clergy, and the quiet influence of French vicinity, would work out the regeneration to which the Constitution had been inadequate. In that of 1836,⁴⁸ he brings himself to the widely different conclusion, that "a despotism under clerical influence," was the only settled form of government then practicable, or likely to be so for years to come. Under such a government, headed by Don Carlos, he concludes that Spain would find her surest path to improvement and peace. Recent events do seem to have falsified this prophecy. The popularity which was supposed to belong to Don Carlos, but which was, in effect, the zealous love of the Northern Provinces for their fueros or privileges, of which they imagined him to be the friend—that popularity has passed away. New ideas have triumphed. Don Carlos is an exile; and, after so many years of bloodshed and of misery, during which he was ever unable to possess himself of a single fortified city, it cannot be much feared that the people will willingly return to the ancient order of despotism, and encounter again therefor, the sacrifices which have cost them so many tears of bitterness already. The truth is, that the old generation, to whom ignorance and slavery were a habit, have now nearly all been buried. The people of this day, are the children of this century, and of its movements and opinions. Under the regency of the soldier of fortune, who has gathered the reins of government in his strong hand, and who yet wears honorably the temporary crown which he won by good service, they find that the energies of their country have come forth. They see an undivided and a manly front presented to the world—they feel a protecting arm stretched over their domestic prosperity. If the rule be as yet a stern one, it is because sternness is needed—but, in the multitude of able men and tried patriots, whom Espartero has gathered around him, and who cling to his government as their salvation, the people have found a security and a pledge, which are fast removing all doubts from their minds. Spain, it is true, may yet be considered as unsettled in her destiny—but though she waver from the line, she cannot leave it altogether. There is a point beyond which nations must pass, before they can be sure of their stability; that once gained, they will find it harder to retrograde than to advance. If the liberal powers of Europe, instead of vexing the new government with childish disputes and embarrassing intrigue, would give it an honest, sympathetic support, or allow it to flourish of itself, they would act, even as to their own interests, with a wisdom which seems now to be foreign to their councils. In the coming and not far distant contest, which is to shake the foundations of Europe, it needs no cunning discernment, to foresee that the Spanish Peninsula may be an agent, mighty for weal or for woe. Her fruitful soil—her innumerable resources—cultivated and developed by industry and enterprise, and all tending to heighten and strengthen the established constancy of her people—would make her, under the guidance of free institutions, a precious ally, and a formidable foe. France, Spain and England united, would be irresistible. Let her, on the contrary, be crippled by jealousy—wounded by reproach, and broken by strife—with her energies wasted, her intellect darkened, her fountains dried up—and there would pour into her territories, hordes that would make her a Russia of the South, a nucleus of triumph for the enemies of man. It was with a view to this, that Carlos, without any revenue but pillage, was sustained, by foreign but secret aid, for so many years. It is for this that his downfall should be hailed, as a triumph, far more important than the mere overthrow of a bad dynasty by a single people.

Before we take leave of Mr. Slidell, it may be as well to mention that the "Year in Spain" was suppressed in that country by royal order, and the reëntrance of the author into the kingdom expressly forbidden. Now we are very far from supposing that this movement of his Majesty was prompted by any of the objections which the work presents to ourselves. We rather imagine that the censure of Ferdinand himself and his disgraceful rule, procured for Mr. Slidell the honor of being invited to remain beyond the frontier. It is needless to say that in this part of his views, Mr. Slidell and ourselves have no difference of opinion. We cannot however avoid thinking, that the King was right in deeming the book not over well-digested; and there is a tone in Mr. Slidell's reference to the order,* which half inclines us to believe that he himself did not feel disposed altogether to deny it. In spite of this effusion of royal indignation, so very childishly put forth, Mr. Slidell did visit the kingdom again in 1834; and to that visit we owe two more very pleasant and popular volumes, in which the author appears anxious to atone for his abuse of despotism, by extending a profusion of similar compliments to the then liberal party. From the tone of this work, which is altogether sketchy, and which contains the substance of a short ramble to and from Madrid, through some of the northern provinces, we cannot fail to see that it contains the material of the political reflections attached to the new edition of the old work, and to which we have heretofore extended our notice. In "Spain Revisited," the reader will find the "picturesque and peculiar"—the "eccentricities and absurdities," plentifully and graphically described. Like the great master of fable, the author makes little distinction between men and beasts, if they will subserve his purpose. Mules and their muleteers—pigs, donkeys and innkeepers, fill, in their respective turns, equally prominent places in his pictures. In no place does the narrative languish for want of poignancy, or the illustration grow dull from the absence of caricature. Yet with all this, who shall quarrel! The jokes and the stories, the adventures of men and animals, are not made loops whereon to hang profound political disquisitions, or moral apophthegms. The work professes to amuse, not to instruct. In the very dedication to his estimable friend and brother officer, Lieut. Upshur, the author puts us on our guard, by contrasting, with his own habit of lingering on their travel, "to join in idle gossip with peasant or muleteer," his companion's graver devotion to scientific and philosophical observation. Thus forewarned, we ook for gossip only, and we find it. We have the written conversation of a clever, ready man, whose imagination is not too conscientious, nor his temper too severe "to set the table on a roar"—and who has been so willing to see and hear wonders, that he has provoked other folk's desire to gratify his curiosity. We rise from the perusal of such a book, not much edified to be sure, but still grateful for an hour of lively intellectual pastime. Our rarer feelings are not disappointed, for they were not enlisted; and if we find sins to condemn, they are of omission, not of perpetration. If we are not enlightened, neither are we misled; and so in point of usefulness, we place the lighter volume above its more pretending, but more mistaken fellow.

We could have wished that Mr. Slidell had enjoyed opportunities of time, labor and observation, which would have enabled him to do justice to himself and his subject. Familiarized with the Spanish people, their language and institutions—devoted assiduously to the depths and not the surface of observation, he might have produced a work, which would not have flitted by, like a butterfly, gay, brilliant and summer-lived. With talents which few can command—with fancy and humor and poetry enough in his composition, he might have made the field his own, and himself the Prescott of American scribe-errantry. For Spain's sake, we could have wished that his book had been more stupid or less erroneous. In either case, it would have saved us the task of accumulating evidences of superficial "testimony," against one to whom we have been indebted for much entertainment, and whose literary merit has not been overshadowed, in our minds, by his failure to discharge the duties of an impartial guide to public opinion.

ODE TO CHESAPEAKE BAY.

BY SEBA SMITH.

Thou Ocean Bay!
Though now with sails unfurl'd,
Collecting from the mighty deep,
Over thy curling waters sweep
The fleets of half the world;
There was a day,
Nor distant far the time,
When in thy solitude sublime,
Save light canoe by artless savage plied,
No sail was ever seen to skim thy billowy tide.

Bright Chesapeake—
Though now thy shores are crown'd
With grassy lawns and fields of grain,
That smile and cheer the laboring swain,
And songs go blithely round,
That well bespeak
How peasant joys may flow;
Yet two short centuries ago

No human voice was here, save savage yell,
And dark upon thy wave the forest shadows fell.

Mother of waters—
Thy noble streams did glide
Beneath a woody canopy,
Through countless years; and bright and free,
And lovely by thy side,
As beauteous daughters,
They lift their voice on high,
And clap their hands as they go by
Proud Baltimore's rich monuments and domes,
Columbia's palace-halls, and Richmond's patriot homes.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART VI.

Election of L'Isle Adam as Grand-Master; Siege of Rhodes; Expulsion of the Order from Rhodes; Cession of Malta, Gozo and Tripoli, as a residence for the Knights; Death of Pope Clement; History of the English Reformation; Death of L'Isle Adam.

Villiers De L'Isle Adam, the last of the Grand-Masters at Rhodes, and the first at Malta, was the forty-second who had risen to that dignity since the establishment of the Order. On the decease of Fabricio Cabretto, in 1521, three Knights were named to fill the vacancy, Andrew D'Amaral of Castile, Sir Thomas Docray of England, and L'Isle Adam of France. The first received but a trifling support; for he had rendered himself unpopular by his austere character and overbearing conduct to his brother monks. After a few ballotings, the name of D'Amaral was dropt; and there remained only two candidates for the vacant throne. L'Isle Adam succeeded in his election by the great preponderance of French interest. Historians allow he had only a strong mind to recommend him; while the Englishman had at his command a princely fortune, was of good natural abilities, and well skilled in diplomacy.

As one of the first questions asked, may be, by whom was the Order of "St. John" established, and for what purpose? I trust I may be excused for this digression, while I give a brief account of the Knights in 1099, the time when the foundation of the Order was laid at Jerusalem by the pious Gerard. Never could this worthy individual have thought, when he was collecting a few friends in his own humble dwelling for the purpose of charity, that he should be called the founder of an institution, the power of which was destined to make the Sultan quake on his throne; and wherein all the Princes of Europe would seek to enter.

Gerard and his companions, becoming more and more pious, and desirous of being known as a religious body, asked of the Pope a "regular habit." Their request was granted; that of St. Augustin being given, on condition that each one of the members should make a vow before the Patriarch of Jerusalem, of chastity, obedience, and poverty. From this period the society came under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of him who was at the head of the papal church, and was called the "Hospitaller Brothers of St. John the Baptist, of Jerusalem."

At the decease of Gerard, Raimond Dupuis was appointed to succeed him. It was during his administration that the Hospitallers were permitted by the Pope to wear arms; from this circumstance they became a military order. It oftentimes occurred, after a poor and sick Christian had been cured of his illness, and relieved from his poverty, that he was, while on his way from Jerusalem to some port on the coast, to seek passage for Europe, fallen upon by the Infidels, robbed and murdered. It was for the protection of these wandering followers of Christ, that the patriarch in person armed these monks to accompany them on their route, and safely see them to some haven, from which they might embark for their homes. Charity was the corner-stone of the Order of St. John, while chastity, religion, and obedience to the Pope, were its main pillars.

L'Isle Adam, who chanced to be in France at the time he received information of his election as Grand-Master, made speedy arrangements for his departure for Rhodes. Hardly had the ship on which he took passage from Marseilles, left the gulf of Lyons, ere, by the carelessness of one of the crew, she took fire, and was much injured. It was only owing to the firmness of L'Isle Adam that she was not entirely destroyed; he threatening to kill the first man who should leave his post, to seek safety by taking to the boats. This danger being overcome, the "great carrack" was overtaken by a heavy storm, and struck by lightning; the thunderbolt fell on her stern, killed nine men, and "shivered the Grand-Master's sword to pieces in its scabbard." Putting into Syracuse, where he refitted his ship, he made sail for Rhodes, notwithstanding he was made aware, that the noted Infidel corsair, Costoglu, was laying off St. Angelo, a headland of Sicily, with a superior force, to attack him. Doubling the cape at night, it being thick weather and stormy, he escaped from his enemy, and arrived at the port of his destination, to the great joy of the Knights, who met him on the Marina at his landing; and with music and a military guard accompanied him to the palace, which had been prepared for his reception.

Costoglu, on hearing of the safe arrival of the Grand-Master at Rhodes, immediately repaired with his squadron to cruise in the vicinity of that island. He was fortunate in making many prizes before it was known by the Rhodians what had become of their vessels and of the Grecian crews who navigated them. This corsair bore towards the Order a deadly hatred; and with some cause: his two elder brothers had been recently slain in a naval engagement with a Rhodian ship, while the younger still remained as a prisoner in chains among his enemies. In those days no mercy was shown to the vanquished; and if a prisoner's life was spared by the victors, it was only that he might suffer the more before the day should arrive for his execution.

At the close of August, 1521, the Sultan, Solyman IV., returned to Constantinople in triumph, having routed the army of the Hungarian King, and taken Belgrade, their capital, which he left garrisoned with his Albanian soldiers. Costoglu, arriving at the same time, when the Sultan was flushed by his conquests, took the opportunity to make mention of an attack on Rhodes. This suggestion was ably seconded by Mustapha Pasha, who was a distinguished warrior, had married the sister of Solyman, and was a great favorite with the Turkish troops. The Sultan, after a little hesitation, referred the subject to the Divan, which it appears was divided as to the propriety of the enterprise. Not much valuing the opinion of his counsellors, he was induced to write to L'Isle Adam a note, couched in the following terms:

"Solyman, by the Grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Most High Emperor of Byzantium and Trebisonde, Most Mighty King of Persia, Arabia, Syria and Egypt, Supreme Lord of Europe and Asia, Prince of Mecca and Aleppo, Master of Jerusalem, and Ruler of the Universal Sea—To Philip Villiers, L'Isle Adam, greeting:

"We congratulate thee on thy new dignity, and thy arrival in thy dominions. Mayest thou reign there long and happily, and obscure the glory of thy predecessors! We offer thee our friendship, and entreat thee not to be the last of our allies to give us joy for our triumphs over the Hungarian King, whom we have stripped of the strong fortress of Belgrade, after having wasted his territories with fire and sword, and carried away many of his people. From Constantinople; farewell."

L'Isle Adam well understood the hidden threat contained in this communication. With the consent of the Order, he sent an answer by a Greek messenger—fearing to trust a Knight in the presence of Solyman, when the news carried by him might tend rather to excite than pacify his irritable feelings, suffering, as the Sultan doubtless did, by the recollection of defeats, which his grandfather had met with before the bastions of these same warring monks.

After-actions made it evident that the Grand-Master was not wrong in his conjectures. Whenever the Turks were desirous of communicating with the Order, they were accustomed to kindle fires on the Lycian hills. On one occasion, when these were observed, Menneton, a French Knight, was despatched in a well armed galley, taking with him an interpreter who was acquainted with the people with whom he was to have communication. Nearing the shore, a number of Turks were seen seated on the earth, with their goods, which they were wont to barter with the Christian merchants, spread out before them. Xaycus, a paymaster in the service of the Order, was appointed to land on this occasion. This service he most willingly undertook, recognizing many of his acquaintances in the group before him. Menneton, having some fear of treachery, would not permit the Rhodian to leave, until a hostage was sent on board his galley, as a pledge for his safe return. The Turks, laughing at his fears, agreed not only to send one of their companions, but also all their goods with him; which being done, Xaycus landed.

Hardly was he on shore, before he was seized, made prisoner, and taken to Constantinople. Arriving at that capital, he was made to endure the most cruel tortures; and in his agony, he gave all the information which the minions of the Sultan desired, as to the number of the Knights, the strength of their garrisons, the state of their fortifications, and the feelings of the Rhodian people. It is thought that, by his confessions, the Sultan was induced immediately to declare war. He made his intentions known by a letter to the Grand-Master, from his own hands, in which he demanded that he should either entirely surrender his strong holds and retire from Rhodes, or retain his possessions by acknowledging fealty to him. To neither of these propositions would the Order consent; and as the Knights varied in their opinions, as to the best answer which should be given to this demand, some preferring policy and peace, while others wished, by defiance, to produce a war;—it was at last determined by L'Isle Adam to give no answer at all; which affront so enraged the Sultan, as to cause him to say, that the Knights had brought their destruction on their own heads; that he would immolate them, one by one, at their own guns, and so completely overthrow their fortifications, that not one stone should be found upon another.

L'Isle Adam had hardly been in command one year, before he was called upon to defend his Order, and their possessions, against an army of nearly two hundred thousand men; and at a time too, when his force consisted only of six hundred Knights, five hundred Cretan archers, and some four thousand Grecian soldiers. The Rhodians generally were not to be trusted; they cared not by whom they were governed, could they only succeed in retaining their property: in their nature, they were cowards; and in their language, braggarts. The character of the soldiers in the service of the Order was totally different: though natives of the island, yet they had been continually exposed to danger. During the siege, they proved themselves, by their conduct, brave and efficient troops, willingly repairing to all posts of danger, where their duty called them, and defending the same to the utmost. At the close of June, 1522, two hundred sail of Turkish ships were seen from the tower of St. Stephens, making for the harbor of Rhodes. They failed, however, in their attempt to enter the port, owing to the warm reception they met with from the forts which guarded its entrance.

By the command of the Admiral of Callipolis, the fleet bore away for the small anchorage of Bo, which, with a favorable westerly breeze, they soon entered, it being but three miles distant from the city. For the fortnight, during which Mustapha Pasha was employed in landing his artillery and ammunitions of war, the Rhodians were not idle: the bastions were repaired; the ditches deepened; and all the fortifications placed in as good defence, as their time and means would permit: no hand was so aged, no rank so exalted, as to be exempt from the meanest of these labors.

At length the sad moment arrived, when the first shot from a Turkish battery, told to the weeping mothers, who had fled to the city for protection, that their sufferings had commenced. The Knights of each language, had their leaders appointed by the Grand-Master; all were men of tried courage, who had, in other days, signalized themselves, while defending their flag, both at sea and on land, against the attacks of their turbaned enemies. Mustapha Pasha had brought with him from Constantinople some thirty thousand slaves from the forests of Belgrade and Hungary—whenever a redoubt was to be thrown up within the range of the Rhodian batteries, these poor, half clad and unprotected wretches, were pushed forward to execute the work; each sally from the garrison, each discharge from the fortifications, furnished hundreds of these “Dacian boors” a grave in the very trenches they themselves were digging. The Turkish general cared not how many of these people he sacrificed, were his work but executed.

The city of Rhodes was situated on a plain; and save at the north, where it was bounded by the harbor, it was exposed on all sides to an attack. The natural position of the place could have hardly been more unfortunate; the besieging army being so numerous, and the besieged so few, and consequently so scattered. It repeatedly occurred during the siege that when the Turks had effected a breach in any of the fortifications, the Knights were compelled to leave their own quarters, from which they might have done much execution, and fly to the assistance of their friends; indeed, when the English bastion was blown up, and the Janizaries had made a footing upon its ruins, L'Isle Adam was obliged to advance in person with his body guard, carrying the ensign of the Order. Here it was, that, hand to hand, the fight was maintained for three hours. The Turks did not retreat until they had left upwards of two thousand of their comrades dead on the platform of this single bastion.

It cannot be supposed, that in an engagement where so many of their enemies fell, the Order should have altogether escaped. Many Knights were killed; and among the most distinguished, was the standard-bearer, Joachimus Cluys, who lost both of his eyes by a shot, and shortly after died.

Mustapha Pasha, mortified at his defeat, resolved to make another attempt to carry the English bastion, supposing it to be the only quarter by which his soldiers would have a chance of entering the city. Achimetes was, at the same moment, to cannonade the Spanish wall—which had already been well battered; and which, he hoped, would easily fall, and afford a second entrance for the Turkish army. The Turks came bravely to the assault. They fought for hours with the most determined courage and resolution. For a long time, the result of the conflict was doubtful; and the battle, at last, was only won by the desperate resistance of the Greeks, sustained by the bravery of their commanders. The Sultan, when he had seen his soldiers thrice defeated, and with great slaughter, advanced in front of the army, and addressed them as follows:

"I myself am fully resolved here to conquer, or end my days. If I depart from my resolution, let my head, my fleet, my army, and my empire, be ever accursed, and unfortunate."

Solyman then called his captains around him, and ordered them to encourage the soldiers of their several companies, giving them to understand, that Rhodes was the "castle, store-house, treasury, of all such as trouble the Turks by sea;" and that, by destroying this one place, they had the way open before them to enter all the dominions of the Christians, and to have their revenge for their murdered brothers.

On the 24th September, the Sultan ordered a general attack to be made on those five fortifications, which were defended by the English, Spanish, Narbonenses, Avignons, and Italian Knights. The Janizaries advanced with a horrible cry, to enter the breaches, which had been made in the previous conflicts, whilst the Rhodians poured down upon them, as they approached, scalding oil and boiling pitch; which, "as it fell, stuck fast," and so sorely wounded the besiegers, that they were glad to throw down their arms and retreat to the rear, where they might find assistance to remove their clothes, and be in a measure relieved of their horrible pains.

About this juncture, a Jewish physician was discovered in an attempt to give information to the Turks. Having acknowledged his crime, he suffered an ignominious death. Foul suspicion of the same nature, soon fastened itself upon a nobler victim, one who, the reader might think, would have been the last to be branded with the title of a traitor. The Chancellor D'Amaral, whom we have before named, as having been the candidate for the Grand-Mastership, was the person suspected. The only proof against him, was the confession of his servant Diaz, given on the rack, and the statement of a Greek priest, who had, on one occasion, seen the Knight and his attendant on a bastion, with a crossbow and an arrow, to which a paper was affixed; and which, it appeared to him, they were desirous of throwing into the Mahomedan camp. This Knight when tortured, repelled the accusation with scorn—and stated, that after his long period of forty years of faithful services to the Order no bodily pangs would ever force him to say that he was guilty of so base a crime. D'Amaral and his servant were condemned to death—and both, as it is generally thought, unjustly. The monk was stripped of his habit and then decapitated, while Diaz suffered by the hands of the hangman.

After a lapse of a short period, Solyman, having witnessed the fight from a distance, and seeing there was no chance of being victorious, ordered retreat. During this conflict, the bastions of England, Italy and Spain, had been several times taken and retaken; alternately was seen the flag of the Infidel and of the cross waving over the walls as either party got possession. The Sultan, enraged at these continual defeats, ordered the Turkish General, Mustapha Pasha, to be executed: he having advised the attack on Rhodes, and failed in his promise to take the city. Pyrrhus Pasha, who was a great friend of the General, hearing he was condemned to die, sought the Sultan, and begged his life. For this interference, he was sentenced to suffer the same punishment; which would certainly have been carried into effect, had not all the councillors of Solyman, seeing the danger of these two noble personages, unanimously on their knees craved their pardon. The Sultan granted their request, ostensibly, unto Mustapha, because one of his wives had Ottoman blood running in her veins—being his natural sister; and to Pyrrhus, for his great age and wisdom in legislation.

Solyman determined not to leave the island until he had subdued the city; and to make his determination known to the Grand-Master, he ordered a castle to be built for his residence on Mount Pilermus. The Sultan, after a six months' siege during which he lost one hundred and sixty thousand men, appeared not so desirous of exposing his men to danger; and in this, the last hour as it were of the conflict, sought, by bribery, to obtain possession of the city. Failing in this first attempt to bribe the sentinels, he appointed Monilio, a Genoese who was in the Turkish army, to carry letters to L'Isle Adam, asking a surrender of the place; and adding, should this be done, that he would be permitted to name the terms of capitulation.

The Grand-Master would not listen to the proposition, preferring death to a surrender of his position. The Rhodians, however, when they heard that Solyman was willing to treat for the place, and fearing that should his offer be refused, and their city be taken in fight, their wives and daughters would be exposed to slavery, and they themselves to death, sent a deputation to L'Isle Adam, requesting him to make the best terms he could with the Sultan, as they were weary of fight, and grieving for the death of those who had met a fate, which, should they continue in arms, might shortly be their own.

L'Isle Adam, even with this request from the Rhodians, would not think of a capitulation, until most of the members of the Order had recommended the measure—not so much, as they said, to save their own lives; but to preserve the maidens, and mothers of Rhodes from violation and slavery.

From the report of Martinigo, the chief engineer, and the Grand-Prior of St. Giles, it was evident that the place could no longer be defended. The Turks had possession of a portion of the city; the flower of the Rhodian forces had perished; in addition to which, they had but little ammunition, and less food; and would at last be compelled to surrender, even should they maintain their ground from street to street, and as they retreated make every house a bulwark of defence.

THE CHILD OF HEAVEN:

A Counterpart to Hon. Mrs. Norton's "Child of Earth."

BY MISS HARRIET M. JENES.

"I thank thee, blessed God, for these rich gifts
Whereby my spirit unto Thee is drawn!
I thank Thee, that the loveliness of earth
Higher than earth can raise me! Are not these
But germs of things unperishing, that bloom
Beside th' immortal streams? Shall I not find
The lily of the field, the Saviour's flower,
In the serene and ever balmy air,
In the clear starry light of angel eyes,
A thousand-fold more glorious?"—Hemans.

Grateful in health, her young step treads the earth,
And Heaven, around her path, its light hath thrown,
Yet, saith she, "Father, where the stars have birth,
I am prepared to go!—make me thine own!
Now 'mid the joyousness of opening spring,
My soul is gushing with a grateful love;
Now the young birds amid the forest sing,
And with their lays, my full heart soars above.
Hear me, O! Father!—are my duties done?—
I am prepared to go,—make me thine own!"

Summer, with beauteous sweets, the spring, supplants;
Thro' woodland paths the Child of Heaven doth roam;
Her voice ascends from mid her cherished haunts;—
"These are but shadows of my Heavenly home.
Now, while my every sense is filled with Thee,
And beauty glows in tender summer time;
And the low murmur of the rolling sea,
Tunefully soothes me with its lulling chime;
Senseless and endless Lord! Thou holy One!
Take me to dwell near Thee,—make me thine own!"

Earth's summer glories fleetly pass away,
And autumn's sun, the waving corn doth gild;
While brilliantly the colored leaves display
The gorgeous decking of the forest wild.
And merrily at morn the reaper sings,
Binds the full sheaf, and whistles oft in glee;—
Floating 'mid air a thousand fluttering wings,
Chaunt a farewell in richest melody.
The Child of Heaven doth gaze abroad and say,
"For Thee my spirit pants,—call me away!"

The tow'ring pine upon the mountain shakes;
And howling 'round, the wintry wind doth moan;
The skies are veil'd with the light, falling flakes,
That gently fill the winding wood-paths lone,
Where the still moonbeam slept. "O, pleasantly
My little brothers frolic at my feet,
Or kneel with me at even-tide to pray,
And the loved voices of our home are sweet;
If so to Thee, it seemeth good,—I stay;
Yet would I rather be where living waters play!"

Again returns, the gladsome hudding spring!
Amid the green, the streamlet wanders free;
The sprightly wood-bird dallies on its wing,—
The Child of Heaven doth brighter glories see!—
Thee, never more, discordant notes shall pain;
And where the twilight stars dim not at day,
Sweet spirit-voices from their blest domain,
Shall gently whisper,—“Sister, come away!
Thy work, the Father saith, hath well been done,
And Heaven is now eternally thine own!”

—Such the destiny of all on Earth,
So flourishes and fades majestic Man. Beattie.

I love to visit, occasionally, the place where
"Earth's highest honors end, in 'here he lies'
—;" and from amid the broken memorials of the past, to trace the record—half effaced by the mouldering finger of time—of those who in past ages, trod, as we now do, the shores of time, and had the same hopes, the same aspirations, the same joys, and the same sorrows, that alternately possess our bosoms.

The subject, it is true, is trite. A Young has moralized above the grave of treasured and departed worth,—a Hervey has meditated among the tombs; and the solemn spot, where sleep the loved and the lost, has waked many a touching elegy, or suggested the lofty rhyme of inspired bards. Trite as it may seem—and it is as trite as DEATH itself; still, it may, as a subject for contemplation, be not altogether unprofitable.

These reflections have been suggested by a visit, which was recently made with a young friend from Massachusetts, to "Middle Church," situated in Middlesex county, Virginia, about three miles from the county seat, Urbana.

More than a century, yea, near two centuries have passed since the ringing of the mason's trowel, broke the stillness of the surrounding forest, when the walls of this temple of the living God rose like a flower in the wilderness of Middlesex, and invited the wayfarer to its sacred precincts. More than half a century has gone by, since last the solemn organ pealed forth its sublime symphonies, and the anthems of the choir told upon the feelings of rapt worshippers,—now the church is a desolate ruin; and the choir, and the worshippers—where are they? There is scarcely a vestige of the interior left; the pulpit, the tablets, the altar, the chancel, the —, all gone! The house is roofless, windowless. The walls alone are standing. The walls surrounding the spot constituting the church-yard, are in ruins too, portions only, remaining to mark their boundaries. The tombs are nearly all in a dilapidated condition; but of many, there is enough left to mark them as having been monuments of the most exquisite sculpture.

I have loved to visit the church-yard,—the village church-yard—in the beautiful month of May, or in “leafy June”—when the flowers smell sweetly, and the grass waves luxuriantly, and the cool breezes play among the green leaves of the forest,—when here and there the daisy spots the little grave of some gentle child, whose life was like the existence of the flower that nestles amid the grass above its little resting place—briefly sweet,—when even the eulogy seemed not so very formal in its studied phraseology, upon the tall monument, (for there is aristocracy sometimes even in a village, and they will carry it even to the grave with them,) and the white marble glittered not so coldly in the sunlight, and here and there some bright winged bird would perch upon a tomb, and plume its pinion in the balmy breeze.

I have loved these things, I say, and the church-yard did not seem the gloomy place to me, that I had heard others say it did to them. But the visit to “Middle Church” was characterized by no such soothing and inviting circumstances. The day was cold and rainy, and the wind howled mournfully through the leafless branches of the trees that surrounded the spot.

The young friend who accompanied me, (and who, by the way, bids fair one day, with perseverance in the divine art of painting, to make some noise in the world,) assisted me in decyphering the inscriptions, a few of which I now furnish for the “Messenger.”

The one which immediately follows interested me much, and will, I hope, gratify the patrons of the Messenger, in reading, as it did me to transcribe it. I give it verbatim.*

* I have, however, taken the liberty of punctuating the MS.; as there was not a point on the stone.

There are several standing of more modern dates; an extract from one must close the present notice of "Middle Church." It is on the stone which once lay over the grave of Mrs. Lucy Sayre, the great granddaughter of Philip Ludwell, but it has been dragged several yards from its original location as a tomb. Here is the extract—

Rest here, oppressed by pale disease no more;
Here find that calm thou sought so oft before;
Rest undisturbed within this humble shrine,
Till Angels wake thee with a Voice like thine.

And this, thought I, is the end of man, as far as this world is concerned! But the recollection that "after death, the Judgment," came over my spirit, and as I sighed an adieu to those mouldering memorials, I thought of that hour, when the cemetery of "Middle Church," should yield its quota to the great assize!

THE FATE OF LOVE.

The muse of Fancy high may soar,
And roam from distant shore to shore;
Be mine the part to paint with truth,
A single scene of happy youth.

Fortune, 'tis said, both comes and goes,—
Friends are the beings of an hour,—
From morning's dawn to evening's close,
Misfortune's clouds forever lower.

But different far my fate has been,
And on my brow no clouds are seen;
I meet the pleasures of the day
With morning's study and even's play.

'Twas when a child—a happy boy,
I formed a love for a being bright;—
We played with each as a gilded toy,
We danced and played from morn till night.

We lived and loved for months and years,—
Our time was spent 'twixt love and fears;
But then at last the parting came—
And now I only love her name.

She was a proud and haughty girl,
And loved the round of Fashion's whirl;
I too was proud, but too sedate,
For her to link with mine her fate.

'There came at last, a being, who Could seem to love and flatter too,
He flattered, and she shut her eyes—
He flattered, and he took the prize.

You now might think I'd grieve to see
 One so much loved estranged from me;—
 But no! this last great act has op'd my eyes,
 I'm glad that I have lost the prize.

She who to flattery thus could yield,
 Leaves me the victor of the field;
 I now rejoice the truth to state,
 That joy and I are linked by fate.

Whate'er of ill the world betide,
 I still shall seek the storm to ride;
 And hope Dame Fortune me will name,
 Whene'er she makes the gifts of fame.
Alexandria, 1842.

TRUE VALUE OF A COLLEGE REPUTATION.

It is no uncommon remark, that a college reputation is worth nothing; indeed, it has been sometimes asserted that college honors are unfavorable omens of the future career. On the other hand, some young men attach undue importance to the mere badges of scholarship. I shall endeavor to steer between these extremes, and to show the true value of such distinctions.

The belief, that he who wins college premiums, is unlikely to win more solid fame and rewards in after life, is at variance with experience and common sense. Doctor Johnson, I believe, said that the same man possessed the same intellectual power at every period of life.

Although this may be going a little too far, yet it seems reasonable that the same emulation, industry, and vigor of mind, which confer superiority in youth, should also do it in manhood and old age. It may be; and unfortunately is the case, that some of those who manage schools and colleges, require but little scholarship; their mode of instruction does not call forth the intellectual powers of their pupils; in such institutions, it is evident, that reputation, without real merit, may be acquired by a ready memory, and a little application. But, when the course of study is thoroughly taught; when mere unreasoning memory is insufficient to answer the questions of an instructor; then, a high standing must indicate either the possession of real talent, or of that ardent and energetic temperament, and patient steadiness, which so often serve as a substitute for great talent in after, as well as in college life.

If we turn to the biographies of distinguished men, we shall find, that while some of them, from indolence, or peculiarities of mind or character, have not attracted attention in their scholastic career, a far greater proportion has displayed, in the morning of their lives, the same powers that brightened and adorned the evening of their greatness. Look at Robert Hall, who, at the age of eleven, overtasked the industry and acquirements of his feeble instructor, and at college displayed those same great reasoning powers, and that elegance of taste, which made him, not only an ornament of the pulpit, but the finest of English writers. At twelve, Pascal had made considerable progress in geometry, without the aid of books, and contrary to the wishes of his parent. His profound and original thoughts, and the elegant, but irresistible satire of his Provincial Letters, are living evidences that the high promise of his youth was completely realized. The talents of Bacon and Newton were well-known and appreciated in early youth. In our country, many of our great men have evinced their mental superiority at a very early age. James Madison and Aaron Burr, (great in intellect, if not in virtue,) and our great financier, Nicholas Biddle, bore off the first honors of the same institution; the two last mentioned, at the age of sixteen. Thomas Jefferson, John Randolph, Tazewell, and many others well-known to fame, were distinguished at their venerable alma mater. Indeed, if we should examine the lives of most great men, we should find that far the greater number rose superior to their school-fellows.

It is however true that in the best regulated institutions, medals, prizes, and all the badges of scholarship, cannot and ought not to be always bestowed on those known to possess the most genius. This proceeds, not only from the indolence that often checks the progress of youths endowed with fine capacity, but from another circumstance often observable in our mental operations. One who has a ready apprehension, and retentive memory, with the requisite industry, becomes the most brilliant scholar, but he is often far from possessing the most valuable talent. Because a student of this description necessarily bears off the honors, it by no means follows, that he excites the highest hopes in judicious instructors, or has most fame among his fellows. The readiness with which he masters the ideas of others, may proceed from the paucity of his own; or from his incapacity or unwillingness to scrutinize the correctness of those ideas. The questions of a professor, especially in any of the higher branches of study, if they do not detect such a scholar in ignorance of his textbook or lecture, must assuredly prove that he never thinks for himself. On the contrary, the learner who thinks, who examines into the truth or falsehood of the principles laid down by his author, and, from that very circumstance, sometimes appears slow of apprehension, must disclose the resources of his mind in this process of interrogation. Judicious questions, indeed, constitute the very essence of good teaching. By them, an instructor, accustomed to the study of human nature, will often discover, that most is to be expected in subsequent life from those who, according to the ordinary principles of decision, cannot be crowned with the honors of scholarship. Composition and speaking too, are much better tests than the mere acquisition of knowledge, of intellectual power. Indeed it is excellence in those exercises, which, above everything, gives the student reputation among his fellows. It must be admitted, that from immaturity of taste and want of experience, these often make very extravagant and erroneous estimates. But the conclusions of an observant teacher are far more worthy of reliance.

When we speak of college reputation, we must recollect, that it is made up of the opinions both of instructors and fellow-students; and that it depends not merely on scholarship, but on success in all the intellectual exercises of the institution. It is admitted, that honors, when bestowed with judgment, and after the most thorough examination, are not conclusive evidences of genius. Yet we must beware of bringing them into contempt. They are intended to stimulate the memory and the reasoning powers concerning those principles and facts, which, although they cannot create intellect, are admirably calculated for its exercise. When properly regulated and bestowed, it cannot be denied, that they go far towards accomplishing their purpose. If they sometimes fall to the lot of the undeserving, and create expectations of future renown, which are never realized, it only proves that they, like all human contrivances, are imperfect. Such instances are far from justifying their abandonment or the sneers of those who seek an apology for indolence or dulness, in a professed contempt of all such distinctions. That contempt, as far as it really exists, must evidently injure the cause of education. The idea, that diligence and its consequence, good scholarship, are indications of a plodding genius, is so seductive and dangerous to the indolent mind of youth, that it should be met and resisted in every shape which it assumes.

The hill of science is proverbially steep; and we must remove every excuse for declining the arduous ascent. All experience proves, that emulation is the most powerful of all incentives to exertion, whether in youth, manhood or old age. Because, in some perverted souls, it has led to envy, slander, and even bloodshed, it by no means follows, that this powerful spring of human action, should be left to rust in inactivity. Our passions may be all made conducive to some good end, if they be subjected to a proper control. After all the abuse of avarice and ambition, what would become of society without the love of money and the love of distinction? Without the existence of these stimulants, it is plain that its whole machinery must stop. If this be true of the world at large, it seems absurd and irrational, that we should not address the same motives in the miniature world of a school. The old-fashioned common-sense plan has been disapproved of in late years; but that disapprobation is founded in speculation, rather than in experience. Like all other instruments of influence on human nature, emulation should be kept within due bounds, and every means should be used to make intellectual distinction appear insignificant, when compared with the principles of truth and honor.

There is a class of men to whom our previous reasoning does not apply. It is that class, so numerous in this country, that has risen to the height of fame like Washington and Franklin, without advantages, and in spite of obstacles. We have compared those only, who have been liberally educated; and have endeavored to show that preëminence at school, is the usual, but by no means the invariable, precursor of preëminence in the world. We may, here and there, meet with a Walter Scott, or a Dean Swift, who from indolence or waywardness, did not become distinguished scholars at college; and yet afterwards, were the pride and wonder of their respective ages.

But if we examine, we shall commonly find that, in such instances, the evidences of talent were too plain to be mistaken, unless concealed by some peculiarity of disposition. Swift passed through the university unnoticed and unknown, because his singular temper and melancholy circumstances gave an unusual direction to his studies, and made him shrink from a display of his acquirements and powers of composition. The teacher of Scott, Doctor Adam of grammatical memory, discovered the genius of his pupil, although he could not make him relish or retain the niceties of Latin syntax.

He saw that he appreciated the beauties of an author in a manner uncommon for a boy; and that he evinced a quickness of apprehension, and a taste in composition, entirely unknown to many of his more accurate school-fellows. Thus, a judicious teacher can almost always detect the germs of talent which, under a distaste for the dry and abstract portions of ordinary education, are concealed from less observant eyes. In such cases, although the rewards of accurate and profound scholarship, ought not to be, and are not, given; yet, reputation is always acquired.

We have mentioned an extreme just opposite to that which we have been combating. Those who study entirely for the evanescent honors of a college, and carry their acquisitions only far enough to attain them, being stimulated by no desire of comprehensive knowledge, but merely by the spirit of emulation, invariably sink into the insignificance which they deserve. He who aspires to be ranked among Wisdom's chief favorites, must woo her from a love of her own charms, and not from a fondness for the honors which she sometimes brings in her train.

I have endeavored to show how a ready memory, and unhesitating reception of all an author's, or of a teacher's dogmas, may give one young man distinction over another whose progress is slow, because it is cautious, and accompanied by reflection. It is obvious that their relative positions must often be reversed, when they come to act on the theatre of real life. Even on that theatre however, a ready recollection, and the bold fluency which usually accompanies it, are advantages not to be despised. They invariably take the groundlings, and the groundlings are no inconsiderable part of the spectators. But occasions often occur when these showy qualities are insufficient. When real difficulties occur either in private or public life, it is not enough for a man to know and retail the opinions of others; he must be capable of forming and defending his own. In such cases, all must see that the solid ore of a well-balanced judgment, outweighs the tinsel of ready quotation, and showy declamation.

Nor is this the only circumstance which may, in subsequent life, sink the collegian "with all his blushing honors" into obscurity; while his scarcely-noticed comrade rises gradually up to eminence. Other qualities, beside intellect, are not less essential to success in active business. Those who escape from indolence and vice—the rocks on which so many youthful hopes are wrecked—may yet find their voyage interrupted by many other obstacles. A capacity for the highest investigations of science, a taste for elegant erudition, or a genius for composition, may be accompanied by a sensitive bashfulness, excessive fastidiousness, indecision, or some other quality, as fatal to worldly prosperity, as the most abandoned licentiousness, or utter idleness. The mortification of disappointment, operating on an ambitious temper, too often converts these original weaknesses into poisons that corrode the feelings, and at last corrupt the principles. The manners too, especially in a country where everything depends on popular favor, are often decisive of a young man's fate.

It is evident therefore, that literary and scientific acquirements, and intellectual accomplishments, form only part of the auguries to be observed by those setting out on the voyage of human existence. He who sets sail with a heart elated by scholastic distinctions, being unconscious of his deficiencies in other particulars, will meet with sad disappointments.

In the first place, he is too apt to forget, that even his literary and scientific education is just commenced, and that all his honors are nothing but tokens of an auspicious commencement. His humble ambition is satisfied with the narrow limits of his elementary acquirements; and, as it is impossible for him to remain stationary, it is plain that he must retrograde. From the influence of the same contracted views, he perhaps attaches undue importance to mere book knowledge, and forgets that the study of man and physical nature, is essential to the performance of his active duties. Again, great devotion to literary pursuits, without active exertion, often engenders indeed want of manliness.

These considerations should serve as to those inclined to set their hearts too on those marks of scholastic distinction although useful for their immediate purpose of life, are no unerring index will be its meridian. These badges of should neither be derided and neglected worthy of attainment, nor exaggerated importance which they do not really possess.

TO THE OLD BOWL AT MOUNT

I.

Of all thy race, thou ancient bowl!
Few now are in the land;
Insulted by neglect, they have
On sideboard ceas'd to stand.
Time was, when goblet shared thy throne
When water pitcher was unknown.

II.

The parvenu! it seeks to rule,
And enters ev'ry dome,
While exiled bowls, are noticed not
And may not have a home.
But for our fathers' sakes will we,
Securely guard, and treasure thee!

III.

From summer's heat, and winter's cold,
Thy guardian virtues saved,
By land and sea, in storm and calm,
All, thy assistance, craved.
A powerful sceptre thou did'st wield;
From every ill, thou wert a shield.

IV.

Potations from thee, parsons quaff'd,
To keep devotion up.
They of the rosy, jocund face,
Paid homage to the cup!
(The sacred priests of this our day Refuse to drink, or hunt, or play.)

V.

Like their own glebes, they're with thee
Those sportsmen-parsons all,
And graver men dispense the rites,
To heaven, the sinner call.
And it is well, the sages say
That thou hast not thy former sway.

VI.

The churchman sought thy aid to pray
The huntsman for the chase—
None till'd the land unblest'd by thee,
Nor thought to win the race.
For ev'ry one thou had'st a boon,
Or sought by midnight, or by noon.

VII.

Ay, countless nights have worn away,
In feast and flow of soul,
And when the revelers met the dawn,
They cursed thee, tempting bowl!
Then too, when came the noontide heat
They strangely tried thy soothing power

VIII.

The princely planter, trusted thee,
The pilgrim scorn'd thee not ;
Thy matchless qualities they prized—
To serve thee, ne'er forgot :
They deem'd the chalice still the same,
As in the land from whence they came.

IX.

Methinks with dim, and shadow-form,
Before me now, they come ;
They who, by strong affection bound,
Did call old England "home !"
Those colonists ! they wish'd to be Ruled by the isle beyond the sea.

X.

If so that isle had nourish'd them,
And loved them as her own,
They'd been content to live and die,
In fealty to the throne.
But when despotic, she became,
A new Republic, had a name.

XI.

I see them now, those men of old,
So staid and dignified.
With powder'd wigs, and waistcoats long,
Like courtiers in their pride—
And a broad frill hangs o'er the hand,
And o'er the wrist, a broader band.

XII.

The massy buckles of their shoes—
They were of gold, 'tis said ;
Of their small clothes and silken hose,
In books were often read.
And they were studied in their dress,
And far removed from slovenness.

XIII.

Thou hadst thy origin before
This ancient pile was rear'd ;
Baronial, by planter then,
By subjects too revered—
They doff'd the hat, and bowing low,
Began, "Your Honor," so and so.

XIV.

And like the chieftain of a clan,
He ruled his little realm,
And all did move so orderly,
When he did guide the helm.
I doubt me much, if in these days
Men have like system in their ways.

XV.

Mortals are frail, and perishing,
And soon they fade away,
But thou in thy unbrokenness,
Seem'st never to decay.
No trace of years, is on thee now,
Not thine, a furrow'd, time-worn brow.

XVI.

But fair, as if of yesterday,
Thou dost the sideboard grace,
Thou relict of the olden time !
As 'erst, it is thy place.
For aged men do gravely say,
That thou didst stand there, in thy day.

XVII.

And then with sadden'd smile and sigh,
They tell how times have been,

And doubtless think, their grandsires were
A better race of men—
In truth they were a jovial band,
With customs like the father-land.

XVIII.

In turf and field-sports, they excelled,
Full oft, they victors came ;
They gloried in the coat of arms,
The herald of their name,
And haughtily they bore them then,
Like true and lordly Englishmen.

XIX.

Capacious bowl ! 'twere long to tell,
Thy each convivial scene ;
Thou centre of the festal board,
Could we thy annals glean,
We'd have a fund of joke and jest,
Of mirthful tales—the liquor's zest.

XX.

Pour in one flood the beverage,
Which has been drunk from thee,
'Twould make of old Virginia,
An overflowing sea !
And vessels gallantly might ride,
Upon the foaming, glittering tide !

XXI.

If all the wit thou hast inspired,
Were uttered in a breath,
The people sage, of this grave age,
Would laugh themselves to death !
'Twould years suffice for this wide earth !
And all would die for very mirth !

XXII.

And write the toasts that have been drunk,
Around thy sparkling fount—
They'd make a folio volume large,
In fact, a mimic mount !
And should we live for ages, we Could not one-half the contents see !

XXIII.

Could all the strength, sipped from thy brim,
Be sinew'd in one frame,
The drinker would do daring deeds,
That Hercules would shame !
He'd rouse the elements to war !
His earthquake-tread, would all things jar !

XXIV.

If all the liveried valets, grooms,
And waiters, dressed by thee,
Were marshall'd in a living host,
They'd reach from sea to sea !
If once they'd cheer 'hurra ! hurra !'
'Twould shake the earth, the loud huzza.

XXV.

The grief and wo, thou hast entailed,
(Thou and thy race, old bowl !)
If view'd, oh ! like a tempest-wave
Sorrow would o'er us roll !
At minds degraded—mad, insane,
All nature writhes, and groans again !

XXVI.

Could all the music of thy day,
(Like echoes of the spheres,)
Gush, in one strain of melody,
We'd melt away to tears !
Th' ancestral portraits, in the halls,
Would come to life, and leave the walls !

XXVII.

Mount Airy, with the magic spell,
Would be enchanted quite !
Its aged park, (with trees and deer,)
Would smile with new delight !
Its graceful fawns (alas-the-day !)
Would fairly bound themselves away !

XXVIII.

To number all the nuptial fetes,
Graced with festivity,
Would keep us figuring, 'till at last,
Bereft of patience, we !
Those joyous bridals flitted by,
Like brilliant clouds, in sunset's sky !

XXIX.

The stately grandames of the land,
Did view thee jealously,
(Those courtly ladies of brocade,
Long since they've ceased to be !)
And they did wear a sadden'd frown,
When thou didst bring the lofty down !

XXX.

And thy dominion passed away,
Since matrons served thee not ;
Those rebels conquered,—there had been
No changes of thy former lot !
But thou had'st swayed, "from shore to shore,"
The hearts of men till time was o'er !

Mount Airy, Va., Dec. 12th, 1841. E. C. CLEMONS.

PONCE DE LEON:

HIS QUEST AFTER THE FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH.

There is no incident, in the early history of our country, more affecting, than that contained in the simple account given by Irving, of the search, by Ponce de Leon, for the Fountain of Youth, which resulted in the discovery of Florida. It attaches a peculiar interest to the career of that adventurous man, who passed from the noise and tumult of a crowded camp, to the unbroken stillness of our primeval forests. Had he been some wild and hair-brained youth, whose imagination had been heated by tales of chivalry and adventure, we might only laugh at his folly ; but when we find, that he was an experienced and hardy warrior, celebrated for his prowess at the siege of Granada, and conversant with courts, surprise and admiration are blent together ; and we trace the spirit of the age in the conduct of this hardy warrior. The discovery of a New World, that startling fact, awoke the minds of men from the long slumber of satisfied ignorance—the strange and wild tales of the sun-burnt mariners, who wandered back, heated their fancies,—until at length no tale connected with the New World, could be so monstrous and incredible, as not to secure some degree of credence ; and a craving for excitement and adventure was created, which sent, on voyages of discovery, many of the most gallant spirits of the time. Ponce was not behind his age ; neither was he in advance of it ;

the conquest of the Moors had given peace to Spain, and the warrior was tasting the sweets of repose, when he heard of this marvellous fountain which could restore him who drank of it, to a second youth ; his adventurous spirit was aroused ; and, buckling on his armour, he set forth to find, not the coveted fountain he sought, but that quiet resting-place of all earth's children—the grave. And has not his quest in one sense been accomplished ! has it not given an immortality to a name, which otherwise might never have been known, beyond the Spanish hamlet where his bones reposed ! and is not his name, now and forever, identified with the "land of flowers," whither his fiery spirit led him—to die !

In this age of scoffing and skepticism, when men, arrogantly proud of their own puny powers, mock the ideal, and seek to convert this glorious world, with its matchless panorama of sea and sky, mountain and plain, into a mere workshop and laboratory, and would degrade man, who was created in the image of his God, into a mere automaton and animated engine, it is pleasant to turn even to the wild errors of a man like this, who if he did err, was led astray by a vague but lofty craving after the Unknown and the Infinite.

He deceived himself, as well as others ; and the faith must indeed have been strong, which could lead him over the wild waste of waters into the midst of enemies. The energy with which he prosecuted the search, proves the untiring and indomitable spirit of the man.

Let us picture to ourselves, the image of the wild enthusiast ! Scarred with the trophies of many a hard-fought field—scorched with the Summer's sun—and worn with watching and with dangers—surrounded by savage and subtle foes, whose wild warwhoop broke upon the stillness of night, and woke him from dreams of his distant home ;—yet calm, fearless, and self-possessed ; animating and inspiring the courage of his drooping followers, and confident each day, that his goal was near, he won :—and we cannot refrain from admiring his courage, and envying the delusion which gave him so much happiness. How far superior the spirit which animated him, to that which swayed his contemporaries ! With Balboa, Pizarro, Almagro and Cortes, two passions were predominant—the love of power, and the lust of gold. Hard, iron, public men, whom neither love nor pity, the wail of mothers, nor the mute agony of patriots, could turn from their designs ; yet fawning and kind at times to delude their victims—graceful and subtle as serpents, and as ravenous in their thirst for blood. To the simple Indian, who first hailed the white man as a being from some higher sphere—who cherished him in his bark-covered hut, and fed him with the products of his hunting, how startling must have been the discovery that he had cherished in his bosom, the serpent which was to sting and his life. The annals of human crime, dark as they are, do not possess a blacker page, than that on which is recorded the deeds of the early discoverers. It seemed as though these men on breaking loose from the restraints of civilized society, shook off all feelings of nature and humanity, and grew drunk with crime. Kindness, charity, benevolence, even interest finally seemed to be merged in the savage thirst for blood; but retribution came; and these monsters, against whose steel-clad breasts, the idle arrows of the Indian rattled in vain, perished by each others hands, in drunken revels, and midnight brawls. Such were the men who first adventured to our shores, wild desperadoes cut off from all hope at home, and reckless of man or God! One merit they did possess: that of dauntless courage! See Cortes and his little band in the capital of Mexico, hemmed in by thousands of enemies, yet triumphing at last over these countless hordes, by the energy of his iron will, which knew not fear,—a memorable instance of the mastery of moral superiority over mere physical force. Turn from these bloodstained men, who found, when they came, plenty and peace, and left behind them desolation and ruin; whose first and last question of the natives was “Give us gold,”—and contemplate the career of Ponce De Leon, whose hands were not stained with blood, nor his soul with crime; who sought not power nor gold, but the “Fountain of Youth.” Wild dreamer that he was! Even had the fountain he sought, been found, would it not have been the height of folly to have dipped his lips within it? Had he found life so great a boon, that he wished to prolong his term of existence? or was it youth only that he coveted? Trembling as he was, on the verge of the grave, did he hope to renew the joys of his youth, when they who had shared with him the cares and pleasures of the former time, were sleeping the sleep of death? or did he vainly think to transfer to those he loved and cherished, the same boon of unfading youth? Might he not have known that it is one of the kindest gifts of our Creator, to dismiss us from this world, when we have run the brief career for which we were destined? And what curse could be more terrible, than that which the fancy of the poet has feigned of the wandering Jew, roving forever over a world to him but the tomb of buried hopes, and cut off from that solace to those whose burden is heavier than they can bear—the hope of death? And yet, the sentiment which animated that lone voyager was a high and a noble one; the dim aspiring of a spirit which soared beyond the narrow circle of the known; of an imagination, which, if restrained and cultivated, might have made a “Poet for Eternity.” And is not the wish which prompted him, common to humanity? Does not every man look back, mournfully, upon his vanished years, and long to recall them? Does he not think how much more he could perform—how many errors he would avoid—and recur with lingering fondness to the halcyon days of his youth? And thus do we not all grasp at the same shadow which the visionary Spaniard followed? and is not our illusion almost as great as his? For is youth indeed the happiest period of existence; or, is not distance that “lends enchantment to the view?” As, in viewing from afar some lovely prospect, we see the verdant mountain-side clad in the rich livery of Spring, musical with the warbling of birds and gushing of waters, and bathed in the rich glow of the setting sun; charming our eyes like an earthly elysium. We approach the spot; grim crags impend above us; the swollen torrent rushes down the mountain side, threatening to engulf us; from the green thicket above, glares the eye of the tiger; and foul and venomous things crawl in the grass at our feet.

Thus it is with youth. We note its gallant bearing and joyous laugh—we recall to memory hours of rapture and of joy—sunny spots in the waste of life,—but we remember not the hours and days of agony with which those joys were purchased and succeeded. Let us look back—gaze steadily into the magic mirror of the past, and look upon the picture it presents. We see the sanguine youth just emerging into the world, casting off the careless indifference of boyhood, and starting forward on his career with heart elate and full of confidence. He feels within his breast, the power of intellect and energy of will; he burns to emulate the great of old, and to achieve a name for himself. Men, he regards as brothers; and women, as angels. But this freshness of feeling fades and withers in the hot atmosphere of the world. He sees unfolded suddenly to his view, a vast theatre of fraud, corruption and selfishness; the chosen friend of his boyhood deceives and deserts him; the idol of his affections leaves him for a wealthier suitor; his eyes are opened from the ideal to the real; and, in the first bitter revulsion of feeling, he loathes all mankind. But time undeceives him; he finds that truth lies between these two extremes; but this lesson is not learned, until manhood has bought experience; and it is only through this weary path, that the youth can attain to “knowledge of the world”—of all knowledge that passeth not understanding, the most useful in our pilgrimage here below. Youth then, is the period of probation. On recurring to it we remember only the bright scenes which burst upon our view when life was young; but we recall not the long and wasting agony of hope deferred—the alternate flushings of hope and fear—the wild dreams of future distinction—the hours of languor and depression, when the conviction of failure would press heavily upon us—or the sudden tolling of the passing bell, would preach its solemn lesson of the fleeting stay of man on earth. No; we repeat that the even and steady pulse of manhood, whose feelings are regulated by reason, never can feel those wild alternations of agony and rapture, which thrill through the rapid pulse of youth. And the "sleepless boy," who perished by his own rash hand, is but a type of many who have endured the same tortures, but passed unscathed through the trial. Yet every day from the lips of manhood, we hear the querulous lament for departed youth; as well might the racer, who has reached the goal, repine that his sinews were not still stretched to their utmost tension, in the fierce excitement of the race! Why then should we scoff at the visionary Spaniard, for seeking that which all desire! for he must have been far in advance of his age, had he not credited the tradition; and, what could seem strange or marvellous, after the wondrous fact of the discovery of a NEW WORLD! Of Ponce de Leon then, may be said, what could equally be applied to many who have filled a far larger space in the estimation of the world; that "His life was the chase of a flying shadow, which rested not, until it slept in gloom and forever upon his grave."

THE HUNCHBACK: A PENNSYLVANIA STORY.

BY ARCHÆUS OCCIDENTALIS.

CHAPTER IV.

And the genius said "the very old man whom thou seest pursuing with feeble and measured step yet overtaking the swiftest steed, is TIME, that outrunneth and o'ercometh all things."—Eastern Apologue.

At the age of sixteen, Mary Walmsley was one of the most beautiful creatures I had ever beheld, and certainly the most excellent. Slight of figure, but singularly elastic and graceful, and, with all her arch demureness, very witty and playful, she more resembled one of Rubini's cherubs, than a creature of mere flesh and blood. Her skin was as snow; her cheeks slightly suffused with that tint which surpasses every other in creation; her eyes mild and soft; her eyebrows dark and beautifully arched; her hair, a shining, glossy brown; a mouth forever dimpled with good nature; and the sweet smile of youthful joy and cheerfulness, lent their aid to fill up the outline of a form and character almost faultless.

This is not a fancy sketch, my reader; this is no mere colouring of the imagination; but a sober vision, which rose on my eyes daily for ten brief years. I saw her every day the same bright, beautiful, cheerful, happy being; her voice, our best-loved music; her eye, the sun and star of our solar system. Do not indulge the thought that you see in me, the future lover of this fair girl. Oh, no; it was never my happiness to move a female bosom to regard me, with more than pity. If sigh ever visited the bosom of woman on my account, or tear moistened her eye for me, it was when she beheld the uncouthness of the clod in which the ethereal essence was imprisoned. Is it for me to talk or dream of love, with one arm hanging from my side, misshapen and useless—my back, my shoulder!—but I will not shock you, by placing before your eyes, an image, which, if it should revisit you in sleep, would be pronounced the worst distortion of the nightmare. I will not blaspheme against that passion, which, under the guidance of reason, and when supported by mutual affection, affords the purest happiness our nature knows—and gives the nearest approach on earth to the perfect felicity of heaven, by representing that aught could love the Hunchback. Nature has been to me a hard and cruel mother. She has given me a heart bound up in the social sympathies and fireside affections—loving children intensely, coveting the "strange hearth," and the "new face" never; but, ever brooding over, recalling and nursing the memory of past sympathies and affections, I am denied the happiness that gladdens the hearts of most of my species. That which my nature most demands is totally wanting. I shall never hear the sweet sounds that gladden a father's heart. There will be no sweet prattler to throw its dear arms around my neck. My adopted child is not my child—the locks that curl down its white shoulders, are the shining locks of its fair mother, deepened in colour by a closer affinity with those of its other parent.

I stood and stand alone, remembered or forgot.

Children! sweet word! Dear creatures! There never was any one that loved them better than I do. Their sweet caresses and prattle—even their very roll-about of a walk, has something in it, which warms every drop of blood in my heart, whilst it fills my eyes with tears of truest feeling. It is evident that our kind Creator, in ordering children into existence, had another and more beneficent motive than the continuation of the species—the giving sweet solace to the heart oftentimes wearied almost to death, by the petty deceits and miserable affectations of those amongst whom they are to live and move. Man was appointed to labor through the long day—the sweat was to pour down from his pale brow, and toil was to rack his bones; but he was to be rewarded for it at night, by the thrilling spectacle of infant faces clustering at his knee. In his daily pilgrimages, he was to meet with much deceit—his heart was to be sorely bruised by the treacheries of the world,—but he was to be tranquillized at night, and coaxed back to a further patient endurance of misery, by the merry little voices which hailed him by the dear name of father.

It has been said, with perfect truth, that no very bad man was ever fond of children; nor was any man fond of children, ever very bad. To love children is to possess a kindly disposition—a domestic and quiet nature, loving the home fireside; and its peaceful and happy joy is better pleased with infancy whispering its endearing petitions, than it is with the sounds of dissipation and revelry. I am not naturally given to envy;—I have seen men rolling in superabundant wealth, and others decked with the insignia of high office, without the most remote approach to a murmur; but I have gone apart from the crowd—have buried myself in solitude, to weep at the caresses I have seen a fair wife lavish on her husband, and the delightful endearments a father has poured out on his children.

By reference to the date of my last chapter, it will be perceived that the events of eight years remained undepicted. In the annals of the Old World such a portion of time might elapse, with few occurrences to deserve recital, save at those periods when they become the master-themes of the world; but in this land of restless enterprise and mad-dened career, where men move as the wild horse moves when first subjected to the bit and the lash, the Months may remain without a record, but the Years must have their historian. Proceed we then to recount the chief events in that portion of time. They passed, then, bringing to the peaceful occupants of the embayment, the same calm and quiet joys, the same succession of pleasures and anxieties, summer and winter that marks the division of labor, seed time and harvest, God's promise and its fulfilment—the day for the field, the evening for social joy, and the dark night for rest. And we were the happiest of the happy. Sickness never entered our doors; and want, that came to them to beg the crumbs, went back full of gratitude and cheerful hopes.

During these years, the town of New Boston continued to grow slowly but steadily. Enterprise was not, at that day, quite so bustling and noisy a personage as he has since become, but was content with less than Aladdin's fairy work. Our town grew; and Water-Street filled up so as to require logs to be rolled into the mud, at the distance of three feet apart, for the inhabitants to walk upon with dry feet. There were many new comers; some of whom might be reckoned as acquisitions, and some classed amongst the doubtful. Our old friend Pepper became, by universal consent, the chief director of the village—his authority having been only once disputed, and that for a brief period, by Asa Caw, a peripatetic genius, whose birth-place was never known, nor cared for. But the judgment of Captain Pepper was singularly correct and discerning. Merit found a fast friend in the "Governor," but the Caws received a cold welcome.

Amongst the earlier settlers of these eight years, was a gentleman from the Eastern Shore of Maryland by the name of Ramsay—descended from a family driven from France at the time of the persecution and dispersion of the Huguenots in the reign of Louis XIV. He was a very proud and haughty man, well educated, and with manners highly refined and intellectual. Their tone, however, was not well adapted to make him popular in the society in which he lived. But under this repulsive and inaccessible exterior, lay concealed a soul whose every thought was regulated by the highest principles of honor. High tempered, and withal imperious in his disposition, violent and nearly implacable in his aversions, he was yet one of the best of masters, best of fathers, and truest of friends.

And this man had one son. Whilst yet a boy in years, this son was in stature and strength, a man grown. It was pleasant to see Robert Ramsay engaged on any labor that required vigor and activity; for he undertook it with his whole soul, and performed the feats of a giant. But alas! it was seldom he was so worthily employed. It was far more in accordance with his disposition to perpetrate mischief and call it fun, the only redeeming trait of his wild enjoyment being the choice, for his subjects, of his equals in strength and courage.

From the earliest years of his residence in the village, he had been a frequent visiter at Mr. Walmesley's; where, though not exactly a favorite, he was yet welcome, for his father's sake at least. For some years he was the playmate of the little Quakeress, her attendant to and from the village school, the repairer in general of broken dolls, and architect of baby houses. But when juvenile feelings had given way to those of a more advanced age, he was a visiter on less familiar terms than before. At eighteen he was the declared, but not the accepted, lover of the beautiful Mary. Not "accepted," for Mary was but fifteen, and her parents the most prudent of the prudent. Besides, he was of a different faith, and "Marrying out," as the Friends call marrying one of a different faith, is regarded by them with especial horror, being a cause of rejection from the pale of the church. Her parents, remarking no symptom of her returning the passion of the handsome libertine, did not think themselves warranted in forbidding him the house, nor requiring of their daughter to use him with more than increased reserve. He continued to visit us very frequently, and to look, if not to utter, his regards, till Mary Walmesley had ripened into beautiful and accomplished womanhood.

Time lessened rather than increased his chances of winning her. What was at first "high spirits," then "love of mischief," became in the "young gentleman" dissipation and riot. As he grew older, he grew more reckless and turbulent; his addictiveness to gallantry became more notorious; he associated more with Asa Caw, Ben Cuttle, and other low companions, than became one of his education and hopes, and that too in the prosecution of objects least likely to be forgiven by a sober Quaker—experimental fun pretty generally terminating in wrong and injury to somebody. Were the young maidens assailed in the streets, was the sound of crazy mirth heard at midnight, did morning rise upon battered tenements, and impassable highways, had children or half-witted people been frightened by hideous shapes and horrid sounds? men named Robin Ramsay as the master-demon of the storm; and the accusation travelled uncontradicted. These things were duly reported at Mr. Walmesley's, and caused the worthy pair much grief, coupled with reiterated expressions of gratitude to God, that their daughter had shown so little predilection for his society.

The human heart is a treacherous thing; who can know it? It was not till the libertinism of young Ramsay had become notorious, that Mary began to testify, unequivocally, a preference for the handsome roué. Let it not be supposed that the sentiments of favor, with which she regarded him grew out of, or were occasioned by, his vicious and irregular conduct. A certain degree of wildness in a suitor has been supposed to possess great weight in fixing the affections of a woman. If ever true of one individual of the sex, it certainly was not of Miss Walmesley. Her love had remained unknown to herself, till impediments, apparently insurmountable, were opposed to its course. And now, when her own good sense, and the anxious entreaties of her parents, told her to fly his approach, as one flies a beast of the desert, his presence had become essential to her happiness, and marriage with him promised to be the only event which could make life endurable. She seemed to live but in his presence, and to have no other thought but of him through the livelong day.

Though the Quaker appears mild in his general deportment, his parental government and household discipline have ever been accounted of the sternest forms of that rule. Mr. Walmesley tried persuasion—his daughter heard him with many tears, confessed the justice of his arguments, and threw herself on her knees in a passionate prayer for his consent to the unpropitious and ill-starred union. He tried what was meant for harshness, but the veil was too thin to conceal the anxious love and tenderness working beneath it, and the lesson of severity failed of its intended effect. The high-souled Major Ramsay was appealed to, and he added his entreaties to that of her father. Lamenting the vices of his son, and despairing of a change for the better, he urged her, by every plea that has weight with well-regulated minds, to forego the connection. The consequence of our entreaties—for I too was a pleader against the lover—was the obtaining from her a promise to see him no more. He was forbidden to visit the house.

The year came around, and brought with it the pleasantest of all the seasons, autumn—with its temperate atmosphere, its harvest-home, its parlor fires kindled in the evening “just to take off the chill”—the beginning of those familiar conversations which instruct the mind, whilst they strengthen it, half-restores to the wearied limbs the activity of the morning, and quite dispels the gloom which may have hung over the day's transactions. And there is the family party, just large enough to be seated round a centre table—the family supper at nine o'clock, with its habitual and polished liveliness, and the host of other well-regulated pleasures of lesser account, which are the concomitants of living well and respectably, and of using freely the things needful to the welfare of the body. All the seasons are beautiful—each in its turn exceedingly so; but best, I love the mild and gentle autumn—calm and serene—like an inland lake at twilight—like a beautiful matron in the midday of her beauty—summer past, winter not yet come. And there is the forest donning its livery of scarlet, brown and gold, and the earth clad in a sober robe of russet, and the flocks congregating at night on the sheltered knoll, and the rill dancing along like a giddy boy on his return from the village school. All this is exceedingly beautiful;—like little Frank in the juvenile tale, I have oftentimes wished that it could always be September and October.

I do not remember exactly upon what day of the latter month it happened—I think about the middle—that Mr. Walmesley received tidings of the death of a friend, whose family was left in a state of afflictive destitution. The friend was worthy, the distress great, and the Quaker compassionate;—an hour after the receipt of the intelligence, the worthy pair were on their way to the house of mourning, with the means of dispelling hunger and corporeal wretchedness, and of soothing the mind as far as man may minister to mental suffering. Mr. Walmesley, at his departure, appointed me superintendant of his household, and bade the family servants take their orders from me. It was an unusual thing for him to be absent from home all night; in the ten years I had dwelt beneath that roof, the circumstance had never happened before. It shed so great a gloom over our little family, that before the clock struck eight, the dispersion was complete. Each was in his bed, and striving to lose himself in oblivion of the all-pervading melancholy.

It could hardly have been midnight, when we were startled from our slumbers by a shriek and a cry to us for help, proceeding from the apartment of Mary Walmesley. We were entirely without the means to repel aggression; for the Quakers never permitted fire-arms, nor other offensive weapons.

pons to be kept or used in his house, or on his domains. By the time I was dressed, the men servants had also put on their apparel; and, snatching cudgels, we left our sleeping apartments for the chambers below. Scarce a minute elapsed between the alarm and the rush to the rescue, but we were too late. By the light of the moon, now approaching her full, we saw Miss Walmesley borne away at a furious rate by a band of Indians, at least a dozen in number. I am by nature quick of motion, and quick of thought—my perceptions are rapid in the extreme, and I am withal somewhat prone to suspicion. From these causes it is very difficult to deceive me. I remarked that the gait of one was different from the gait of the others—they were indeed savages; he was a white man. That it was Robert Ramsay was established by his mode of leaping the fence, which surrounded the mansion, in a way I had seen him do it a hundred times, but never saw an Indian attempt. He had in that respect a manner of his own, and his wonderful agility enabled him to achieve gymnastic feats confessedly beyond the power of any other man in our part of the country.

In less than five minutes one of the servants was on his way to Mr. Walmesley, with news of his daughter's abduction. I stated to him my belief that the deed was brought about by young Ramsay, and that I was going immediately to obtain tidings of her, and if possible to accomplish her deliverance. I had no clue to guide me, but trusted to a merciful Providence to aid me in freeing the bird from the snare of the fowler. Having despatched this note, I sat out to procure the aid of Capt. Pepper, of whose strong sense and native sagacity I wished to avail myself. He was withal a man of chivalrous courage and presence of mind—always cool and collected—probably he never forgot himself in his life, except when he chose a wife for her singing and dancing.

Speed, commensurate with the exigency of the occasion, soon carried me to Capt. Pepper's. It was his advice that the pursuit should be immediate; and, of his own accord, he offered to accompany me. Long before the sun rose, we were on our journey, with a Delaware Indian for our guide. Pathlomico, the guide, was as shrewd as an Indian should be;—in an hour, he was on the trail, and from circumstances, separately of small moment, but collectively amounting to full evidence, pointed out who were the criminals and the course they had taken, with shrewd conjectures as to the point to which they would tend. Behold us then equipped with weapons which the Quaker would have disdained to use, though they had purchased the deliverance of his child—with a scanty supply of provisions in our haversacks, but with courage well screwed to a most praiseworthy point, on our way to the frozen regions of the North.

CHAPTER V.

A wilderness—Defeat—Victory, and recognition of an old acquaintance.

Little occurred during the first eight days of our journey, to interest, and nothing to alarm. We threaded the mazes of many a dark forest, forded muddy streams, swam rapid rivers, and met with the usual but seldom insurmountable obstacles, encountered by those whose path leads through the wilderness. At that day there were no white people living in the region through which our course lay, and we carefully avoided the savage bands that might be in the interests of our enemies. So communication we had with none, till it was in the subsequent death-grapple.

On the eighth day, soon after it became light enough to discern objects, and to note the appearances which gave scope for the observation of the guide, his countenance assumed unusual seriousness, and his observation became more wary and circumspect. In his calm and deliberate manner, he assured us that we were so near the fugitives that we might count on overtaking them by the next morning at farthest. He showed us footprints, amongst which was one much smaller than the rest—that of a person at times walking, and then would be carried—proofs of fatigue and exhaustion. About four in the afternoon, we came in sight of Lake Erie, at that part of it where has since been located the town of Dunkirk. It is no light labor to travel eight days through an American wilderness; and weary were our steps, and heavy our souls. But fortune was soon to shine more brightly upon us. Following east the course of the Lake for the greatest part of an hour, we saw at the close of day, a short distance ahead, the bright flame of an Indian camp.

Between us and the band thus encamped, there ran up some ten miles into the woods a creek, anglice a river. (I have seen in England very parsimonious rivulets dignified with a title appropriated elsewhere to voluminous sheets of water.) The weather being dry, the stream was low, and easily forded. There was a deep, dark valley jutting into it from the east—a tangled and briery copse, with a deer-path down the middle. Through this path, our guide chose to approach and reconnoitre the enemy. In the deepest and darkest part of this path, there suddenly emerged from a cross-path, a tall, gaunt form, habited, as near as we could see, much as an Indian would be, walking as an Indian would walk—and yet, you could at once remark, not of the North American race. The wary eye, the stealthy tread, and the bronzed visage may not be wanting, still there is a something—a feeling as it were, which informs you that one of the Caucasian race is before you.

The individual thus suddenly seen, threw himself into our path, completely blocking it up. It was light enough to show that he was armed with a long rifle. In the desert, saith the Eastern proverb, no man meeteth a friend,—and there, the law-maxim, “always ready,” is ever, in practice, before the wayfarer’s eye; but, so silent had been the approach of the stranger, that he came upon us unobserved. Approaching and leaning forward so as to be bent nearly double, he said in a low whisper,

“Ye seek the gal?”

“We do.”

“She is at the watch-fire.”

“So we supposed. And how many are with her?”

“Eight of them thievish Mingoos, and one with a white skin and a Mingo heart. Do you need help?”

“We are but three.”

“And the Crow and I make but five; but the Crow is a very great one, and Killdeer and I are two a-piece any time.”

“How came you to know whom we were seeking?”

“Laud a mercy! the Crow knows every thing—sees every thing—hears every thing. Nothing ‘scapes the Crow. He was on the trail of them thieves when the party with the gal crossed his path. A wonderful eye for a trail has the Crow.”

“What are we to do to obtain the liberation of the captive?”

“To set the gal free? why kill the riptyles—what other way is there? If there be any other way to deal with Mingoos, I never hearn on it. I’ve been scout, man and boy, twenty years, and I never knowd one get the mastery of them bad fellows, but by a true, steady, and willing sight down the barrel of such a piece as this.”

“Granted that blood must be shed, when”——

“When! why wait till the watchfire gets low—human nater, and savage nater, and nater that’s neither, always sleeps soundest just afore day.”

At the time of night then, when the watchfire burns low, and men sleep soundest, we got ready for the onset. The scout crept first, and the others of the party followed upon all fours. Deep sleep was upon our foes, and our approach was unheard till we were near enough to do “execution upon Cawdor.” Two of the Indians fell by the first fire, a third was maimed so as to be incapable of flight, the remainder fled. In this feuillade, our aim was purposely arrested from Ramsay, as he was less feared than his savage auxiliaries. My part of the battle was to obtain possession of Mary. I was at her side in a moment, to be received for a brief space with exceeding joy, and by long and repeated fainting fits afterwards. Ramsay stood and fought it out like one of those bad heroes of romance, which form the burthen of the stories of chivalry—the church-girt champions of the fields of Palestine, fighting beneath the red cross in the morning, and plundering and drinking and wench-

ing at night. Disdaining to fly, the brave bad youth advanced sword in hand upon his assailants. But young, athletic, and courageous as he was, he lacked the practical swordmanship of Captain Pepper. How this latter had acquired such a complete knowledge of the noble science of attack and defence, was not well known; but the period of his West-India voyages was a stormy one, and it was whilst he was engaged in them that he had managed to become a most expert fencer. Ramsay’s sword was in his possession but a moment. The next, he stood powerless, his weapon ten feet from him, his sword-arm nearly dislocated. The Captain coolly breaking his sword over his knee, bade him seek some savage band with which to ally himself. “Unfit company for white men, he ought to spend his days amongst the savages, if there were any so lost to self-respect as to receive him.” The proud and passionate youth received these bitter expressions, with a resignation and calmness so foreign to his nature, as to excite fear for the motives.

Morning now broke upon us, showing us the beautiful expanse of Lake Erie glowing with the sunlight. The day-beam also came to reveal to us the countenances of those who had come so opportunely to our assistance.

The scout or guide was a white man of the age perhaps of thirty years. His hard and repulsive features were lit up by such a smile, and look of goodness, that under the intellectual emanation he became almost handsome. His dress was the dress of the hunter in every age and every clime, furs and tanned leather, with a deer-skin cap. He wore a tanned hunting-shirt, and his feet were protected by the unfailing moccasins of the bush-ranger. Though tall, he was so spare and gaunt, that his weight could not have been more than a hundred and forty pounds. But this was altogether made up of bone, sinew, and gristle—the materials of a man capable of exceeding fatigue, exertion, and endurance.

The other, the Indian, was short of stature for an Indian, and with cheekbones so little prominent, and complexion so light, as to create doubt as to the purity of his blood. If there had been an admixture of blood, there had been none of disposition and habits—he was the Indian, and nothing but the Indian. With the singular composure that marks his race, he sat apart from the group, apparently nothing regarding, and yet, perhaps, the most curious of human observers; for a moment the impersonation of apathy, the next to cast off the character and assume that of a hungry tiger just roused from his lair.

Upon questioning Miss Walmesley, we learned that she had been treated during the journey as well as the circumstances would admit of. Ramsay had told her that immediately upon her arrival at any French post, where the aid of a priest could be procured, he would make her his wife, whether she were willing or not. Her health had suffered some; but that sweet tranquillity and resignation which she inherited from her parents, and which had been strengthened by their precepts, had enabled her to bear up better than could have been expected.

We travelled by slow stages—twenty miles only during the first two days. It was necessary to move with great care and circumspection, as the woods were full of Indians who would be sure to learn our precise situation from the lately dispersed band. Our guides were ever on the watch, and with all the display of precaution that belongs to frontier movements in time of war. But the tactics of attack and defence, advance and retreat, are more dissimilar in Indian warfare, than in that of civilized armies. In wilderness warfare, there can be no outposts to protect the main body. The sentry dies by an unseen hand, and the ferocious onset of the foe follows his fall at the distance of a half minute. It is a word and a blow, and the blow comes first. There is nothing beneath the sun that has so light and stealthy a tread as an Indian bent on mischief.

"I never know'd myself feel so skeary as I do to-night," said the scout, at the coming on of the second evening. "It is not for myself, but this pretty one that I fear. The woods are full of them Mingoes, and if they are down upon us in numbers, we few and tired can make no defence—and then what will become of her! I wish I know'd what had become of the Chief."

"What chief?" I asked.

"The Chief!—I don't know of but one raal Chief—no, I know but one Chief! He whom all redskins in these parts look up to. He is somewhere, not a great way off. We shall be attacked; I know we shall be attacked; I wish the Chief was here."

"This chief, so potent and feared, who is he?"

"Well, the name ant mine, and I have no right to mention it. You'll know one time, and soon enough, hist!"

"Do you hear Indians?"

"Who ever heard an Indian? I have been amongst them now thirty years, man and boy, and I never heard them by listening. No, no, no; if you hear an Indian 'tis never till he raises the whoop, and then he may be heard pretty easy. I'll tell you what I heard. I heard a bird in rising strike his wing against a bush. And there sure enough goes a buck out of the copse, scared by something close by him. There's mischief at hand."

"Do you think so?"

"I do."

"What shall we do?"

"What can we do? We can lie close, and perhaps pick off a few of the varmints, afore they get our scalps, and then die like men."

"Dear Mary! I wish she was safe."

"I wish she war; but wishing ant of no avail. She is not safe, and what's more, we can't make her safe till there's a brush."

All this was said in a low tone. The next minute was passed in low conversation with the Crow and Captain Pepper. The rifles of all were placed in a position for immediate use, and preparation was made for action to the death, if need were. A noise was now heard as of some one struggling through the woods on our left; and in a moment Robin Ramsay stood before us. The sight of this bold wretch produced on Miss Walmesley an effect which all her other sufferings had been unable to produce. He stood, this reckless man, with as much coolness and self-possession, as if his whole life, and in particular the last ten days of it, had been spent in the commission of upright and honorable deeds. There was abundant cause for his self-possession—he was evidently supported by a body of his savage allies, and they near at hand.

"I claim," said he, with all his effrontery, "this lady—mine as she herself knows, by her own promise."

"Shall she herself be allowed to decide upon that claim?" demanded the Captain.

"No; she is under compulsion."

"I am under no compulsion, nor fear of any one, but—but you," said the fear-stricken and weeping girl. "Oh Robert Ramsay! suffer me to go back to my dear, my beloved parents, and thy heart shall be lighter after the deed, than it would be if I were thy willing partner in the wretched lot thy principles and character prepare for all who shall be linked to thee."

"Preaching has been tried before without any benefit," said Ramsay: "I am given to few words when much speaking may be dispensed with; and therefore say that mine you shall be."

"Thine, Robert Ramsay, I will never be."

"Mary! once you said otherwise."

"I did indeed say otherwise—may God forgive me for the total eclipse of his spirit which prevailed whilst I said so. Go, Robin Ramsay, reform, and I will be almost happy when I hear of thy amendment. But I wish never to see thy face on earth again."

"Beautiful Mary! most beautiful in your anger! you cannot escape me now. These silly friends of yours, only rescued you before, to conduct you to a part of the forest where a second rescue is impossible. Within call is a band of fifty Sioux. If I whistle—thus twice, (he gave a shrill and peculiar whistle,) they are at my side."

The last word was scarcely out of his lips, when from another part of the wood, than that from which he came, a low cry arose, like that of a bittern in spring-time, which was answered by the scout in the same manner. To describe the fire that lit up the eye of the scout, at this moment, would be impossible. It was of brief duration however—merely a flash, with it faded the excitement, and he fell back on the earth, listless and composed as before. Throughout the whole scene, the Crow scarce showed sign of life. Such is the effect of education.

The scout now spoke for the first time—and something I could see had given him confidence—suddenly. “The gal,” said he, in his harsh guttural accent, “never shall leave, not even by her own free will, here. Young man! I don’t know your name, and for the matter of that, don’t keare; but ’tis very clear to me, that you have got little manners, and less larning. If you will go away peaceable, we wont harm you; but I tell you candid, that there’s a thunder cloud coming up which will have bolts too hot for you to handle. Be warned, and go in time.”

“The warning will fit you best,” said Ramsay, insolently. “I give you five minutes to surrender; and I say this, backed by fifty brave men.”

“I cannot give you one—but I wish I could, poor creature.”

The words were hardly out of his mouth, when the most frightful sounds that my ears have ever heard, burst from the woods on our right; and in five seconds of time, a band of savages passed, with the velocity of arrows, through our little encampment. As they passed, a tall Indian, a very Hercules, spoke one single word to the scout and passed on, followed by the latter and by our former Indian ally. Captain Pepper and myself remained with Mary, and prepared to defend her to the last. Ramsay, at the first cry, had bounded back into the woods, with an agility not inferior to theirs.

The terrible war-cry of the party which passed us, met an answering shout in that portion of the forest from which Ramsay had emerged. It was evident that this must be a terrible conflict. If Ramsay had truly reported the number of his supporters, and if the quick guess I had made at the number of the band which passed, was a correct one, the two parties were equally poised in numbers.

Five minutes passed in the most agonizing uncertainty. At times there would be as deep a silence in the woods as pervaded them at the creation, and then a horrible shout, making night hideous, would reach us, as one or the other party gained an ascendancy in the fight. Nothing except the sound of the last trumpet, and that known to be the sound of the last trumpet, would so horrify the human soul, as an Indian war-whoop.

An interval of five minutes of this deep, dead, appalling silence passed, and then a low moan, as of some wounded or dying person came borne to us on the wind. The moans grew louder and nearer.

“I think I know that voice,” said Mary, tearfully. “Alas it is—it is he indeed!”

The thick shrubbery was pushed aside, and Robin Ramsay crept in upon his knees. He was literally a mass of gore, so embued with blood that you could not distinguish his wounds. Before one word had been spoken, with a most appalling shout, the tall warrior whom we had seen pass to the attack, was upon us in a bound of twenty feet. He had raised his tomahawk, and flourished it around his head preparatory to a blow on the forehead of the white youth, when, with an agility as great as his own, (the humming bird flies as fast as the eagle,) the Quakeress threw herself on the body of her discarded lover—hers in death, but not in life. The warrior stayed his hand on the moment. At the same moment, the scout, followed by several warriors, each, excepting the first named with scalps at his war-belt, came into the glen.

The whole formed an appalling tableau. On the earth lay the lovers, the maiden protecting her defenceless charge. Looking on with characteristic apathy, were six or eight of those wild sons of the forest, painted with the usual murderous devices, and covered with the reeking blood of their enemies. The scout, in some respects, not less wild than themselves, and Captain Pepper, half from anxiety to glut a yet unsated vengeance, and my poor self, the genius of deformity, completed the group.

A few words passed between the chief and the scout, when the latter told Mary that the life of her lover was granted, and bade her rise. I know not what words were used, but they were effectual. Opportunity was now given us to examine the wounded man. He was badly but not dangerously hurt; the exertion of Indian skill, and the application of Indian simples, the scout told us would soon restore him.

All the while, the Indian chief never ceased looking at the Quakeress—never for one moment slackened in his painful intensity of gaze. The savage is little susceptible of female charms: this was to be wondered at; but the wonder continued for a brief space.

“The bird of beauty is a bird of beauty still, but no longer a fledgling,” began the chief.

Seeing that he was not understood, he, after a moment’s pause, resumed, with a repetition, “The bird,” &c. and continued:

“Many moons ago there lived a Quaker* on the banks of the Rapid river that runs into the Great Salt Lake. He was a good man, and the Great Spirit blessed him for his goodness. His cabin was known to all the red men of the land;—no red man ever harmed him or his, for he seemed to all as a brother. Does the maiden hear! She does! it is well!

“To this cabin, there came in the acorn moon, a wounded chief of the Delawares. The foes of his people had been too strong for him—he alone of all his band escaped. There was in that cabin a bird, a very little bird; it gave to this chief the welcome of childhood, and it also gave him the aid of age. The chief got food; he got rest, he went on his way strong; and before the moon grew old, there were six scalps on his belt, taken from the quivering crowns of Mohawk warriors. Does the maiden hear? She does; it is well! Before he went from the Quekel's cottage, he promised the bird of beauty—no wampum belt, no furs; but he promised, if need should be, to give his bear's meat for her support, and to raise his war-cry for her succor. I am Chengachcook, the great chief of the Delawares, the wounded warrior of the Quekel's cabin. The maid is free. I will take her back to the cabin on the Rapid river, that she may say to her father, he told no lie."

* Quaker—Quaker.

LOVE SKETCHES.

BY MISS JANE T. LOMAX, OF VIRGINIA.

I.

As a moonbeam on wild water, falleth,
And lendeth its light to the wave,
Yet leaveth no sign that recalleth,
The beauty and lustre it gave;
Thus trembled awhile in its lightness,
That ray of devotion on thee,
Then passed with its passionate brightness,
As passeth the moon from the sea.

The young man sat silently and alone; his forehead beat down on his clasped hands, over which his hair fell in tangled curls. Books and papers were scattered about his apartment, but they had evidently been neglected for many days: dust had gathered on the volumes, and the ink had dried in the pen that lay beside an unfinished writing. Yet it was a letter which a few weeks previous, would not have been left incomplete; but six months of city life had changed much in Charles Lesbourne's customs. And now, even familiar and once cherished ties were gradually growing colder.

It was the last night of the year, and reflection was busy with that dreamer. The period had come when old associations were passing away, to be followed by other and falser ones; when the purer links of the past were breaking, and young pleasures returned stripped of their illusions; when absence was no longer a pain, and separation had ceased to seem the shadow of death. His was not the disposition which gains wisdom from memory; it brought him only the knowledge of his own feebleness. It was the only hour, for several weeks, that Lesbourne had looked calmly backward on his existence and his hopes; and the remembrance held for him no comfort. Few and happy are the hearts for which the closing night of the year, summons nothing of disappointment or regret!

Thought, as if to evince that its home is in eternity, takes no note of time; an hour had past, unheeded, when, with the freedom of an intimate friend, a gentleman entered the room. The new comer was apparently somewhat older than his companion, though his air of settled, and almost haughty self-possession, might have been less the result of years, than the consequence of proud reserve; for there are minds to which the lessons of experience are early taught—and men, who, looking around them with criticising coldness, see so much to condemn, that they learn prematurely to conceal both motive and impulse from the trivial world without. But the visiter's manner was winning in its composure, for it was in unison with the calm loftiness of his character, and bore that impress of sincerity which is attractive even to the insincere.

The two young men had been classmates at college, and companions in society; yet they were united more by recollections in common, than by any congeniality in nature. Lesbourne was gay in his tastes, fickle in his pursuits, with manners graceful and polished, but lacking earnestness; the other was grave in thought and action; and while inspiring confidence in others, he never lightly reposed it in himself. With all his outward calmness, there blended a young man's romance; and perhaps it was the contrast between his own visions, and his actual convictions, which induced him to veil those fancies, even while acting up to the ideal they pictured.

"I am thankful you have come Mordante," was Lesbourne's salutation, "for my reveries are terrible bores; and this gloomy evening has made them more tiresome than usual." He stirred the fire till it cast in the twilight, a cheerful glow around them.

"I have but a few moments to stay," was Mordante's reply, as he drew a chair closer to the fire: "I intend leaving town very early to-morrow, and have yet several affaires de voyage to arrange. Is your letter ready?"

"No, nor likely to be," returned Lesbourne carelessly; "for in truth, I feel too dull to attempt that dullest of all things, a sentimental epistle. Do be kind enough, Harry, to invent some graceful excuse for my negligence; you really would if you knew my aversion to writing, and Edith will never dream of doubting what you say."

"I certainly shall not test her credulity," said Mordante gravely; "you must plead your own apologies, for they are seldom worth being sent by another."

"Don't be impertinent, it makes me impatient, and I pride myself on my equanimity. Why will you not tell Edith I was prevented from sending her a letter by business, or study, or something of that kind?"

"For the very simple reason that it would be untrue," was the quiet reply.

"Indeed Mordante, you are ridiculously scrupulous about such trifles. If you are so particular now, what will you be some five years hence, when your punctiliousness will be confirmed, and you may rationally be presumed to have attained the age of discretion?"

"What, with your disregard of truth, you will never be, Lesbourne—an honorable man. You cannot laugh me out of scruples which are pure in motive, though probably not fashionable among your friends. The effects of your carelessness may be traced in every circumstance of your career: in unfulfilled engagements, in promises rashly given to be as lightly broken; in a thousand instances, trivial in themselves, yet forming a dangerous habit of hypocrisy. But lecturing aside, I am sincerely sorry you will not give me a note for Edith; cannot you write even a hasty one? it will be better than none."

"I cannot," returned Lesbourne petulantly; "I have been rather remiss lately, and if I write at all, I must send a whole page of regrets and excuses. She will not be much disappointed; I am not vain enough to suppose my attentions so valuable."

"Lesbourne," said Mordante very gravely, "this trifling is disgraceful in you, and degrading to the woman you profess to love. I have a right as her relation, and as one soon to have a yet nearer connexion, to censure your disregard of a tie you should reverence."

"I presume then," interrupted Lesbourne impatiently, "you intend exercising your double right, by informing your fair sister that is to be, that the true cause of my being silent, is want of inclination to be otherwise? I do not dispute your privilege, even if it be employed thus kindly."

A shade of anger at the sneering tone of these words, for an instant, darkened Mordante's face; but it passed away, and his look was calm and sorrowful as he said, "I never believed that, with all your frivolity, you would ever become as heartless as you now are. If you are earnest in your present conduct, our friendship, old as it is, and pleasant as it has been, must cease. But I entreat you to pause, remember how wholly another's happiness depends upon you, and be true to the love of her whose confidence you sought; for a purer heart than her's was never given. Believe me, you will spare her a sorrow passing expression, and take from yourself many hours of bitterness and repining."

As he spoke, Lesbourne seemed touched by his earnestness, and his manner was graver as he answered "You are right, Mordante, as you always are; I will really reform, and send Edith a long letter, as kind as you could wish, though I cannot write one as fond as she deserves. It will reach her nearly as soon as you will, and she shall not be disappointed. I believe I have grown a sad trifler since I left home; would to heaven, I had never entered this city!"

"I should imagine you might quit it at any time without interfering with your studies," said Mordante with a smile, glancing at the forsaken books; "but n'importe; as you mean to reform, I will be merciful, and postpone my second lecture. And now I must bid you good-by for some weeks—don't neglect that letter."

Lesbourne sat lazily looking into the fire, for some moments after his friend's departure. It was evident his visiter had left his thoughts disturbed, without having altered their tenor. A mind at war with itself, wears an outward token; and the conflict of many varying feelings was traced on his brow. His features were regular, and their paleness suited their intellectual character well; but the expression of that face was not attractive;—it told of ungoverned inclinations, of hasty impulses, of cold and selfish wilfulness; and its beauty had been matured by the touch of passion rather than time. The smile which might have been so winning, had something of mockery in it; and the sneer too often on his lip, had the bitterness of contempt, without the dignity of scorn. For many weeks the warring between right and will, had been ceaseless in his soul; and who, that knows the weakness of the human heart, cannot predict how such a strife must end? We may prolong the struggle and go on battling for years, but the resistance of principle grows weaker till it fail, and wrong become the victor. Alas! for the vain spirit that would cope with, instead of fleeing from, temptation!

At last, from very weariness, Lesbourne shook off his dreamy mood, and drawing a table near him, proceeded to write the promised letter. He glanced over the one already commenced, and as if dissatisfied with its contents, threw it in the fire, put another sheet in its place, and wrote "Dearest Edith." Then he lighted a lamp, altered its brilliancy a dozen times, and mended his pen—apparently with much care; for it took him a great while; and finally he sat with eyes upraised, as if invoking inspiration from the ceiling. It came not at his bidding; and as a last resort he took an open note from a port-folio and looked over it, as if hoping to find some prompting for a beginning of his own. The lines he read were these:—"It has been a long, long while, dear Charles, since I received your last letter, and I have hoped anxiously and vainly for another. I scarcely know whether I ought to write to you again; but when I remember your kind promises, I feel certain you have some good reason for your silence. You have perhaps been engaged with business, or study, or you may have been ill. That fear has haunted my thoughts and dreams, till I cannot repel it; for I judge your feelings by my own, and I cannot believe any thing but illness could induce you to be neglectful, when you know how your words bless my life. I fancy too—and you must deal gently with my girlish vanity—that you may wish to hear from me; for if you are debarred the pleasures of health, it may bring comfort to feel that the prayers of love are hovering around you. This is the reason I write to you, dear Charles, not because I would force you to recollect me. I am glad your gay life is such a happy one; your letters lately have been full of its joys, and you seem scarcely to think of the sweet old times when we were together, while I think of little else. But I almost wonder how you can remember me at all, amid the brilliant society you mingle with now; I often grieve to recollect how slight companionship my mind can offer for a lofty soul like yours. For your sake, I pine for talents which would enable me to sympathize with you; but yet I believe I am happier in my lowly reverence, and my simpler affection. Do you remember, how in the moonlit summer nights, we used to look forward so sadly to the time when we should be separated, and promise earnestly that no length of absence should change our hearts! The moonlight is not half so beautiful to me now; and the stars seem dimmer as they shine on our divided paths. I wish I could read your thoughts, and see if they dwell as mine do, on the delights of those bright hours; if love be to you, the holy solace it proves for me. I am sure life can have no lovelier tie, than one like ours, growing up with our childhood, and blessing our youth. Believe me, dearest, the fulfilment of your proudest aspirations, the realization of your most ambitious dreamings, can bestow no happiness more perfect, than that we knew when our existence had no separate hopes, and our thoughts were as sweet as the spring-flowers we loved to gather."

Lesbourne read no farther, but slowly refolded the letter, and once more attempted to answer it. Why was expression so languid now, with one who had usually such graceful eloquence at command? Alas! old ties had forsaken his heart; the tenderness of that letter found no response; for him, there were no green leaves of memory growing on the grave of the past. But repulse them as he might, glimpses of earlier and purer times, would rise upon him, remembrances of a period when the loveliness of earth's sweetest dream made his life beautiful. Well may regrets throng over us at the fading of that fairest of illusions, for there is nothing in this wide cold world to replace the first love-dream of our early years! It was with noble aspirations, and those vague visions of ambition which ever haunt us in our youth, that Lesbourne had left his home: but his was the susceptible disposition which the excitements of pleasure mislead, and they had confirmed the faults in a character, too habitually selfish to be lofty. He was in many respects, a favorite of fortune; and the possession of the means of self-indulgence had ripened his natural traits into settled egotism. Yet there were high qualities in his mind still; but their influence daily grew weaker. His defects were rapidly dimming the lustre of his finer powers, as a few thin clouds will hide the shining of the brightest stars; and that twilight of feeling had begun, which shuts out all good but that immediately benefitting one's self. There had been an era when his amour propre had taken a sublime stand; when he had thought with the French philosopher, "plus on fait pour les autres, plus on fait pour soi;" when his vividness of intellect lent something of vastness to egotism itself. Now, the romance of such delusions had departed—his creed was of the world, worldly. The fairy palaces of youthful enchantment were crumbling to dust, and their ruins buried many a dazzling theory whose practice might have purified and blest a life.

The sound of a clock striking the hour, fell on the listener's ear with a deep and solemn tone, as if it were fraught with the consciousness of all the human suffering that hour was witnessing. Lesbourne counted the strokes as, one by one, they pealed over the city, and then died into silence. He arose as the last one ceased, tossed aside the papers over which he had been idling, and proceeded to arrange, with unusual care, his disordered curls. The round moon was floating in the heavens, when Lesbourne quitted his room, and wended his way through the streets. The shadows of the tall buildings lay long and dark on the pavement, save where the moonlight stole through some open space with a narrow stripe of brightness, checkering with strange mosaic those cold and beaten pathways, and giving something of beauty even to the common outlines in that wide wilderness of mens' dwellings. It was calm and cold; the hum of business was over; and few were abroad but those on their way to some scene of pleasure. Lesbourne paused before the entrance of a mansion in a retired part of the city, as if uncertain whether or not to enter. The hesitation was only for a moment; the next saw him ushered into a large and gorgeously furnished apartment. The light in the room was soft and faint, falling with rich and mellow dimness; and the artificial twilight was in harmony with the luxurious splendor it heightened. Lesbourne forgot all his perplexities, as he found himself in the chamber, where for several months he had been a constant and favored visiter. The attraction which drew him there was powerful; for perhaps there is no infatuation so inexplicable, yet so difficult to limit, as that exercised by a politic and gifted mind, over the ardent imagination of an intellectual man. Lesbourne had been flattered by the graciousness, and dazzled by the grace of the woman he admired, till he had almost ceased to repel an influence his better thoughts condemned; he no longer struggled against the mental tyranny so delightful in its despotism. Yet there was much in the lady's mode of life open to censure; she was a traveller in a foreign country, without the attendance of a protector; she claimed too, the distinction of noble descent; yet she had left her home, to wander alone in a strange land. Of her past existence, or her present aims, she never spoke; to her hometies, she seldom alluded; and her only object seemed to be, to lose, amid new excitements, the remembrance of some old disappointment. She had spent the winter in the city where Lesbourne was residing; and, an acquaintance, commenced accidentally, had deepened on his part, into an enchantment reason tried in vain to dispel. The very mystery around her lot was a charm for him, and day after day found him by her side, till habit became necessity—till the sound of her voice made the music of his life, and that one face his only dream. He knew this delusion must end at last; that he was wasting youth and energy; that all the fair promises of his early years, were passing unrealized away. He felt this acutely in his lonely moments; it came bitterly over him when trifles touched the "electric chain" of former associations, and he thought of all he might have been, of all he was sacrificing—for what?

He was in no mood now for pondering on depressing reflections; for the door was noiselessly opened; and with graceful and elastic step, Nina de — approached her visiter. Her salutation was cordial, and her words, with their slight foreign accent, were peculiarly earnest, and spoken in a voice not easily to be forgotten. Her dress was in the fashion of her own land, and its drapery gave classic beauty to a form whose proportions were faultless. She was not strictly beautiful; but her eyes were dark and lustrous, and her smile lent softness to a countenance, which, though noble and intellectual, was too dark and haughty in its composure. Lesbourne had looked on many a fairer face; there was one, the worship of his boyhood, far lovelier than Nina's; but his self-love was gratified by the lady's admiration of his talents, and her many commendations were bestowed so earnestly, he could not resist their charm. Her praises were uttered with the ease and tact of one versed in reading hearts, and Lesbourne greeted them readily; for flattery is always most acceptable to those who least deserve sincere approbation. His time passed unprofitably; his studies were neglected; he opened no books but those he read with Nina; he had lost his interest in all pages but those they looked on together. Nina stood by the window, and Lesbourne was beside her. They had been attracted there by the sound of music in the street below; she still held aside the curtain, and the moonlight gave fairness to her proud features, and sparkled in the depths of her large dark eyes, as they looked up to the sky. Her attitude was grace itself; and her voice was low and thrillling as she said, "This light brings mysterious softness to the feelings, as if some power from the outer world had subdued the troubled one in the heart. It is the time for memory and hope to rule; and I should become sentimental myself, had I not learned to view all things en philosophe, and to be equally indifferent to the past and the future."

"You have attained an enviable condition," returned Lesbourne. "Tell me how you gained a philosophy I have long sought in vain."

"It was taught me," she replied more gravely, "by trials you can never meet, by a career of thought wasted and saddened, by years of hope deferred—till expectation deepened into dread and died in despair, by the sacrifice of all the illusions, all the enjoyments of life; do not envy me, my friend, the indifference purchased so dearly!" And those deep eyes, bent on Lesbourne, were full of passionate tears. He met her gaze in silence, and hastily pressed his lips on her jewelled hand.

She gently withdrew it from his grasp, and merrily as she lowered the curtain, "I must shut out this light, for it makes us both too romantic. I have been reading the poems you recommended," she continued, as she returned to her seat; "but my knowledge of your language is so imperfect, it scarcely unravels for me the mysteries of poetry. I must ask you to interpret them, for my ignorance will destroy their charm. When you are disengaged, and in a mood for sentiment, will you come and read to me?"

How could Lesbourne refuse, when addressed by a tone so musical, and beneath the spell of the strangely winning face? He had half resolved to end an intimacy too long encouraged—he had entered that apartment with the determination to bid Nina farewell, to leave the city with all its pleasures, and promises of successful ambition. He had decided to return to the home he had quit, and let that night be the last of his infatuation. There were hearts which would beat gladly at the coming of his footstep, and lovely eyes that had often looked a welcome. They had been dear to him once; they should be so again; he would go back, changed indeed by the experience of a few months, but with a change which should teach him to prize early happiness more highly. He would be bound by the spell of a stranger no longer, he would leave and forget her; and with all these resolutions he had sought her presence for the last time. Few hours of life do more towards the completion of a certain "pavement," than those that are the embryo and grave of "good intentions"—the last night of the year.

The next day found Lesbourne at Nina's side, with a volume of poetry, from which he often looked up to the eloquent countenance of his listener. His better resolutions had all vanished, and good resolutions will when they spring only from impulse. It was a strange thing, this friendship, if thus it could be termed, between persons so unlike in disposition, and so ignorant of all that made the past and the future of each other. They had met as strangers, and grown quickly to seem friends; but beyond the present which saw them together, each knew nothing of what the other remembered or hoped. The events of former years were rarely mentioned by either of them; and Nina spoke so bewitchingly of pleasanter topics, that Lesbourne now almost dreaded the period when the rapture of this fascination must cease. This was one of those transient ties so frequently formed in society, when a sympathy, commencing accidentally, lends us an interest in a companion which we can scarcely explain, brings us a few happy hours, and then passes away as it came. Other connections succeed, fresh illusions gather, and we retain nothing of the first ones but a faint remembrance of their existence, when the names of those who shared them are heard once more. In ardent yet fickle dispositions, these transitory links are strongest; and Lesbourne's mind, susceptible, imaginative and poetical, clung with more than usual tenacity to the delightful influence which bound him. The interest she evinced in his pursuits, her enthusiastic encouragement of his aspirations, flattered and deceived him, and with the vanity of his nature he ascribed her sympathy to an appreciation fonder than friendship. It was a pleasant conviction; for Nina's intellect was highly gifted, and her admiration seemed very sincere to its object. Her conduct puzzled while it attracted him; for though his attentions were gracefully welcomed, she evidently repulsed and avoided any warmer expression of his regard. Uncertain of his own sentiments, and always varying in his affections, Lesbourne scarcely regretted this treatment, and he was satisfied so long as he could see her frequently, and be lulled by the flattery of tones which daily grew softer and kinder.

"Will you read that again?" asked Nina gently, as Lesbourne finished one of Byron's passionate farewells. He obeyed, and as he concluded, she softly closed the volume as he held it, and said with a smile, "Your selection of those verses was almost ominous; when you glance at them hereafter, will you think of me, and remember they were the last we read together?"

Lesbourne gazed at her for an instant with silent surprise, for her manner was careless, and her words startled him. "The last!" he repeated at length—"you are surely jesting; why must they be the last?"

"Because I leave here to-morrow, and it is not probable we shall ever meet again," was the lady's quiet reply.

Her tone was calm, almost indifferent, and that certainly was not the air of one who felt pain at parting. Lesbourne was entirely unprepared for his altered demeanor, and he regarded her with unconcealed astonishment as she continued—"The time for my departure has been long decided, but I deferred telling you my intention because I really feel regret at terminating our pleasant friendship, and was unwilling to sadden our final interviews with the tidings of their being the last. May I venture to believe you will sometimes recollect me hereafter?"

"Recollect! how can I ever forget you!" exclaimed Lesbourne passionately—"how can you speak so coldly when you know how deeply you pain me? Ah, Nina! I could not have resolved thus deliberately, to quit you forever!"

"Perhaps not," returned his companion smilingly, "but my time of impulse and indecision has gone by, and yours is still in its youth. You must remember, I am several years your senior; some five years hence, your attachments will be even less enthusiastic than mine are now, and this romance in friendship will seem as idle to you as it already does to me."

"It never can!" exclaimed Lesbourne warmly, as he forcibly detained the hand the lady endeavored to withdraw from his clasp; "Listen to me, Nina—nay, you shall hear me. What have I done to deserve this chilling treatment? Have you not a single look of kindness in return for the love, whose depth you must have known, though you repulsed its avowal, when it has risen to my lips a thousand times?"

Nothing could have changed the current of the lover's feelings more completely, than the look of well-feigned and derisive astonishment with which these words were received. "Nay this is boyish folly," she said, with a nonchalance, more provoking than the bitterest sarcasm, and which piqued Lesbourne beyond expression—"why will you so strangely misunderstand me?" and she idly turned over the leaves of the book they had been reading.

Lesbourne gazed at her for a moment in silence, and the softer thoughts her presence had once awakened, came over him again. He only remembered the happiness of their intercourse, and the pleasant influence now passing away. His early infatuation returned, and his voice trembled with repressed emotion as he said, "And must we part thus, Nina? Will you bid me farewell, without one word of hope or comfort?"

"I cannot give you hope," she replied, "and you do not need comfort. Yours is not a heart to love long or truly, and you will find consolation in its fickleness."

"You are unjust as well as unkind," retorted the lover, indignant at her continued tranquillity, and irritated by the conviction that he had been deliberately duped and trifled with from the commencement—"you well know that my feelings for you have been earnest ones; and you cannot deny that you have tacitly encouraged them. Answer me one question, and I will trouble you with my devotion no longer. I would not willingly leave you; with the belief that you have acted with settled heartlessness; tell me truly, Nina, if you have not loved me once!"

Again he met that fixed regard of mingled mockery and amazement, and Nina's voice was colder than he had ever heard it before, as she haughtily responded "Never!"

And so it ended—this vain dreaming for which he had sacrificed so much of that purity of feeling, whose 'purple light' can never be restored. For awhile, his self-love writhed beneath the humiliation of having been thus deceived; then succeeded the weariness of disappointment; and finally came the ennui of possessing no agreeable excitement in his pursuits, and the restlessness of a mind diseased thrown back upon itself for solace. Several weeks passed, and Nina's enchantment gradually faded from an imagination inconstant in all its impressions; and slowly there stole back to him, unbidden and noiseless as a dream, the holiness of his early love. It came, as it comes sometimes, thank God! to us all, the one angel memory amid the dark cares of the world. He could no longer banish the vision whose beauty had hallowed his younger thoughts; his fancy brought vividly before him the image of those soft clear eyes, with their childlike earnestness, and the sound of that voice so musical in its simple tenderness. The loveliness of old times returned often now, when no nearer illusion existed; and at length, after a silence of several months, Lesbourne wrote to Edith. It were useless to repeat here, his plausible apologies and fervent protestations; they were the ones to be expected from a nature, so false in principle, and so undaunted in self-reliance,—but they came too late. The heart that has once unwisely confided, may break in its loneliness, but can never trust wholly again. There had been a time when the reception of that letter would have given happiness unspeakable, and its kind words been treasured among the holy things of memory. There had been burning tears wept for its delay, and the eyes now haunting its writer, had grown sorrowful in their sweetness. But the confidence he had slighted was not to be regained, and a brief reply to his impassioned appeal terminated all hope of restoring the neglected tie. Ah! how often in tracing that reply, had the pen fallen from those trembling fingers, and the quick-throbbing heart mocked the studied coldness of those written lines!

DR. JOHNSON.

"Every man believes," remarks Dr. Johnson, "that mistresses are unfaithful and patrons are capricious; but he excepts his own mistress and his own patron."

MODERN FICTION.

E. D.

The day has passed, when works of fiction could be dismissed with a contemptuous sneer, as unworthy of the attention of men of intelligence, and fit food only for Byronic young gentlemen and sentimental school-girls; and the modern novel, is now, confessedly, a mighty instrument in the hands of Genius, either for good, or for evil.

The general "diffusion of knowledge," as it is called, has tended much to equalize information among all classes of the community; while much that has been gained in surface, has been lost in depth; for the youth of the country, all pursuing the same routine of study, however diverse their capacity and inclinations may be, are drilled into a kind of uniformity of intellect, very adverse to any thing like original thought. In most of our colleges, the minds of the students are put in uniform, as well as their bodies; and thus all of them obtain a slight smattering of many sciences, without being calculated to excel in any. Nor is this evil often remedied by after-culture; since the true education of each man should commence, after his collegiate studies are concluded. In the great majority of instances, the current literature of the day, furnishes the sole intellectual food; and therefore, from the character and spirit of this popular literature, a fair estimate may be formed of the taste and habits of the age. At present, there appears, on the part of the reading public, an insatiate craving after light literature, partly pampered and partly produced by the newspaper press—more particularly the larger sheets of the northern cities, which are most assuredly great evils, flooding the land with weak, trashy and stimulating fictions, and catering not so much for the taste of the refined and educated, as for the passions and prejudices of the uninformed. In justice we must except two of these papers from this censure; the "Albion" and the "New World" are both well conducted and valuable journals; but the rest, under the specious pretext of popularising literature, do much to vitiate and degrade the public taste; the price of subscription being almost nominal, the consequence is, that these papers are read by hundreds and thousands to the exclusion of all useful and solid works; if any one doubts this fact, let him only look around the circle of his own acquaintance, and he will be convinced of its truth.

That this is an evil, and a great one, we presume, will not be denied; but it may be met with the assertion, that these papers form a "taste for reading,"—yes, but for reading what? Why the very syllabub of literature, light frothy fictions, appealing to the passions, not the reason, forgotten as soon as read; or if not forgotten, filling the minds of their readers with false and exaggerated notions, and totally unfitting them for the practical business of life.

"Strong meat is not for babes," it is true, but this reverses the process, and would feed men upon the diet of the nursery. Doubtless the retention of knowledge in a few hands, during the middle ages, while the mass were sunk in the grossest ignorance, and groping in the dark after the wildest delusions, was a great evil; but in modern times, we have rushed into the opposite extreme. We have lowered the standard of excellence, instead of elevating it, and have converted the republic of letters into a wild and turbulent democracy, where the contest between authors appears to be, not who can enunciate the loftiest truths in a style most worthy of the subject; but who can descend lowest into the depths of slang and common-place. Witness the miserable vulgarity, the utter and unreclaimed blackguardism of the "school" of which Jack Sheppard is the head, in which the adventures of felons and ruffians are detailed in a style worthy of the Newgate Calendar; in which the noblest character is a burglar, and the beau-ideal of female excellence, a lady of pleasure. And yet works of this description are not only tolerated but popular; the reading public require excitement; and although we have not reached the open immorality and coarse indecency of the French novelists, yet Professor Ingram and some others of our popular novelists, follow very close in their footsteps. That the evil does prevail to an alarming extent, there can be no doubt; the question is as to the remedy: and this we think must be sought in the perusal of works of fiction, written by masters of the art, which these unskilful daubers do their utmost to lower and degrade. It is true, that even the best of these might be dispensed with, since they all have a tendency to exalt the imagination at the expense of the judgment; yet as the drunkard cannot suddenly relinquish the use of ardent spirits without danger of a relapse, so the public mind, having acquired a morbid craving for high excitement, can only be restored to a healthy state, by the use of, salutary stimulants, such as are contained in the romances of Scott, Bulwer, and Dickens, and our own authors, Irving, Cooper, and Kennedy;—of authors who are all so well and extensively known, it would be idle to speak at large. We would merely attempt to group together, some of the most striking features of their mental conformation, which bear the impress of the spirit of the age, which must be more strongly exhibited in works of this character than of any other, since it is the aim and object of the true novelist, "to hold the mirror up to nature," and display therein the "form and pressure of the times." This formerly was the province of poetry, but not in its loftiest flights, where Milton and Dante sought the "highest heaven of invention," soared aloft into the realms of celetial bliss, or plunged into the gloomy depths, where the "Archangel ruined," in sullen grandeur, held his joyless throne; these were but the louder notes of the great lyre of poesy; it possessed other and softer strings; and in the hands of Pope, Cowper, and Crabbe, was made to vibrate to human feelings and human affections; the last of whom,

"Though Nature's sternest painter,
Yet her best."

It is therefore only in poetry and fiction, that a living picture of the vices and follies of the day can be given; for the business of history is with the Past; of religion with the Future; philosophic investigations demand the calm and even mind of the student; abstract facts are to be treated of and a chain of reasoning to be carried out. The dramatist, whose province it is to depict the scenes and manners of every-day life, is prone either to wander into the fairy land of fancy, and, in embodying the forms of the beautiful in apt and glowing words, to overstep the modesty of nature; or, in his love of "effect," to caricature the traits he intends to represent. The poets then, alone, contest the palm with the higher order of novelists. But poetry with us, in the present age, is a bird in the wilderness, pouring forth its notes of melancholy sweetness unnoticed, and dying again into silence, or soothing our senses and haunting our memories for a brief space, but making no permanent impression on our minds and hearts. Some few there may be, whose inspired words will force their way into the minds of men; but how few their number, and how limited their success. This is emphatically the age of prose, and a mighty instrument it is, in the hands of a master, cramped within no narrow limits of measure; the utterance can be as broad as the thought itself; the very metre and jingle of poetry often mars the effect; there is something cramped and mechanical about it; but in prose, the thought can be allowed gradually to unfold and expand itself; and we do not know if the stately march of Milton's prose, do not contain flights as lofty and sustained, as any to be found in his far more celebrated poems.

Much outcry of late has been made about copyright, many supposing that this is the true cause of the non-production of solid works; and no doubt this may have caused the state of things to which we allude. The higher class of authors being driven from the field by the unprofitable result of their labors—their place has been supplied by a swarm of minor literateurs, who inundate the country with tales of chivalry, and stories of sickly sentiment, at two dollars per copy sheet; a supply of the article ready made, being always kept on hand, and disposed of on the most liberal terms;—the production of such works as those of Prescott and Bancroft, only proving what might be effected, were sufficient encouragement extended to good authors, and the popular taste sufficiently improved to call forth the talent now lying latent throughout the country.

We have thrown out these hasty and imperfect suggestions, because we think the present state of things radically wrong, and imperiously demanding reform. We will now indulge in a few reflections, as to the scope and tendency of the best specimens of modern fiction, which has escaped this rushing flood of light. The modern novel is the lineal descendant of the epic poem,—for what are the Odyssey and Aneid but novels in verse! the Golden Ass of Apuleius, is the most perfect specimen of the ancient novel; numerous others might be cited to show the fondness of the ancients for prose fictions. These have however, undergone a great many changes, and passed through many different phases before attaining their present form, which seeks to combine the varied excellencies of the poem, the drama, the historical chronicle, and the mirror of everyday-life. It would require a volume instead of an article, to trace all the different forms the novel has assumed, even in England. We will merely enumerate a few. The earliest, in point of time, were the interminable French novels of Madame Scuderi, which afforded employment for the courtly dames of the Court of Charles II., of which it would be difficult to say, whether the manner or the matter were worse. To these, succeeded the long-winded and elaborate novels of Richardson, correct and unexceptionable in point of morality, but a sore tax upon the time and patience of readers. Next came the free and easy pictures of life and manners, which taxed the inventive genius of Fielding and Smollett, coarse, but true to nature—the “raw head and bloody bones” novels of Mrs. Radcliffe—much affected, even now, by sentimental damsels—full of trap-doors, banditti, ghosts, haunted castles, and other horrors;—the metaphysical novels of Godwin, powerfully depicting single passions, but sadly deficient in keeping and finish;—and those wild and thrilling romances full of the supernatural horror which darkened the genius of Maturin. On the ruins of all these, the mighty “Wizard of the North” erected his beautiful romances, where truth and fiction, history and poetry illustrate and adorn each other; for breadth of coloring, life-like truth of delineation, play of fancy and luxuriance of wit, his Waverley novels stand unrivalled. The conception of his characters is only surpassed by the execution, and so clearly are they brought before our mental vision, that we immediately enroll them among the number of our acquaintances, and recognize them as friends for ever after. His mind was a peculiarly well-balanced one, the abundance of his materials never perplexed nor disturbed him, every thing was arranged in its proper and fitting place; with him, passion never degenerated into bombast, nor true feeling into sickly sentiment; the line which separates the sublime from the ridiculous, so invisible to ordinary writers, was clearly perceptible to him; and, the antiquarian lore, which with any other, would have degenerated into pedantry, in his hands, adds a most novel and attractive feature to his productions. Of these novels may well be said what Shakespeare says of Cleopatra,

“Time cannot wither them,
Nor custom stale
Their infinite variety.”

But the mighty wizard descended to his grave, and his wand of power was buried with him; for, though his imitators may copy the frame-work of his novels, and to outward seeming, imitate them well, yet when we examine them more closely, we find that the “soul is wanting there.” His best novels too, those portraying the ancient life and habits of the Scotch, have not been much imitated: he first opened the rich mine of chivalry, and his imitators have chiefly followed his footsteps in this untrodden field. Of these, James is the most talented and the most successful; for a time, his novels were exceedingly popular, and the ancient knights lived over their follies a second time in the pages of their chronicler. But his day has almost passed. People have got weary of gallant knights pricking over the plain to the relief of distressed damsels—rare samples of perfection, excelling in tapestry and tears. We have no sympathy with these iron-clad knights of the olden time, with hard hands and harder heads, but regard them as we do the pictures of our grandmothers—very faithful likenesses no doubt, but more apt to find their way into the garret than the parlor. Bulwer saw this, he saw that chivalry had strutted its brief hour on the stage, and was now to be hissed off—that men began to wish for something better than a mere reanimation of forgotten follies; and, under the inspiration of a lucky thought, composed Pelham; its success was instantaneous; the revulsion of popular taste was as rapid as it was strong,—and novels of fashionable life deluged the British press: but his imitators did not at first perceive the true drift of his work; they did not perceive that under the thin veil of a pretended love and admiration for the titled nobility, lay hid the deepest and bitterest sarcasm against the hollow and heartless nature of its society! He does indeed dwell on and depict fashionable society; but how! his mother, one of its rulers, is a cold and heartless being; his father is ready to connive at his own dishonor for the sake of the damages the law would allow him, but is scrupulously punctilious on “points of honor;” his friends are unprincipled hypocrites, with the exception of one, who turns misanthrope; and he himself “cuts” fashionable society as soon as he becomes a rational being. Nor have the “men of the world”—a large and influential class at the present day, who would serve both “God and mammon,” and whose piety and morality co-sist in long faces and moral laws—the pharisees of our times—fared much better at his hands; the character of the banker in “Maltravers,” that “highly respectable man” Mr. Templeton, is but a correct and flattered likeness of many who mortify the flesh externally, for the sake of securing more extensive privileges thereby.
